"But if the case can be made it may also be from extra public expenditure.

In the inner cities, none of us can act on a scale and with a speed that has the measure of the present recession."

The right hon. Member for Henley said that on 9 October 1981. Those remarks are still applicable, but the Government are not listening. We welcome the little that they are doing, but it is not enough and they know it. This is no substitute for real policies to deal with inner-city problems.

10.42 pm

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): This order is warmly welcomed on the Government side and for a reason that may surprise some of my hon. Friends. Contrary to what we have just heard, the initiative to set up urban development corporations is now beginning to attract a measure of all-party support. My hon. Friends may have thought that the speech by the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) was a little grudging. There was a recognition that the money was all right but that it was not enough. Just two months ago some of us sat on the Statutory Instruments Committee at which the development corporations were set up. We were told by the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) that if Labour came to power in the general election it would repeal the legislation to provide these urban development corporations.

We ought to be grateful for the grudging support from the Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen. Indeed, such support is perhaps spreading. At Question Time today the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he would set up a development corporation in Consett. She obviously welcomed this sort of initiative that we are pioneering elsewhere.

The second reason why urban development corporations and the order are to be welcomed, is that those corporations are now finally up and running. That has not taken long. It is less than a year since it was announced at the Conservative party conference that more urban development corporations were to be created. The original two in London docklands and on Merseyside have been followed by five more. The corporations being established are important for every region in which they are being established, but they are especially important in the north-east. Two of the five corporations being established are in the north-east.

The hon. Member for Bootle spoke about increasing mainstream expenditure to the north. He seems not to have understood that one of the fundamental problems of the north-east is that we have had all the mainstream expenditure. We have had oodles of it. We have had regional aid, rate support grant, housing benefit and subsidies for nationalised industries. Everything that is going we have had. However, the assistance that the region has had now for 25 years has been spread far too widely. It has been blanket regional aid. It has been thinly spread subsidy for nationalised industries. It has been lop-sided rate support grant when what we needed — it was not until this Administration came to power that it was recognised — was much more specific help targeted clearly on those areas in the greatest need.

It is no accident that where public money has been targeted most precisely and specifically, there we have had the best results. Examples are the enterprise zone in Hartlepool, the specific help given to Consett through the Derwentside industrial development agency, the assistance given by the Shildon and South Durham development agency to Shildon, when the railworks were closed. It is in those areas, where public money has been targeted, that the jobs are beginning to return.

The initiative in setting up the urban development corporation on Tyneside and Teesside recognises that, and that the historical and structural problems of the north-east are largely centred on the rivers of Tyne and Wear and Tees. It was on the rivers that the older industries were created and became established—shipbuilding, iron ore, steel works and so on. People were drawn to the river areas, and labour was imported there 100, 75 or 50 years ago. It is in those areas, where those industries have retracted the employment and people have been thrown out of work, that the greatest need is now apparent. The Government, in earmarking the river areas of the north-east, have got it right.

It is also no accident that in those river areas local government has failed, for example, in London, where too many local authorities were getting in each other's way, and too many Labour authorities were choosing the route of high spending, and putting up rates, driving out industries and the jobs that go with them.

Miss Marjorie Mowlam (Redcar): I shall ask the hon. Gentleman two questions. First, will he explain how, on Teesside, the 43,000 jobs lost under the Tory Government will be replaced? For example, on the water front, about which he is talking, how will a nature reserve and investment of £10 million solve the problem of our job losses?

Mr. Fallon: I was waiting for the second question. The answer to the first question is that it is estimated that this single urban development corporation on Teesside will create, over the lifespan of its initial existence of five to seven years, some 6,000 jobs. That is no mean achievement, and should not be lightly disregarded. We all know that we have lost jobs in manufacturing and the older industries, but if I had been told four years ago that the Government would take a single initiative, and create through it some 6,000 jobs, even I might not have believed it.

I was saying that it is no accident that it is on the riverside areas that local government has failed. The plain fact is that it should not be—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. There is so much sedentary noise below the Gangway that I am not quite sure to which speech I am listening.

Mr. Fallon: It is no accident that urban development corporations are needed now. They would not be needed to get new business into those riverside areas if local authorities had not already failed by driving business out of those areas through their high-rating policies on Tyneside and Teesside.

I believe that the two new corporations that we are financing through the order tonight will cut through the problems with local authorities, the bureaucracy, the inertia that is attracted to bureaucracy and the inherent tendency of labour bureaucracies to choose the highspending, job-destructive route.

The two corporations will succeed, for three reasons. First, they will be very specific, as I have already argued. They will target their resources on relatively small geographic areas. I accept that Teesside is one of the larger areas, but by targeting on such areas that does not mean that they will not be helping the region as a whole. My constituents in Darlington will benefit because they will be able to find jobs in the new businesses that will be brought to Teesside just as jobs will be furnished for those who worked in the older industries. That means that the considerable amounts of money that are spent specifically and locally on Tyneside and Teesside and in development corporation areas will have a much wider and more subtle effect at spreading prosperity and job opportunities more widely across the north-east.

Secondly, the corporations will succeed where local authorities have failed because the corporations have the powers necessary to do so. We have already heard that the corporations have planning powers, and the hon. Member for Bootle was jealous of that. They have powers of compulsory purchase to cut through the inertia that bedevilled the London docklands for so long. They will have the ability to bypass the local politicians and to do in their areas what the London docklands development corporation has done in its to secure regeneration.

Thirdly, they will succeed because they will have the resources, although not the huge sums that have been spread so widely through regional aid or rate support grant which has been spent on subsidising a vast political clientele through housing benefit and rent subsidy. They will have resources specifically to prime the pump for new investment which will help to refurbish the old industrial landscape to attract fresh investment into those areas and the private sector finance that will follow.

Those of us who are serious about regenerating the economy of the north-east will wish the two urban development corporations well. If we are to regenerate the north-east we must begin by regenerating the riverside areas and helping the people who live there. That is the secret to re-establishing a firm economic base in the north-east.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): I understood from the Prime Minister's first words after her election victory that she was specifically interested in the inner cities. She said so. However she betrayed her motivation at the same time. She said that she wanted them "for us now". That is what has been happening.

I am glad that the Secretary of State is in the Chamber. The trouble with the Tory party is that it sees what it wants to see and excludes a lot of the unpleasant truth. I am sad that the Minister—whom I welcome to his new job—went through his opening speech with such a flat apparent disinterest in communities where people live and want to continue to live in prosperity.

There is a difference between the London docklands development corporation and the other development corporations. The main difference, as the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) said, is that there was a community resident in the London area first, whereas there was no such community in the other areas. There is all the difference in the world between developing a vacant site and developing a populated one. The people who live on the site might be asked what they want to happen as they know the area better than anyone else.

Of course we welcome the one third increase in public money. Southwark, Tower Hamlets and Newham councils would also welcome a statement from the Secretary of State next week that he will increase their rate support grant by one third, but he will not do that.

The right hon. Gentleman will probably rate-cap one, two or three of them, or plan to do so again. That will cut the public money that locally elected councillors of whatever party can spend and allow the unelected appointees of his office to spend in their stead. If the money is available, there can be regeneration, but in whose interest will that be? The interests that should be served are clear, and we want regeneration for obvious reasons.

In my constituency there is 28 per cent. adult male unemployment. The percentage became substantially higher following the establishment of the London docklands development corporation. Where jobs have been created, they have gone substantially to people who live outside the borough. These jobs have been created largely in service industries, which do not require the natural skills that those in the community want to develop and to find employment in.

There are many jobs that could be done but the strategy has not been to allow the local community to develop the self-help that the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) talks about. It has been self-help for those who have come in with the money and paid the highest price. The regeneration has been in and for the interest of those who started off best. Opposite my home is a site that was sold the other day to Ideal Homes for £20 million. I gather that it is to parcel it up and sell it on. The consortium that was willing to buy the site partly for rented housing, partly for housing associations and partly for co-operative housing was not allowed to do so. Instead, the site was bought by a private developer who is planning to sell it on, for profit, to other developers, and mainly for private housing.

Most of those in my community cannot afford the prices that private housing now commands. Some private flats are being sold for £2·5 million each, while for those in work the average income in the area is between £100 and £200 a week. This is not regeneration in the local interest. Many of the new flats are going to employees of foreign companies. These are foreign employees who already have homes elsewhere and who should be subject to planning permission when it comes to second homes, bearing in mind that there are 15,000 in Southwark on the housing waiting list. Those 15,000 are waiting for a decent first home. This is not regeneration in the interests of the local community.

The land sales and the speculation in development are horrendous. The land price is £1 million an acre. It is immoral that the community has to battle for small pieces of land for a little more rented housing, sheltered accommodation for the elderly or more play space, when down the river the Kuwait Investment Office, through the arm of the St. Martin's Property Corporation Ltd.—I raised this issue on the Adjournment on Friday—wants to erect a building that would look rather like this palace but much larger. It would provide 1·2 million sq ft of office development on a prime riverside site, and it would dwarf everything around it.

There is no employment strategy. Until last year, the LDDC did not have such a strategy, and it is only just beginning to put one together. There is no community development strategy. I do not mind if the Minister does not accept the truth from me because of my political partisanship, but I suggest that he speaks to the Prince of Wales. The Prince visited Tower Hamlets the other day and he was not pleased with what he saw. He saw housing conditions that the Select Committee on the Environment, which is chaired by a Conservative Member, said demanded a national response from this Conservative Government. The Minister should talk to Prince Philip, who chaired the inquiry into British housing, about the housing policies that should be implemented in the inner cities. The princes have views that are certainly not those of the Government.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Prince of Wales said—this appeared in an article in The Times of 4 July—that we want to regenerate the environment and "to create viable and self-sustained communities"?

The Act on which all these considerations must be based does not require anything to do with people. Instead, it is directed to regenerating profit.

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Gentleman knows as well as I do that the original Act lays down no requirements that the community should have a role to play. That is the fundamental failure. The Government proclaim the morality of the family but ignore the community. To develop over the top of community is to deny the history of the riverside communities, which the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) so lauds, and which have contributed as much as any. It also denies their ability to contribute, which is enormous, and it is what they want to do. Give them decent housing, whether as owner-occupiers at a low price or for rent, public transport and jobs and they will contribute with proper community development.

The hon. Member for Darlington may not yet accept what I am saying, but if they are willing to do so, he and the Minister should come to my constituency, where they can listen to people who have lived through the development of the LDDC and who have battled to hang on to any of the principles which communities are about.

Money could be spent well. It could be spent on providing a decent public transport service north and south of the river. It could be spent on ensuring that our environment is more pleasant, that there is more green space, that there are more open amenity areas and more community facilities. In the basics, however, such as jobs and housing, we must respond to need rather than demand.

The Minister said that there is now competition for development. It is no use having competition for development when local people cannot begin to compete because the price is way beyond their reach. The London docklands is often a rip-off working for the profit of those who started with the most. That is unacceptable, and it should be unacceptable to people of decency on the other side of the House.

Mr. Den Dover (Chorley): Anyone who has listened to the debate so far must conclude that the hon. Members for Bootle (Mr. Roberts) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) are keen on public investment in inner cities, whereas our Minister has rightly emphasised how well we have done to attract private investment.

Nobody could have predicted the liveliness and regeneration of the past seven years in the previously derelict and despairing docklands area. I applaud the foresight of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), then the Secretary of State for the Environment, who did a marvellous job in the docklands and tried to follow up that success in Merseyside.

The Back-Bench Committee on Urban Affairs and New Towns, has considered what needs to be done in inner cities which have had the traumatic experience of job losses and a loss of public confidence and faith in the future. We strongly recommended urban development corporations, which should be scattered around the United Kingdom. I greatly welcome the Government's emphasis on inner cities for the future.

In the east end of London, we have 96 per cent. rented housing. How can that be sensible when we have 70 per cent. owner-occupation in other parts of the country? Private developers such as Wimpey, for whom I worked part-time until the end of last year, have invested in the land, often when it was of negative value and put down houses. People have met that supply of housing with their own cash. Whereas working people in the east end were hamstrung and had to look for rented housing, they have been able to buy housing which has greatly increased in value, thus helping to transform the area.

It must be said, however, that the opportunities in docklands are much better than in Merseyside. A few years ago, though, one would never have expected private investment and jobs to be brought to an area so that local people would have jobs in services, construction and transport. Therefore I welcome the investment and the increase in borrowing powers to ensure that the inner cities are revitalised. The Trafford Park area and the west midlands are very anxious that this development should take place.

I am sure that there will be sensible investment in the infrastructure by the development corporations. There should be small teams of chief officers and experts, because more of the work ought to be handed to private sector consultants. There will be investment in private housing. In the past there has been only rented accommodation and public investment. Land values will increase. The hon. Member for Bootle referred to negative land values on Merseyside. I agree entirely with him. That has to be contrasted with what is happening in docklands and what will happen in the four urban development corporations. All that the Opposition can offer are sour grapes, even though the Government's strong initiative strikes at the heart of regional needs—the need for private investment and the need for an act of faith by the Government of the day. I applaud what the Government are doing.

11.6 pm

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): As this is my maiden speech I take great pleasure in paying tribute to my predecessor, Ian Mikardo. He represented constituencies in Bow and Poplar for 23 years, and he first entered the House in 1950. He was much loved and respected both here and throughout the country for his wit and wisdom. I wish him a happy retirement. I hope that he will write his memoirs so that we can all read the many wonderful stories that he has to tell. My predecessor loved this place and I hope that I shall find it as attractive as he did. When I arrived here I was greeted with cries of, "When are you going to start the book?" I have to inform hon. Members that I shall disappoint them, as I have no talents in that direction.

At first, I found that many things here were strange. It is strange to be debating a serious subject at this time of night. Perhaps this accounts for the fact that out of 633 Members of Parliament only 41 are women. What young woman with children could be attracted to a place in which one has to spend half the night and work such unsocial hours?

At one time I taught in Holloway prison—I hasten to add as a visiting teacher. It shares many similarities with this place, which is dark and gloomy. We lose our name and we are referred to by the name of our constituencies. We hardly see our families, unless they come to visit us in the family room. That is another reason why women are not attracted to stand for Parliament.

The sentence that the result of the election has given to my constituents is very serious. It means that many of them are imprisoned for another four years in crumbling flats and in the despair of poverty and unemployment.

I am very honoured to represent Bow and Poplar. I ask for the indulgence of the House while I speak about the east end. I was born and bred there; I went to school there; my father was a Stepney councillor; I taught for many years in east end schools.

I feel that I know what is needed by the people in the east end and how they feel and think, because I have suffered from many of the same problems. There is widespread unemployment, 28 per cent. among men and 15 per cent. among women. There is a serious problem of homelessness and higher than average mortality and perinatal mortality rates. There are long hospital waiting lists, fewer cars than average and bad transport, particularly from north to south.

Lest anybody should think that all is bleak and gloomy in the east end, I must point out that there is much there that we treasure. There is a rich cultural life; enriched by people from many parts of the world. We have the river. The area in which I was born, once known as Red Cliff, was a salubrious area centuries ago, where people from the City went to take the air and to convalesce. So there is a natural beauty in the area, which has been destroyed by man.

There is also warmth and compassion, and the companionship that enables poor people to survive harsh conditions. There is great courage and close family life, which is under threat because the children of people living in the east end can no longer afford to live there. When they move out, their parents will be left alone to fend for themselves, which is not as it should be.

I lived in the east end during the war when we were under serious threat, but we fought back. I was an air raid warden. My first ideals of Socialism were strengthened when I saw ordinary working men and women, who had never been given the chance to do anything but menial jobs, take command during air raids when the area was cut off. The sent for the fire and rescue services and saw about people being clothed and fed. They did all that and I realised the talent that is wasted among working people because this society has no use for it and does not allow them to get out into the light and to use it.

We are under attack once again. We are under attack from the reforms that are proposed in the Gracious Speech. We cringe when we hear the word "reform". I am reminded of Humpty Dumpty in "Alice Through the Looking Glass", who explained his strange use of words.

"'When I use a word' Humpty Dumpty said 'it means just what I choose it to mean — neither more nor less.' 'The question is' said Alice 'whether you can make words mean so many different things.'

'The question is' said Humpty Dumpty 'which is to be master, that's all.'"

In this Government's looking-glass world, the word "reform" is used to mean the opposite of reform. It is used when the Prime Minister means that she is going into the attack. To people in Tower Hamlets, the "reform" of education means that the prices of school meals will increase and that the children whose parents cannot afford the extra fees for woodwork or home economics will be excluded from those extra subjects. Where are we to find the extra teachers to look after the children who will be excluded from those subjects because their parents do not have the money to pay for the materials? "Reform" in education will also mean the introduction of something like the 11-plus. As a former teacher in the east end, I shall have a great deal more to say, when the time comes, about the obscenity of the 11-plus and the loss of confidence that system brought about in 90 per cent. of the children whom I taught.

The "reform" of the Health Service means that we already have a private hospital that is drawing staff from the London hospital, and increasing the waiting lists for people who cannot afford to do other than use the Health Service, which is no longer serving their needs as it should. I have dozens and dozens of letters that are cries of pain from people who cannot get the treatment that they need and, indeed, the treatment for which they have paid when they paid their national insurance contributions.

The "reform" of social security will be an attack on young people who are unemployed. It will make them work for a pittance and undercut other people's wages. It will cut the maternity grant and various other benefits.

The community charge will increase costs for everybody in Tower Hamlets. The average rate per household is £548 and the estimated community charge per adult will be £639. Therefore, even a pensioner or any single person living on his own will have to pay £91 more per year under the community charge. So much for reform.

Now the Government's reforming zeal has been turned to the inner city. The London docklands development corporation is put forward as the jewel in the Government's crown — a blueprint for urban development corporations in other major cities. But we who live with the problems created by the LDDC can tell hon. Members that the jewel is paste and the crown is tarnished. A historic opportunity to solve the housing problems of the east end once and for all is being frittered away.

In Tower Hamlets we need an improved environment, homes and jobs. Let us examine the record of the LDDC. As a child I grew up within the sound of the river, but not the sight of it. I could hear the ships' horns, but in front of me was a grey dock wall. There was a little park some distance away where a small area of the river bank was open and we played. I hoped when those docks closed and the jobs were lost that there would at least be some community gain and at last we could have a riverside walk.

Some £300 million to £400 million has been spent. When I visit the east end and the Isle of Dogs today I get the feeling that it is as the Wild West must have been. There is plunder in the air. The biggest growth industries are wine bars and real estate agents. The area should be developed for the benefit of the people. I do not believe that anyone should be allowed to build right on to the river bank. It should be for the use of the whole population, not for the pleasure of the privileged few.

The proposals for Canary wharf are architecturally and otherwise obscene. It will obscure the view of Greenwich which east enders have enjoyed for many generations. Land prices are rocketing and house prices are spiralling. I have a cutting from a local newspaper about a new development which has just come on the market in Wapping and it states:

"Under LDDC rules the homes were offered to Tower Hamlets residents for the first month, but there was not a single offer from local people for the flats which cost £90,000 plus."

What a mockery! On paper the residents have the first offer of the houses, but they cannot afford to pay for them. Instead the houses go to outsiders and local people have no chance to live in the area where their families have always lived.

Has the money used by the LDDC been well spent? It claims that 8,000 additional jobs have been created, but more than 5,000 of them were transfers from the outside, from Billingsgate and the printing industry. Only 2,800 of those new jobs were real new jobs. Some 3,355 jobs have been lost through firms being squeezed out by compulsory purchase orders and rising land prices. Despite all that money being spent, there has been a net loss of 517 jobs. So much for the benefits that the LDDC has brought to the unemployed in the east end.

Canary wharf is in my constituency on the Isle of Dogs. This huge development was given planning permission in two weeks — less time than it takes to get planning permission for a fish a chip shop. After 18 months the master building agreement is still not signed. Two of the developers have pulled out and now a new developer from Canada is said to be moving in. It is all secret. We do not know what is happening. We are not consulted. The development is simply being imposed on us. The land was offered to the Canary wharf consortium at a price well below its market value. We do not know how the price was arrived at. Was it based on a certificate from an independent valuer or did the Department of the Environment give its specific consent to dispose of the land at a price lower than its market value? We have not been told.

The local community groups do not want Canary wharf. They do not want the docklands highway that is to go with it, which will make life a misery for many local people, and they do not want to have anything to do with the obscene idea of a £30 million memorial statue in an area where so much else is needed. These disgraceful ideas have nothing to do with the needs of the people in Bow and Poplar.

Peat, Marwick, Mitchell and Co., the accountants of the LDDC, reported that the number of jobs that we had been told that Canary wharf would produce had been vastly overestimated, that most of the jobs would be for people brought in from the outside once again and that only about 1,800 jobs would be provided for local people. Most of those jobs would be part-time and many of them would be cleaning jobs. The developers, on the other hand, were to get very great gains. They would get tax relief which could be written off against of any of their developments anywhere in the country and the Exchequer would pay about £80 million in lieu of rates. Tower Hamlets council will not gain because it will lose the block grant. It will lose £1·3 million for every £1 million of rateable value of Canary wharf and there will be a net loss to the community.

Canary wharf will change the face of the east end and of London. It will extend the City into the east end. Aldgate already looks dehumanised. It is already part of the City, and that change will go further. Local people are considered to be in the way. This is not the first time that people have been pushed out because they ae considered to be in the way. It happened in the 18th century to the peasants, with the enclosure of the land. Today some councils are selling off council estates, moving the tenants out and handing those estates over to private developers.

The London docklands development corporation commissioned a report by Sandra Wallman of University College. She started with recommended points for the consortium of Canary wharf. She talks about dockland traditions, and this is very significant. She said:

> "This issue is more diffuse, covering the need for some parcel(s) of land to be held in trust so that the continuity of the traditional community is assured, the matter of local place names and the environment. Commitment to local identity in all its forms is a serious need at this initial stage."

What does that mean? Does it mean that the east enders are to be pushed into some parcel of land that has been set aside, just as the red Indians were pushed into reservations? At least the Dutch bought the island of Manhattan for beads; the LDDC is getting the Isle of Dogs for a song. Is it considering allowing a small group of east enders to stay on the Isle of Dogs to be a sort of living museum—a "chirpy, cheeky, Cockney, chappy" living museum? Would we be walking around wearing cloth caps and mufflers and saying, "Gor blimey, Guv. How's your trouble and strife? She's up the apples and pears." What kind of nonsense is this? Is this what the LDDC has in store for us? Is the City to move in and take over while a few of us will be allowed to stay on some parcel of land, squeezed into a corner of the Isle of Dogs? East enders are not going to stand for that. We refuse to be treated like this.

East enders are proud people; they are fighters. They fought Mosley in Cable street. They knew how to unite —community side by side with community—against the people who were attacking them. They stood firm during the war and they will stand firm against attacks on their way of life today.

We are not backward-looking. We want to keep the best of the old traditions and we want to take advantage of new technology. We want the training that is needed to go with that new technology. We want homes with gardens for our people and for the children. We want jobs and a better environment. We do not want decisions that affect our lives to be taken in secret. We want democratic control of the land to be returned to the community. As we have resisted before we shall resist the LDDC plans that are against our interests now. I shall be proud to be part of that resistance.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): As other hon. Members have noted, one of the first acts of the Prime Minister after the election was to reassure us that the Government would do something about "those inner cities" and especially about jobs. The urban development corporations are the Government's answer with regard to jobs and are a means of interfering in the market mechanism.

I welcome that readjustment and realignment in Government thinking. I particularly welcome that change in the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon). For many years the hon. Gentleman had preached to us that we should rely upon the market mechanism. I am pleased that there is a recognition of the fact that the market mechanism has signally failed areas such as the north-east.

For years we have known that markets, left to their own devices, cannot create the jobs that are necessary to overcome the divisions we know and experience in British society.

Apparently this £800 million is all there is. I presume to intervene in this debate even though I know that there is no hope of anyone in my constituency benefiting from the establishment of the UDCs. The Under-Secretary of State made that clear in his answer to my question. I believe that he also made it clear that the rationality behind the criteria used to decide which areas will get that aid is somewhat questionable.

My constituency meets all the normal criteria in terms of unemployment levels and deprivation. Every Government report recognises that my constituency meets those criteria. Indeed, the Secretary of State recognised that my constituency has what he calls a "reclaimed site" that would be ideal for more investment. I remind the House that that "reclaimed site" was not derelict when the Government came to power. Then, it was the site of a thriving steel mill. Now it is a derelict, open, green field site. The Government's answer to the massive problems of many areas in Britain is to throw money at them.

It is sad to note that the things over which the Government bashed so many local authorities are now at the heart of their suggestions. The money is to be channelled through organisations whose chairmen, on a daily basis, are costing us much more than the people who ran those democratically elected authorities that the Government got rid of not so long ago because they were too expensive.

Why are the Government and the Secretary of State so frightened of local democracy? We have heard unspecified rumours that the Government are punishing local authorities that hampered development. We have heard the rumour that the only way to get development is to remove any opportunity from local government and put it into non-elected, non-accountable bodies. What does that mean for areas such as north-west Durham? I do not believe that even the Government could say that the local authorities in north-west Durham came anywhere near the category of hampering those people who wanted to establish private development in their area. They have done as much as any local authority could possibly have done.

It is true that within the Derwentside area over 3,000 jobs have been created since the closure of the steelworks site, but at the same time other jobs have been lost and they have been skilled and full-time jobs. Many of the jobs that have been created are unskilled and part-time. North-west Durham, like many other areas, is an area where there are hundreds of workers willing to change, willing to develop their skills and desperate to make their contribution, but there is no chance now of those people getting the sort of assistance that the Government now recognise is necessary for hope for areas such as that.

The Secretary of State this afternoon accused me of simply knocking the north. I forgive him for that. He does not know me very well. He will know by the end of this Parliament that I fiercely defend the north at every opportunity, but defending and fighting for a future does not mean that I go around with my ears shut and my eyes closed. I cannot develop and open up opportunities for the people who are asking me to so without recognising the depth of their need and the opportunities that they are crying out to be offered and that they are being denied at the moment.

Derwentside district council, which is only one of the district councils that comes within my purview, tells me that this week the Audit Commission said that since 1983 there has been no rise in the amount of money that has been spent on rate-related purposes. But the Audit Commission says that Derwentside, nevertheless, has had an exceptionally difficult task because the grant amount of that rate-related expenditure has been significantly reduced in that time. In a council of increasing unemployment, trying to work with local investors, the Government have been taking away money and have not been enabling it to match its needs, as it sees them and as it knows them. This, then, is the result of the Government's flight from democracy, the result of their failure to listen to the people of the north.

When the Secretary of State visited Derwentside last week, he did not meet and talk to those people who have managed to gain the support of the local electorate. He met those people who have signally failed to get the support of the local people. He met his Conservative colleagues. I do not believe that his colleagues in the north represent any real voice and any real thing that the Government should be listening to. If they are going to listen to them, they have got to listen also to the people who have been elected by the people of the north to represent them. With no democratic accountability, with no democratic planning and with no control from any elected body, the money that is being put in will not, I am very sad to say, create the necessary jobs.

I wish that I could believe that the proposal before us this evening will create jobs. It will not work, but not because we will not co-operate. People in the north have demonstrated over generations and to the Government that we will work with them, whatever their proposals are, in whatever way we can, to improve opportunities for our folk. But we know that Government appointees, like colonial administrators, do not know the skills and the capacities of local people. It will not work because the Government have not learned to listen even to people such as Lord Scarman, who argued this week for a much closer partnership between local government and central Government in these necessary interventions in the markets. Such a partnership would mean that central Government might understand a little more about what they were doing in those localities, from which they seem to be so very far removed. All that may seem immaterial to the Government because they have demonstrated that they simply have no idea of the part that local democracy can and must play in economic regeneration.

Given the Government's distaste for local democracy, the people of the north can only look on in horror as a Secretary of State who has destroyed local government is now put in charge of economic regeneration also. We are desperately afraid that new failures will follow old failures. We once again urge the Government to recognise that we will co-operate, but that if we do so they must listen to what the elected people of the north are saying.

Mr. Trippier: I am anxious to begin my reply to the debate by paying a warm tribute to the hon. Member for Bow and Poplar (Ms. Gordon), who made her maiden speech this evening. Obviously, my colleagues on both sides of the House will welcome her future interventions. I especially welcome the fact that she paid tribute to Ian Mikardo, her predecessor. I do not suppose that I would ever agree politically with Ian on many issues, but there is one exception—small firms. He was an expert in that area. In my former incarnation as the Minister responsible for small firms, I enjoyed many exchanges with him on the Floor of the House. He was the chairman of the Tower Hamlets local enterprise agency—a post that he filled with distinction. He spoke with great authority about small firms and he supported many of the measures introduced by this Government, especially the local enterprise agency grant scheme—which I introduced—which was a bipartisan measure that drew support from many political parties.

I was interested to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) make a point that I thought was absolutely true—that support for urban development corporations was coming from many people in different political parties at both local and national level. At least, I thought that to be true until I heard the speech by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes). I refer him to a statement made by his hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith):

"The alliance believes that UDCs can do a very useful job. We shall seek to work closely with them."

The then Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) intervened, and asked:

"Is the hon. Gentleman giving us a clear and unequivocal pledge that the urban development corporations will be supported, after the next election, by the alliance?"

The hon. Gentleman replied:

"Yes. The Minister may have that pledge."—[Official Report, Sixth Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. 12 May 1987; c. 10-13.]

Mr. Simon Hughes rose—

Mr. Trippier: I am sorry, but I do not have the time to give way. I have only eight minutes to reply. We know that the alliance—if there is such a thing—has difficulties at the moment, but the hon. Gentleman should get to grips with his hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed on this matter. I also suggest to Opposition Members who have spoken, especially the hon. Member for Bootle (Mr. Roberts), that they confer with the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) who said:

"The Opposition believe that corporations and boards can be an effective machinery for action, and that setting them up is not an attack on local government, as some people would suggest . . . We hope that the urban development corporation will be a success." — [Official Report, Sixth Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c. 21 January 1987; c. 9-10.]

That is absolutely amazing. We cannot believe that those hon. Members could have said that and, prior to a general election which they must have suspected, in their wildest dreams, was looming. Of course, it has come and gone and, fortunately for us, we have been returned with a significant majority to carry on with our good work with urban development corporations.

I was fascinated by the speech of the hon. Member for Bootle. He kept on referring to the council, by which I assume that he meant the former Labour council — [Interruption.] We are all aware of where the hon. Gentleman's constituency is, and that he was talking about Liverpool council.

Mr. Roberts: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Trippier: The hon. Gentleman has had an opportunity to address the House.

Mr. Roberts: The Minister should not misrepresent me.

Mr. Trippier: Would I ever do that?

We heard no criticism of the former Liverpool council, but I do not think that the vast majority of Labour Members would wish to be associated with that council.

The hon. Gentleman referred disparagingly to the Albert Dock. He did not refer to the 2 million people who visit that area bringing with them more money that can be spent in Liverpool and which is creating more jobs.

Most important of all, the hon. Gentleman failed to mention the substantial rate increases that have driven industry out of Liverpool.

Mr. Roberts rose——

Mr. Trippier: My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington made that point with regard to a number of local authorities in the north-east. It is true that that is the greatest disincentive to the growth of enterprise; it acts as a brake on enterprise. It is clear from all that we have done with the UDCs to date that they have been a significant success in this regard.

When the hon. Member for Redcar (Miss Mowlam) intervened in my hon. Friend's speech she referred to the loss of jobs in traditional industries as if, had her party been in Government during that period, it would somehow have been possible to avoid the losses in those traditional industries. Yet no Labour Member has explained why when the last Labour Government were in power unemployment more than doubled. There was a significant loss of jobs in traditional industries, particularly in the north.

Miss Mowlam: I was drawing a comparison between the 45,000 jobs that have been lost in the past eight years and the 6,000 jobs that are promised by the UDC.

Mr. Trippier: The situation would have been far worse had there not been that kind of impetus from UDCs in the areas that we are discussing.

Matters are improving, with unemployment gradually coming down. Obviously it is not declining fast enough and we recognise that it is an unacceptable level of unemployment, but we should be on the same side in trying to stimulate growth in the number of jobs and the expansion of wealth in these areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Darlington made an important point about the north-east with which I agree. He said that blanket regional aid for the north-east was wrong. I do not think that I have ever heard anybody say that before. I have thought about it on a number of occasions and about the fact that 94 per cent. of the population of the north-east live in an assisted area. It is extremely difficult to focus attention on one constituency or travel-to-work area and attract people from outside that area to it if 94 per cent. of the population are living in an assisted area. What can one do to target aid? When I think of the five different instruments that we have available through the Department of the Environment with the urban block, including the use of UDCs, the 32 schemes that are available through the Department of Employment and the 64 schemes that are available through the Department of Trade and Industry, it is vitally important for the Government, especially in this Parliament, to target aid more specifically. That is one of our roles and that is what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is asking us to do.

Ms. Armstrong: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Trippier: I am sorry I have only one minute left to wind up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken; he has no time.

It being one and a half hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, THE DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question, pursuant to Standing Order No. 14 (Exempted business).

Question put accordingly

Question agreed to.

Resolved,

That the Urban Development Corporations (Financial Limits) Order 1987, a copy of which was laid before this House on 1st May 1987, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.

DARTFORD-THURROCK CROSSING BILL

Ordered,

That Mr. Terry Dicks, Mr. Den Dover, Mr. Adam Ingram and Mr. Rhodri Morgan be members of the Select Committee on the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill. — [Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

Aldermoor School, Southampton

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lennox-Boyd.]

11.44 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I direct my remarks immediately to my hon. Friend the Minister. Many parents, teachers and school governors are depressed and angry at the events perpetrated by the Hampshire education authority on the Aldermoor first and middle schools, Lordshill, Southampton. I shall give the background to the events.

On 1 April I received a letter saying that the Southampton area advisory committee had, on a resolution, voted to retain both the schools by 12 votes to seven. It had a second vote on the retention of the first school with the nursery school and the vote was 16 to three. It was fairly obvious at that time that the advisory committee was firmly determined to keep the nursery and first school and the middle school. Those votes were sent to the schools sub-committee in Winchester.

I wrote to the chariman of the Hampshire education authority and on 15 April I received a reply:

"The Sub-Committee will receive not only a full report on the urgent problem of empty places . . . it will also receive in very great detail the representations of all those who were consulted, together with the views of the Area Advisory Committee."

The letter then goes on with a little patting on the back. It says:

"the procedures employed by us"—

meaning the Hampshire education authority—

"for consultation about school reorganisations were recently commended by the Audit Commission and I think it would be fair to say that no Committee spends more time and trouble than we do over these difficult matters."

That was dictated by P. D. Merridale and signed in his absence. It is that sort of approach that has given rise to the main complaint from the parents, teachers and governors.

The consultation has been scarce. The sub-committee's visit to the eight schools in the area was cursory. "Cursory" was the word mentioned by some of the teachers at Aldermoor school. We have now reached a situation where the sub-committee in Winchester — it was approved by the full committee — agreed that not only should the first and middle schools be closed but the nursery school should operate on its own. I am aware that the nursery school is a valuable element in the area but it seemed to me at the time that it would have worked better within the nursery-first school concept. Therefore, a great deal of emotion was stirred up.

One of the stumbling blocks of the argument was the state of the school buildings. The parents paid for a survey to be carried out by a well-known firm of chartered architects in Southampton — Gutteridge, Woodford, Chambers, of 45 Westwood road. The architects did a survey because the survey carried out by the architect's department at Southampton city council for Hampshire education authority was so condemning. The survey was the result of three separate visits to the site. Several floor panels were lifted where access was formed for electrical and heating services, sub-floors inspected, cladding was removed to reveal the steel frame of the main building and so on.

It was a full survey and one of the disappointing factors, which shows how Hampshire education authority has behaved in connection with this school, is that the survey said:

"It is understood that no maintenance had been carried out on external decorations for at least eight years. In the circumstances it is surprising that the condition of the existing building is as good as a more close inspection found.

The main buildings are constructed of steel lattice roof trusses . . . partly supported on steel columns".

They were found to be in very good condition. The timber framing was also in excellent condition.

"Windows are recent steel windows, weather stripped in wood sub-frames.

Rainwater pipes are cast iron with cast iron . . . gutters."

Comments on the findings by Southampton city council were made by this firm of chartered architects. The firm said:

"There is no significant sign of rot despite lack of maintenance. The condition of the cladding is remarkable, and this indicates the quality of material used in the original building".

The firm again mentions that regular maintenance had ceased eight years before, praises the steel trusses in connection with the pitched roofs and says that they were excellent. The firm also found that the city council report spoke about areas of wet rot or dry rot. The firm said: "no evidence so far can be found of significant areas of wet rot, and there was no evidence of dry rot in the building."

A paragraph that is terribly damning of the Southampton city council architect's report says:

"It is our contention that the Southampton City Council's report is misleading in this matter."

The architects' conclusion says:

"It is our opinion that a decision to close the Aldermoor Schools cannot be justified on the grounds that the main buildings have reached the end of their useful life, or that it requires a large amount of finance to maintain its existence for another thirty years."

During the survey, the firm brought forward some estimated budget costs for preserving the main building for another 30 years. The cost survey was carried out by a firm of chartered quantity surveyors, Jung and Barnett, and the total was £153,650. At the time that that report was written, Hampshire education committee was reading a report which said it would cost £500,000 just to preserve the first school and an additional £700,000 to preserve the middle school.

Naturally, the staff at Aldermoor have been greatly involved in this. It has been a school since 1939 and is very much a part of an established community — almost a village within a city. Aldermoor has the most stable school population of the four schools in the immediate area. There is a tremendous amount of parental involvement in Aldermoor. The parents engage in normal fund raising, but in their own time they also built and furnished a library for the first school. Those are the sort of activities that we are looking for in education.

I am worried because Hampshire education committee is now saying that there are plenty of vacancies around the area and that these children, certainly the children from the first school, can go to other schools. I have a letter from the governors of one of the nearest schools, the Shirley Warren county first school, which says precisely the opposite:

"The Governors . . . view these proposals with dismay . . . The LEA has assessed the capacity of the school at 264 places. This figure is considered to be much too high. Classrooms are small: in order to place such a number of pupils, the music room would be lost — to serve as a classroom . . . Toilet facilities and playground space would be inadequate for this number of pupils. It would appear that the LEA has failed to take account of residential building development within the present catchment area."

The idea that the Shirley Warrren first school will take a great number of these pupils is pie in the sky. The governors say that they "are of the opinion that the LEA's proposals, as at present formulated, would have a profoundly damaging effect upon the school and they urge most strongly, that you, sir, should require the LEA to exclude the Shirley Warren First School from the scheme."

That is a group of governers in a nearby school that is expected to take up a number of pupils that will be turned out of Aldermoor first school.

The main questions are these. Are the buildings suitable? Can they be refurbished for a reasonable sum? Can the first school remain with the nursery school, or will the Hampshire education authority, when it completely reviews the situation, as I hope it will, agree that the main school can stay? The suspicion, perhaps not in my mind but in the minds of many of the parents, is that as this is a valuable 11-acre site in a desirable residential area, adjacent to a hypermarket, the school is being forced to close. I am sure that that is wrong, but I make the suggestion that if a first school is kept with a nursery school in the main buildings, a certain amount of land would be available for development.

I have had assistance from the department of management and science at Southampton university, which has done research on educational statistics in the Southampton area. It has made a damning report on the way in which the Hampshire education authority has worked out the number of vacancies in the area. The local education authority argued that in 1991 the rolls will be lower in the Coxford area than they are now. The statistical evidence presented by the LEA and the sources used by the local authority are inappropriate in this case. The forecast of a large fall in rolls does not stand examination. None of the statistical tools available to the authority can be used to forecast the number of pupils that schools in Coxford will have in five years' time.

There are large population movements within the area, with families with small children replacing those with children who have grown up. Many council houses have been sold in the area. People are moving into low-cost first homes for the young, who naturally wish to produce a young family. The only way that I can see that the area would have a fall in rolls would be if it were given over entirely to old age pensioner accommodation, and this is not possible under the present situation at Lordshill.

A statement was made by Mr. Molinero, a lecturer in the department of management and science at Southampton university. He has researched the educational statistics, and says:

"I find this whole episode rather depressing. The LEA could have argued from the beginning that on the current budget it could not afford to run so many schools so close to each other and that they were proposing to close the one on the most valuable site. They did not have to invent facts that turned out to be wrong; and once proven wrong they should have changed their arguments. As far as I am aware the LEA is pushing for closure irrespective of the facts; nothing has been changed in the original document. I do not understand what is meant by "consultation" if everything that the consultation produces is ignored. The closure of the school will be an insult to the parents, the local community, and to all of us who would like to see proper local democracy at work."

That is a damning piece of paper. It was written by someone who certainly does not have any children at Aldesmoor school and who is not emotionally involved.

That statement shows that there are many anomalies. The first anomaly relates to the number of children and the vacancies in the area. Also, the method by which the figures were obtained seems to be more guesstimate than anything else. The figures completely overlook the residential side of the catchment area and how that is changing, with more and more children. An architects' report condemned the original report from the Southampton city council. I will not say that that council report was wrong, but it did not compare with the report from the chartered surveyors and architects who produced the final report.

I have a complete copy of the final report, and I know that my hon. Friend will be pleased to receive a copy of it. It contains many photographs of the buildings and a description by a firm called Insite (Southern) Ltd. on all the infestation and fungal decay and the possible reasons why a building should be pulled down. The report gives the main buildings a complete and clear picture and states that it is perfectly possible to retain the main building for a further 30 year life.

As my hon. Friend the Minister will probably know, the site is unusual. The building is one storey but is most attractively laid out. The parent-teacher association has laid out an area for environmental studies. A fountain has been built and the PTA has put together a library for the school. There are many community facilities and 30 volunteer parents work in the school every day. There is a very strong community feeling.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science has already said that he would not close rural schools unnecessarily, as they are a great focal point for community facilities. This is one such school. I know that there will be difficulties. I have already incurred the wrath of the chairman of the Hampshire education authority. It has gone ahead with its decision with little consultation. It is almost illegal to rush forward without massive consultation. So far, it has not even issued the notices, although the matter has been going on for some months. When the notices are served—as I am sure they will be, as Hampshire is digging in its heels—it will not admit that it has made a mistake in this matter.

I offer a halfway house. The council can preserve the nursery school and the first school. If it must take the land and playing fields, so be it. As for the middle school, perhaps there are vacancies in the not-too-distant areas of that part of Southampton. However, I do not think that we can stand by and allow it to close and become a small nursery site.

The parents, teachers and governors would not forgive me if I did not state their case. They are extremely angry. Perhaps they have not been their own best advocates, because at times they have acted in a more militant manner than has been necessary. I am sure that if the appropriate notices are served and there are three months in which to raise objections—I hope that everyone in Southampton who has written to me or said a word against the closure will write to the Secretary of State—my right hon. Friend will respond to a request from me to receive a delegation of all concerned so that the issue can be examined in detail. There are some anomalies and the professionals do not agree. I am sure that, with a little consideration, the chairman of the Hampshire education authority will at least reconsider the matter.

12.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Bob Dunn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill) on obtaining this Adjournment debate on the proposed changes to first and middle schools in the Aldermoor and Lord's Hill areas in his constituency. I am aware that this is an issue which is currently stimulating a great deal of local interest and discussion.

We all know that the education system faces considerable challenges in the late 1980s and the 1990s. The prime challenge is the need to improve standards of achievement on the part of all pupils of all abilities, to improve the quality and range of the curriculum and the effectiveness of its delivery and to secure the best possible return from the resources which are found for education. For many schools, internal changes in the organisation of classes or the distribution of teaching duties will be needed. For some, such changes will not be sufficient and action involving closures and amalgamations will have to be considered.

Full account must be taken of education considerations when planning changes. New arrangements need to offer an education better suited to the needs of pupils of all abilities than the ones they replace. The viability of a school does not depend solely on the number of pupils. It depends on the age range and character of the school, its ethos, the quality and balance of expertise of its teachers and its non-teacher support, links with neighbouring schools, the fitness for purpose of its building and the extent to which all of these can be maintained.

Perhaps I should explain the standard set of procedures which comes into play when a local education authority wishes to change the organisation or pattern of provision in its schools. These procedures are laid down by sections 12 to 16 of the Education Act 1980. My Department has recently issued a circular entitled "Providing for Quality", which provides up-to-date guidance on the requirements of the Act. Briefly, the requirements are that when a local education authority or, in certain circumstances, the providers of a voluntary school wish to establish, discontinue or alter the size or character of a school they must publish proposals explaining their intentions. During the two-month period following publication, it is open to interested parties to submit objections to the proposals. If such objections are made, or if the Secretary of State has given appropriate notice to the local education authority, or if the school concerned is a voluntary school, the proposals fall to the Secretary of State to decide and may not be implemented without his approval.

I should also mention that, although it is not a requirement of the Act, it has been established in the courts that those likely to be affected by the proposals have a legitimate expectation to be consulted before such proposals are made. I am advised that the Hampshire local education authority recently completed local consultations and that the outcome of these was put before the education committee in April. The LEA is now preparing statutory notices for publications in the near future.

As my hon. Friend knows, when the Secretary of State is deciding proposals to close or alter a school, he is under a general duty to act fairly. In other words, he must judge each proposal or set of proposals on its merits, taking into account both the arguments of those making the proposals and the views of those objecting to them.

My hon. Friend will, I am sure, understand that it is important for the Secretary of State to avoid prejudging the issues where such proposals are concerned. He will not, therefore, expect me to say anything about the reorganisation which is the subject of this debate. I hope, however, that he will accept my assurance that I have listened carefully to what has been said tonight, and that his points will be taken into account, along with any other representations which we may receive, before a decision is reached on any proposals which may come to my right hon. Friend.

I assure my hon. Friend that as, if and when, proposals which affect these schools are made, I shall be most happy to receive a deputation from those schools led by him. I thank him for initiating this important debate and I look forward to receiving representations from him on this issue.

Question put and agreed to.

PRISON DISTURBANCES

Oral Answers to Questions

HOME DEPARTMENT

Birmingham Pub Bombings

1. Mr. Mullin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of the west midlands as to why west midlands police officers have been taking statements regarding the case of the Birmingham pub bombings when this inquiry has been placed in the hands of the Devon and Cornwall police; and if he will make a statement.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I am assured by the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall that all inquiries and interviews carried out in the course of the investigation of the allegations by the former west midlands police officer Thomas Clarke have been conducted by officers of his force.

I understand from the Director of Public Prosecutions that officers of the West Midlands police have conducted certain inquiries on his behalf in connection with the appeal by the six men convicted of the bombings. These inquiries have no connection with those on which the chief constable of Devon and Cornwall will be reporting to me.

Mr. Mullin: Is the Home Secretary aware that there is grave disquiet about the way in which the inquiry is being conducted? I include in that the inquiry that is being conducted by the Devon and Cornwall police. Does he agree that the West Midlands police force is probably the force least qualified in the whole country to be involved in the investigations? Does he further agree that it is the job of the Court of Appeal, not the police, to determine whether witnesses are telling the truth?

Mr. Hurd: I shall not enter on that ground in a case that has been referred by me to the Court of Appeal. I have seen nothing that in any way justifies the allegations and insinuations that the hon. Gentleman has made.

Dame Jill Knight: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the convention of the House, that Members of Parliament mind their own constituency business and do not intervene in matters relating to other hon. Members' constituencies? Will he also recognise that the Birmingham pub bombings have a great deal more relevance to the west midlands than to Sunderland, South?

Mr. Hurd: That is not a matter for me. However, I must say that I have been very disturbed by press reports of what the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) is reported to have said in Dublin, where he described these people as political prisoners and cast doubts on the whole process of reference to the Court of Appeal. He misled those who were listening to him in Ireland, and brought no credit upon himself.

Mr. Alton: In retrospect, does the Home Secretary agree that if the impartiality of the case could have been safeguarded by the Police Complaints Authority there would have been greater public confidence? Does he further agree that if the Maguire and Guildford cases had been referred to the Court of Appeal the extradition agreements would now have been agreed and implemented by the Republic of Ireland?

Mr. Hurd: I cannot allow that sort of consideration to influence my decision whether to refer matters to the Court of Appeal. I decided in January to refer the Birmingham case to the Court of Appeal for reasons that I stated to the House at the time. At the same time, I explained why I had not decided to refer the Guildford, Woolwich and Maguire cases. Since then, there has been a suggestion of fresh matter in the case of the Guildford bombings. There was a television programme, and we are trying to get hold of what Mrs. Fox, who appeared on the programme, is supposed to have said. There has been some difficulty in getting hold of her statement. That has slowed things down and made it more difficult for me to consider whether there is any new matter of substance that will justify referral of the Guildford case.

Sentencing Policy

2. Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received seeking powers to grant jurisdiction to the Court of Appeal to increase sentences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have not received any representations so far this Session, but, as I said during the debate on the Loyal Address, the Government are considering how to strengthen clause 38, as it now is, of the Criminal Justice Bill.

Mr. Hind: Will my right hon. Friend bear in mind that there is a great deal of disquiet among the general public about the fact that convicted criminals receiving unnecessarily lenient sentences are benefiting from a miscarriage of justice in the courts? Will he look carefully at the advice being given by the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lane, and also by Lord Denning? Their recommendation is to allow the prosecution to have the right of appeal and also to give the Court of Appeal the right to increase sentences that it regards as being manifestly lenient. That would settle many of the public feelings of disquiet.

Mr. Hurd: I have read Lord Lane's speech and discussed it with him. I bear in mind the points that my hon. Friend made when the previous Bill was before the House, and the points that were made in another place. We are taking all those into account and considering, as I made clear in my speech on the Loyal Address, how to strengthen clause 38 of the present Bill.

Mr. Andrew MacKay: Does my right hon. Friend agree that most people in Britain would say that it is eminently fair that if somebody can appeal against a sentence that appears to be harsh, the prosecution should equally be allowed to appeal against an over-lenient sentence?

Mr. Hurd: Yes, I think that many people would regard that as fair. It is quite a revolution in what the prosecution in this country has traditionally been about. I have never regarded this as a matter of principle. I think that there have been substantial practical difficulties about putting this new responsibiity on the Crown Prosecution Service within months of its birth. We have discussed this point in the House. I ask my hon. Friend to be patient and to wait and see how we strengthen clause 38 to meet the kind of considerations and anxieties that he has expressed.

Ms. Clare Short: Does the Home Secretary agree that as the British prison system is dreadfully overcrowded with large numbers of prisoners who have never been convicted of any offence of violence of any kind, the way to solve the problem is not overwhelmingly to increase light sentences for serious offences, but to reduce sentences for many of the most trivial offences? Will he tell the House what action he proposes to take about that?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that the hon. Lady is correct, because she poses one problem in dismissing another. The problem of public anxiety to which my hon. Friends have been drawing attention is very real. The actual level of sentencing for crimes such as rape and robbery has been steadily increasing, but public confidence in the system is shaped by the occasional sentence that appears to be wayward in a lenient direction. I do not think that there is an enormous number of such sentences, but perhaps they attract disproportionate publicity. However, there is no doubt about the shock to confidence in the system when they occur.

Mr. Lawrence: Will my right hon. Friend take account of the substantial strength of feeling in the legal profession against giving the Court of Appeal the right to increase sentences? That strength of feeling arises not only because of the resource implications, but because of the alterations in the principles which have traditionally always been applied in our law to stop an accused person being subjected to double jeopardy.

Mr. Hurd: As I said earlier, and as my hon. and learned Friend's intervention again illustrates, this would amount to a considerable revolution in what the prosecution in this country has always been about. I ask my hon. and learned Friend and other hon. Members to wait a little. I hope that when we come forward with our proposal on this matter he will find it reasonable.

Mr. Hattersley: The Home Secretary referred to sentences that were wayward in the direction of leniency. Does he regard the provisions of the Criminal Justice Bill as being appropriate for sentencing for insider dealing on the stock exchange?

Mr. Hurd: I welcome the right hon. Gentleman back to his old pastures. I hope that our dealings across the Floor of the House will be reasonable and constructive. The right hon. Gentleman has imported a question from his last portfolio, which is a little unfair. He will be aware that it is only under this Government that insider dealing has been made an offence.

Late Licences and Amusement Arcades

3. Mrs. Mahon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with chief constables about the effect on the maintenance of law and order of (a) the number of late licenses granted and (b) the number of amusement arcades operating.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): Discussions about amusement arcades were held with officers of the Metropolitan police in November of last year. We have recently asked the Association of Chief Police Officers for information on its experience of amusement arcades as part of our review of the adequacy of the law. The Department is working with the police and others on a number of initiatives to reduce problems associated with licensed premises generally.

Mrs. Mahon: Does the Minister agree that there appears to be a correlation between the increased granting of late-night licences and violence on the street? Does he further agree that amusement arcades are good only for profiteers? They reflect the values of our society and lead to truancy and increased child gambling, which is a phenomenon that is to be abhorred. Will the Minister give local authorities more control over the granting of licences for amusement arcades?

Mr. Hogg: As to amusement arcades, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has anticipated the concern of the hon. Lady. She will recall that on 6 May my right hon. Friend announced a research programme designed to determine the extent of the use of arcades by young persons and whether that use is addictive and results in criminal or anti-social activity. When we have received the results of that research we will be in a better position to judge whether it is necessary or desirable to legislate.

Dr. Hampson: Does my hon. Friend agree that a related temptation for the younger age group is the increasing availability of lethal weapons? I have a constituent whose 13-year-old son had posted to his school a horrendous knife with a 10-in blade. The young people who are faced with these temptations are buying these weapons at low prices. This must be a contributory factor to the increasing violence and damage that is being carried out by this age group.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend has raised a serious point, about which Ministers are extremely concerned. We should like to come to the House with proposals as soon as we reasonably can.

Miss Lestor: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that one or two organisations, particularly the Spectrum Children's Trust, have already done some work on what is happening in amusement arcades. That shows that a growing number of children are playing truant from school in order to participate in these activities. Gambling is addictive among young people and many are in moral danger as the hours of opening increase. When the hon. Gentleman receives the results of the research, I hope that he will report quickly and look at those two aspects of the problem.

Mr. Hogg: I am aware that that view is held by many reasonably-minded people. That is exactly why the programme of research has been commissioned. When we have received the report we will be in a better position to judge whether we should legislate. I am against the concept of a nanny state, and I do not contemplate legislation being introduced unless I consider it to be desirable.

Crime Statistics

4. Mr. Patnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what figures he has available which allow a comparison to be made between the levels of serious violent crime in England and Wales, France and Germany.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): International crime statistics are published periodically by Interpol. As my right hon. Friend said on 30 June, the latest figures show that there were fewer than two homicides per 100,000 population in England and Wales in 1984. The figures for France and West Germany were twice as high.

Mr. Patnick: I thank my hon. Friend for that information. I do not wish to sound complacent, but it proves that it is contrary to the widely-held belief. Can my hon. Friend comment on the figures for petty crime, such as car thefts, break-ins and similar crimes, and, if so, will he elaborate?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is right to say that the vast majority of crimes that inflate crime figures in this country are eminently avoidable. For example, 25 per cent. of indictable crime in this country is theft of or from cars, and about 20 per cent. of that takes place when cars are left unlocked.

Mr. Duffy: Is the Minister aware that in Sheffield, parts of which the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) and I represent, city centre pubs have been operating a system of early warning for the past five years in an attempt to stem the increase in violence? In spite of that, pub landlords and managers now face a dramatic increase in assaults. How will the Minister respond to the call of the vice president of the local Licensed Victuallers Association for harsher penalties?

Mr. Patten: I understand that it is a problem for inner-city pubs. I heard the vice president of the local Licensed Victuallers Association, to whom the hon. Gentleman referred, on the "Today" programme recently making that very point. It is an inner-city problem and it is best dealt with largely by prevention and warning.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Has my hon. Friend any comparisons on statistics for street crimes between this country and France and Germany, especially in view of the new crime that appears to be gaining prevalence in south London, called steaming, where gangs of 30 of more attack people on buses and in shops and rob everybody in sight?

Mr. Patten: I do not have the figures on street crime at my fingertips because the lock on my Red Box jammed and it was only with the help of the policeman behind the Chair and a screwdriver that I was able to open it for 2.30 pm. I shall write to my hon. Friend with those details. I know that one of the main aims of the Metropolitan police force is to stamp out as vigorously as possible those forms of violent crime, and the courts have available an equally vigorous range of penalties to punish those who are convicted.

Mr. Corbett: I welcome the Minister to his new job. Will he confirm that in the matter of non-violent crime England and Wales are somewhere near the top of the international league? For example, does he know that there is a burglary every 34 seconds and an act of theft or of handling stolen goods every 16 seconds? What is he going to do about that?

Mr. Patten: I must begin by reciprocating the welcome. I am delighted to congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his important post. I had not read about it. I hope that we have the same — [Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is indicating that it may be only temporary.

It is undoubtedly the case that the majority of crime in this country lends itself not to police detection but to public prevention. Indeed, about 20 per cent. of all burglaries take place in houses which have unlocked doors or unfastened windows.

Mr. Favell: Is it not high time that we introduced legislation to prevent the sale of knives to under 18-year-olds? Does my hon. Friend recall that at one time there was great concern about the sale and use of flick-knives? That was abolished with great success. We cannot sell cigarettes to under 16-year-olds, we cannot sell liquor to under 18-year-olds, so why should they be able to buy knives?

Mr. Patten: I appreciate my hon. Friend's strong concern, which I know is shared on both sides of the House. It is something that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is considering at the moment.

Public Places (Safety)

5. Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to review the operation of existing legislation regarding safety at sports grounds and other public places; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Parts II, III and IV of the Fire Safety and Safety of Places of Sport Act 1987, which received Royal Assent on 15 May, amend the existing legislation for spectator safety at sports grounds and the licensing legislation for indoor premises. There are no plans for a further review.

Mr. Canavan: Is the Minister able to reply to the submissions that have been sent to the Home Office by myself and others about the need for a public safety information Bill in view of the considered opinion of various experienced people and organisations that tragedies such as the Bradford football fire and the Herald of Free Enterprise disaster might have been avoided if the public had a statutory right of access to information on matters of public safety or the lack of it?

Mr. Hogg: I have not yet seen the letter written by the hon. Gentleman. The Government are committed to improving safety standards, and the Act, to which I have already referred, greatly improves the standards of safety that the public are entitled to expect at sports grounds. Under that Act, local authorities have greatly increased powers to inspect and control. As the hon. Gentleman will know, a whole range of stands have now been brought within control, whereas previously they were not.

Mr. Marlow: Would not sports grounds and other public places be somewhat safer if the Government would consider introducing a modern version of the stocks and pillories for football hooligans and other types of vandals who make life hell in our inner cities?

Mr. Hogg: That is the sort of humorous suggestion that I have learnt to expect from my hon. Friend.

Crime Statistics

7. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many notifiable offences were committed during the last month for which figures are available; and what increase this represents compared with the position 10 years earlier.

Mr. John Patten: There were 951,000 notifiable offences recorded by the police in the first quarter of 1987. The number in the first quarter of 1977 was 614,500. This represents an average annual increase of 4·5 per cent.

Mr. Hardy: Does the Minister agree that those very serious figures do not represent the full picture? Does he accept that an increasing number of crimes are not reported which 10 years ago would have been reported? As the Home Office is given to establishing research programmes for a variety of activities, will the Minister institute a research inquiry into the incidence of non-reporting of offences that the police should certainly know about?

Mr. Patten: The Home Office is doing that all the time. With respect, the hon. Gentleman is wrong. The incidence of reported crime has been rising, not falling. Through insurance, consultation with the police and better prevention, we are undoubtedly helping the situation. The hon. Gentleman is held in great respect in the House and in the Labour movement. If he would talk to Labour local authorities which publish material such as "Police Watch" in Manchester and "Policing London" in the metropolitan area which do such damage to public confidence in the police, he would help a great deal more.

Mr. Wheeler: Does my hon. Friend agree that opportunist crime has grown exactly in line with the growth in the availability of goods, money and property to steal? That is 96 per cent. of the crime problem. Does he also agree that there is, indeed, under-reporting, that crime will not be prevented by police patrols on the street, but that it will be stopped by the public working with the police, local authorities and other agencies to prevent it?

Mr. Patten: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the facts and figures. He is also right that so much crime is preventable, especially small-scale burglaries. As he is a London Member, I put it to him that many London local authorities, rather than having nuclear-free or anti-police zones, should try to set up crime prevention zones.

Mr. Chris Smith: In the light of the alarmingly increased figures that the Minister has given, even for reported crime, what real commitment do the Government have to improving crime prevention and what real resources do they intend to put into local authorities to enable them to improve street lighting to make neighbourhoods and estates safer and to carry out the real work of crime prevention that the Government have so far neglected?

Mr. Patten: Alas and alack, many London Labour-controlled authorities are the last places where we would consider putting extra resources for work of this kind. They spend the resources that they have on publishing periodicals such as "Policing London" and seek to damage police and public relations. Since the Government came to power, neighbourhood watch schemes in England and Wales have increased by 35,000. We also have crime prevention panels. The Government are committed to crime prevention.

Sir Bernard Braine: In view of the known connection between alcohol abuse and the rising tide of crime, what steps are being taken to reduce the huge increase in illegal under-age drinking in public houses?

Mr. Patten: With respect, there is no clear evidence of the connection that my right hon. Friend suggests. Nevertheless, there is clear evidence of problems of alcohol abuse. My Department and the Department of Health and Social Security are looking into this all the time.

Mr. Hattersley: As the Minister is clearly anxious to make this into a political issue, and as the Government refuse to accept that the increased crime rate is the product of unemployment and deprivation, to what does he attribute the rise in crime in the past eight years, which has been far faster than anywhere else in the Western world.

Mr. Patten: Crime has been rising all over Western Europe for the past 30 years. The rate of growth in this country is considerably less than in France, for example, and very much less than in other countries, such as Spain. One has only to consider a couple of randomly chosen periods. Between 1974 and 1979 violent crime was about 49 per cent. Between 1979 and 1986 it was only 32 per cent.

The measures taken by the Government are beginning to work successfully on some elements of the increase in crime.

Mr. Alton: Given, as the Minister has said, that burglaries and break-ins form the largest category of crime and are certainly what the public are most worried about, does he agree that what is needed is not merely the extension of neighbourhood watch schemes, but more policemen on the beat? What is being done to study the relationship between drug abuse among many young people and the number of burglaries and break-ins undertaken by people who steal to feed their addiction?

Mr. Patten: The police are constantly looking at that connection, just as there are more and more police on the beat taking their important share of preventive work in society. The police, however many there were, could never possibly attempt to prevent all crime. It requires public co-operation and co-operation from everyone who wishes to see crime rates reduced.

Child Abuse

8. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action has been taken by his Department to prevent child abuse and to improve the chances of the prosecution and conviction of those guilty of this crime.

Mr. Hurd: We have been running a "Stranger Danger" campaign for several years, and await the advice of an independent working group on further publicity measures against child sex abuse. A group of experts is preparing draft guidance to the police on the investigation of these offences. The Criminal Justice Bill would permit children's evidence to be given at the Crown court by live video link. I have asked for comment on whether video recordings should be more readily admissible in evidence.

Mr. Knight: Does my right hon. Friend agree that whenever there is an allegation of child abuse the police should be able to obtain a medical report on the child concerned so that they can decide whether to prosecute? Does he further agree that any attempt to prevent the police from so doing is to be deplored? Furthermore, is there not a clear case for substantially increasing the penalties available to the courts in cases of child neglect and for tightening the parole conditions on those convicted of child abuse?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right on the first point. This would clearly fall within the scope of the inquiry which my hon. Friend the Minister for Health announced last week. There was a real problem in Cleveland on this point, which I have discussed with the chief constable. I believe that the disagreement about the local guidelines there has now been sorted out. My hon. Friend is right on the second point. One of the changes that we propose to introduce in the new Criminal Justice Bill is to increase from two years to 10 the maximum term of imprisonment for neglect of a child. Many cases involve more serious charges with more serious penalties, but even where it is only a question of neglect, we believe that the maximum should be increased.

Mr. Madden: Does the Home Secretary have any information about High Court injunctions issued against the parents of children who are alleged to be victims of abuse, forbidding parents from communicating with anyone, including lawyers and doctors, about the circumstances of their case? Will he make urgent inquiries into this matter, and does he agree that if such injunctions have been issued they are wholly unacceptable?

Mr. Hurd: I do not think that this is a matter strictly for me, but if the hon. Gentleman would like to point my inquiries in a particular direction, that is if he will give me particulars of what he has heard, I shall ensure that the matter is properly investigated.

Sir John Biggs-Davison: While public concern is fully justified, does my right hon. Friend know whether, or have the impression that, there is more of this than there was in the past?

Mr. Hurd: It is hard to say and any impression must be subjective. The number of reported cases has obviously increased sharply, but, equally obviously, as society becomes more receptive to these stories, the proportion of abuses reported is likely to increase. It is difficult to go beyond that.

Ms. Clare Short: Is the Home Secretary aware that when a child who has been sexually abused in its family is then removed from the family it causes the child more distress? A better alternative would be for a power to exist which requires the abusing male to be removed from the family. In his review of child law, will he look into this possibility, which already exists in many states in the United States of America?

Mr. Hurd: I shall certainly ensure that those who are looking into this aspect of the law take that suggestion into account.

Mr. Dickens: Has my right hon. Friend taken on board the fact that the nation is extremely angry about the reported rise in child abuse? Does he agree that Parliament has made adequate sentencing provisions and that our judges are doing a sloppy job in some cases? May I ask him to be cautious about the advice that he receives from the Lord Chief Justice when he shapes the Criminal Justice Bill, because that man has not distinguished himself recently in some of his judgments?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not criticise a judge in this manner.

Mr. Dickens: My criticism was of his judgment, not of the man himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not good enough.

Mr. Dickens: Do you wish me to give the House the reason why I said what I did, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should not waste time. Will he please withdraw his criticism of that judge?

Mr. Dickens: Yes, I withdraw the statement.

Mr. Hurd: May I deal with the less controversial part of my hon. Friend's question? I think that he is being a little too timid. I do not think that Parliament has completed its job in this regard, and that is why we propose to increase the maximum penalty for neglect.

Mr. Kirkwood: If the Home Secretary is really seeking a framework and apparatus to prevent child sex abuse in future, will he, in the course of his continuing child care review, look very carefully at the model in Scotland? The children's panel there allows all the statutory authorities to come together in casework conferences, which really do prevent problems from reaching a stage at which children are sexually abused.

Mr. Hurd: I am sure that the inquiry will take that into account.

Sound and Television Broadcasting

9. Mr. Gale asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for the future financing of sound and television broadcasting, of direct broadcasting by satellite and of cable television in, or received by, the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. Tim Renton): We accept the judgment of the Peacock committee that the BBC should not be financed through advertising and that for the time being the licence fee should remain the principal source of income. Both cable and direct broadcasting by satellite are able to draw on advertising and subscription revenue. We shall consider whether subscription may have a larger part to play in the light of comments on our consultants' report published last week. We shall consider the future of sound broadcasting in the light of responses to our Green Paper.

Mr. Gale: May I congratulate my hon. Friend on the assumption of his new responsibilities for broadcasting?

If subscription payment for broadcast television is to be a realistic possibility, does my hon. Friend agree that that will involve modified television sets? Will his Department therefore take the necessary steps as soon as possible to ensure that all television sets sold in this country after 1990 carry an encription unit?

Mr. Renton: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. I fully understand his enthusiasm for subscription, but I think that it would be right now for us to await the comments on the lengthy independent consultants' report, which we have just published, and which goes into the technical and economic feasibility of subscription.

My hon. Friend will, I am sure, take comfort from the fact that British Satellite Broadcasting is this very afternoon signing contracts with the IBA for three satellite channels. I think that the whole House will want to wish the company every success in this exciting new venture. It has already announced that one of the possibilities that it will be looking into is designing home receivers to pave the way for pay-as-you-view television.

Mr. Cryer: Will the Minister assure the House that any changes in financing will not be used for further attacks by the Government on the BBC? In considering financing, will he give the House an assurance that he will seek to remove the anomalies whereby pensioners in warden-serviced accommodation receive free television licences, but other pensioners do not? The House seeks a common low-cost television licence for all pensioners, who deserve at least that advantage from the Government, as they receive no others.

Mr. Renton: I do not believe that there is any politician in the House who does not think at times that he is the subject of unfair attacks by one broadcasting channel or another. We have looked into the question of concessionary television licences, and we have expanded them to include the mentally handicapped and the disabled. We took these steps to improve the system that was introduced by the last Labour Government. At the moment, we see no way of improving it further.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act

10. Mr. John Townend asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give an estimate of the additional man hours required to deal with the extra paperwork and administration resulting from the Police and Criminal Evidence Act; and if he will estimate the effect on the number of policemen on the beat.

Mr. Hurd: The first estimate cannot be given because we do not know how much time the police spent on record-keeping before the Act came into force. In many cases where the Act imposes a statutory requirement the police were already keeping records in order to avoid arguments and get convictions. In other cases, new recording requirements act as necessary safeguards on the exercise of additional police powers. How many police officers are available for beat patrolling in any area at a particular time obviously depends on many factors and no one could estimate reliably the effect of any one of them.

Mr. Townend: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. At a meeting with local Members of Parliament the chief constable of Humberside said that the requirement to take a verbatim record of all statements was taking up a considerable amount of additional time, that it was putting pressure on police manpower and that it was also making it more difficult to get at the truth, because the cross-questioning of suspects became slower and more tedious, those who were prone to lie had more time to think about what they were saying and therefore it was more difficult to catch them out.

Mr. Hurd: I know of that point, but it is also a fact that in London and Greater Manchester the police forces had already moved to the taking of something like contemporaneous notes, because they had found that, unless they did that, what went on in a police station was afterwards challenged and they were not securing convictions. That was the reasoning that lay behind that provision in the Act. Tape recording is the answer, and as we introduce it steadily throughout the country, as we are doing, it will solve that problem.

Sir Eldon Griffiths: As my right hon. Friend's officials have been unable to provide him with any estimates, why does he not examine the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary? His estimate is that 2,400 man years and £45 million of additional expenditure were required to do the training for the introduction of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act and that there has been a significant reduction in arrests and clear-ups, which the Chief Inspector of Constabulary thinks must be connected with the Police and Criminal Evidence Act. I support the Police and Criminal Evidence Act, but when he considers police manpower I hope that my right hon. Friend will take into account the problems that this legislation has created.

Mr. Hurd: Of course I have read the report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector. It showed that there was a considerable once-for-all training burden on the police. In some rural areas, the need for custody sergeants produces a demand for manpower that I regard as legitimate. I do not accept that record-keeping in police stations is unnecessary. My hon. Friend will have noticed with pleasure that the clear-up rate after the dip last year has begun to improve. It was 5 per cent. up in the first quarter of this year, compared with the first quarter of last year.

Mr. Corbett: As the Home Secretary does not know how much extra work the Police and Criminal Evidence Act has produced, will he undertake to make inquiries of the police to find out? Does he not recall the Opposition warning predicting that, instead of setting out the responsibilities of the citizen and the powers of the police, the Act would turn into no more than a bureaucratic nightmare?

Mr. Hurd: I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can say that when, day after day and night after night, we faced detailed Opposition amendments to increase the paperwork, to increase the bureaucracy and to load on to the police burdens which their representatives and we decided were quite unreasonable. The general election has given the hon. Gentleman amnesia.

Police (Pensions)

11. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to improve the pensions of police widows in cases where such pensions are already in payment.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: In common with all state and public service pensions, police widows' pensions were increased by 2·1 per cent. from 6 April; a further cost of living increase will be due next April.

Mr. Stern: May I gently remind my hon. Friend of the police claim that reserved widows' pensions could not be met because my hon. Friend was fearful of setting a precedent by increasing a pension that was already in payment? I draw his attention to the fact that such increases are now becoming increasingly common in the commercial sector. I hope that he will look again at this matter from the point of view that the public service should not lag behind what is becoming increasingly good practice elsewhere.

Mr. Hogg: I am afraid that I cannot encourage my hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary was very sympathetic, but I am afraid that it was not possible to agree increases of the kind that were suggested. There were essentially two reasons for that. First, to do so would breach a long-standing convention that public sector pensions should not be enhanced retrospectively. Secondly, because there were other groups in comparable situations, the cost of making the concession would be very great indeed.

Data Protection Act

12. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to produce the regulations necessary to give effect to the Data Protection Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We intend to lay the necessary orders immediately Parliament returns after the summer recess.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister not accept that that leaves a very short time for the people who are expected to implement these regulations in November, when the Data Protection Act 1984 provisions take effect? Is he aware that the chairman of the British Medical Association consultants' committee is saying that it might cost as much as £30 for an access fee for people to get access to their medical records? Will he assure the House that the fee levels set by the regulations will not prohibit people from having access to their records because of financial constraints?

Mr. Renton: I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman's first contention. The orders will be laid around about 20 October and there will be plenty of time for them to be debated in the House before they come into force on 11 November. With regard to the hon. Gentleman's question about the fee, my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary told the hon. Member for Leyton (Mr. Cohen) in a written answer on 1 July that we would be announcing the level of the fee very shortly.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Franks asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, before departing for Washington this evening.

Mr. Franks: May I draw the Prime Minister's attention to the latest unemployment figures released today, which show that for the 12th consecutive month the number of people unemployed is dropping? Is it not the case that in relation to the north-west, which shows the second largest drop, in a free and open economy at last the north is showing what it is capable of doing?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I join my hon. Friend in welcoming that latest reduction in unemployment, which is the 12th successive reduction. The north-west is one of the areas that are reducing the level of unemployment fastest. The north-west is also doing very well under this Government's policies of faster growth, privatisation and Trident, which is being built in my hon. Friend's constituency. It is also benefiting from an excellent new hospital in Furness. The north-west is doing very well.

Mr. Kinnock: The Prime Minister said that she would not support any proposals to impose VAT on food, gas or electricity. Why can she not bring herself to give exactly the same precise undertaking on children's clothing and children's shoes?

The Prime Minister: I made it very clear during the election precisely what undertakings I would give. I also made it very clear that although there were certain people in the House, particularly right hon. and hon. Members on the Opposition Benches who wish to constrain the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it is not part of my duty to constrain him in his annual Budget. That takes place only once a year, unlike what happened under the previous Labour Government, when Budgets took place frequently.

Mr. Kinnock: I am sorry, but on the subject of children's clothing and shoes the Prime Minister was anything but clear during the general election. Why does she not say now, in exactly the precise terms that she has used when referring to other items, that she would not have such a proposal coming before the House? Or would she, like the Paymaster General, suggest that such proposals would be vetoed? That is precisely what the Paymaster General said this morning.

The Prime Minister: I have already answered the right hon. Gentleman. He will go on raising scares and we will be able to point out how, on a day when the unemployment figures were down, he tried to raise another scare. [Interruption.] Of course he did.

With regard to the veto, I think the right hon. Gentleman is referring to proposals that have come forward through the European Commission. They are not out in detail, but, as he knows, partly due to our very vigorous fight on the Single European Act, any tax changes can be made only by a unanimous vote. Not only would this Government vote against Lord Cockfield's proposal, but a number of our European partners would do so as well.

Mr. Kinnock: The problem is the move to impose VAT on what are currently zero rated items of considerable importance to the family budget. Does the right hon. Lady agree with the words of the Paymaster General that the Government would

"in fact veto VAT on food, fuel, children's clothing and shoes"

Yes or no?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend the Paymaster General specifically confirmed what I said during the general election campaign, and that was his precise purpose. I am well aware of the words that he used. I am amazed that the right hon. Gentleman does not welcome the fall in unemployment.

Sir Ian Lloyd: My right hon. Friend's chief scientific advisers will doubtless have drawn her attention to the immense significance of the facts reported recently by our embassy in Tokyo, that the Japanese are marketing a 1 megabit semiconductor, are about to market a 4 megabit semi conductor, are designing a 16 megabit semi-conductor and are reaching out to 64. As the issue has now moved into the public domain with the publication in the United States of the defence science task force report on semiconductor dependency, will my right hon. Friend seek to place this issue on the agenda for her discussions with the President of the United States so that the joint response in the West — the Alvey programme and American efforts—can be co-ordinated?

The Prime Minister: I must confess to my hon. Friend that I do not think that that issue will be at the top of my agenda for this visit to the United States, which will be a short one. Other matters will be at the top. My hon. Friend is well aware of the substantial research and development budget that is paid for by the taxpayer, and I know that he is anxious to encourage more research and development expenditure from the private sector.

Q2. Mr. Cohen asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Cohen: Will the Prime Minister reconsider the introduction of a poll tax? Is she aware that in my consituency two adults will pay £1 a week more if it is introduced, that three adults will pay £8 a week more, that four adults will pay £15 a week more and that a single pensioner on supplementary benefit will have to find £1·50 a week more from his pension? For these people and millions of others is it not so much a poll tax as a pole axe?

The Prime Minister: The majority of widows, single people and single parents will pay a good deal less under a community charge. There will be an 80 per cent. rebate and an addition to supplementary benefit to help people pay. Those who will suffer most are those who are suffering most now under the rating system in areas where there are high-spending Labour councils, or those who are living in the London area.

York

Q3. Mr. Gregory asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to make an official visit to York.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Mr. Gregory: While the citizens of York will be disappointed that my right hon. Friend has not yet decided on a date for a return visit, may I ask her to comment on the possibility of further profit-related pay, bearing in mind that in York and the rest of the country about 21,000 companies have decided already to obtain information from the Inland Revenue on how they can implement profit-related pay?

The Prime Minister: I believe that the innovations of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Finance Bill have been widely welcomed. As my hon. Friend has said, many companies are making inquiries about profit-related pay, realising that their work people could benefit substantially if they introduced the system. I hope that advantage will be taken of it.

Mr. Nellist rose——

Mr. Speaker: Does the supplementary question of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) relate to York?

Mr. Nellist: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Had the Prime Minister been making a trip to York, would she have taken the opportunity to explain to low-paid workers there and in other cities how it is that she has now withdrawn her opposition to a 20 per cent. rise in hon. Members' salaries that will take them from £370 a week to £450, while she maintains her opposition to the claim of hundreds of thousands of low-paid Government workers whose average take-home pay is only £3 a week more than the rise that she is prepared to accept for Members of Parliament?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman does not seem to be getting universal support from all those who heard his question.

Mr. David Shaw: As I returned from the United States last weekend I was wondering whether my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Did the hon. Gentleman return via York?

Engagements

Q4. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Bennett: Will the Prime Minister confirm that some families on supplementary benefit will be worse off as a result of the introduction of the poll tax, which replaces rates and water charges?

The Prime Minister: Because the amount that will be added to supplementary benefit or family income support is an average amount, some will be worse off and some will be considerably better off. That is inevitable in an average —some worse, some better.

Sir John Farr: Will my right hon. Friend accept the congratulations of the House on the splendid unemployment figures announced today—[Interruption.]—which have already been referred to? However, will she also consult her colleagues as to the ways in which job creation can be improved in our manufacturing industries? New jobs are very important, but we also want to make a big impact in creating more new jobs in manufacturing industry.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's remarks. Most of the new jobs are coming from economic growth, thanks to the policies of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They are proving extremely good. Manufacturing industry is highly competitive. Its productivity is going up and investment is good. We get more jobs in manufacturing and in small businesses only by turning out goods at prices and with designs that people will buy, and by having highly competitive and efficient industries. Our policies are producing that.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Has the Prime Minister had time to consider the reply given by the Leader of the House to my hon. Friend the Member for Upper Bann (Mr. McCusker) last Thursday? If so, could she make a statement and, particularly, could she confirm that there is forensic evidence to suggest that the same weapon has been used, allegedly, in Loyalist and Republican paramilitary terrorism?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that it is for me to say anything about that kind of evidence. It is not within my responsibility.

Mr. Higgins: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the VAT structure, introduced when we abolished purchase tax and selective employment tax with a single positive rate and zero rating for essential items is better than anything else in Europe, and that if we are to harmonise at all it should be on our basis? As I steered the original legislation through the House, with some advice at official level from a Mr. Cockfield, does my right hon. Friend agree with me that the abolition of zero rating would not be acceptable to the House?

The Prime Minister: We have made that clear. We must be able to determine our own structure of VAT. A number of other countries also take the view that they must be free to determine their own structure, and they are just as much against the proposal as we are. The possibility of this going through is negligible.

Q5. Mr. Redmond asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Redman: Will the Prime Minister explain why families who look after elderly parents, thus saving the state money, in line with the Victorian values that the Prime Minister supports, should be penalised by the poll tax?

The Prime Minister: As the hon. Member is aware, the poorest will be protected—[Interruption.] Oh, yes. The poorest will be protected by an 80 per cent. rebate and by an addition to supplementary benefit to enable them to pay the remaining 20 per cent. We believe that rates are levied on far too narrow a base. They are a grossly unfair tax. We believe that the services that are provided by local authorities are provided on a personal basis and that all people, save the poorest, should make a contribution to them. Most people accept that.

Q6. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stanbrook: Although we should retain local control over the rates of VAT and, indeed, on whether something should be VAT rated at all, does my right hon. Friend agree that the ultimate objective of the EEC Commission — the free internal market — is highly desirable and was probably the big prize that we expected to gain when we joined the Common Market?

The Prime Minister: Yes, the completion of the internal market is extremely important. There is a great deal to do in standardising and getting safety regulations across the Common Market with things such as television, electrical goods and services, which would genuinely enable us to get a full and complete internal market. We have never accepted the view that we need approximation of taxation to complete the internal market and we do not accept it now.

Mr. Steel: Does the Prime Minister recall the statement in the Government White Paper on the privatisation of British Airways, where the Government's objective was said to be the creation of a multi-choice system of airlines? Does that not sound a bit hollow in the light of today's takeover?

The Prime Minister: As the right hon. Gentleman will be aware, there is a private notice question on the matter later, which will be answered by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

British Airways/British Caledonian (Merger)

3.31 pm

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield) (by private notice) asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what advice he has received from the Director General of Fair Trading regarding a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of the proposed merger of British Airways and British Caledonian Airways.

The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and Minister of Trade and Industry (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): None, Sir. The offer was announced only this morning. The Director General of Fair Trading will advise my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State on the question of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission as soon as reasonably practicable.

Mr. Blair: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that the proposed merger unquestionably satisfies the criteria for investigation by the commission and that he can impose the time limit that he wants? Is he aware that the first the unions knew of this merger was hearing about it on their car radios this morning on their way to a meeting called late last night? What guarantees will he give on job losses in this industry and the other industries that depend upon it?

Most important of all, what has happened to the Government's policy of efficiency through competition? Is it not right that, in 1984, the Civil Aviation Authority specifically called for a multi-airline industry and warned that "otherwise this country might willy nilly find itself with one privately owned but less than efficient monolith at the end of the day"?

Is he also aware that, in their response to that, the Government specifically agreed with the CAA and said that there must be a multi-airline industry? Is he further aware that, as late as April this year, the Secretary of State for Transport said that the Government were committed "to a sound and competitive multi-airline industry"?

Is it not a conspicuous irony that after years of public ownership, when merger was resisted and competition promoted, privatisation should within months lead to merger embraced and competition stifled? What will be the protection for consumers in this private monopoly? Is it not the case that, as with British Telecom, faced with a choice between private profit and the public's rights as consumers, the Government choose private profit every time?

Mr. Clarke: None of that follows from the present position or from my answer to the hon. Gentleman's question. The legal position is that the Director General of Fair Trading has a duty to advise my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State whether this matter should be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. That is the strict position and we must wait for that advice. It would be improper for me at this stage, before we have that advice, to give my opinion as to whether it satisfies the criteria for a reference. We must wait and see.

I am sure that the unions, in common with the rest of the public, heard about this proposed offer this morning. The correct steps for the trade unions or anyone else interested is to make representations to the director general as quickly as possible, who will, as quickly as possible, give his reaction to them. He will then give his opinion and advice to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. Something to which the director general will obviously address himself is the effect of this proposed merger upon the competitive position in the airline industry. That is one of the matters upon which we now await his opinion. As the law provides, we must wait for that opinion.

I believe that the hon. Member is getting very hot under the collar and jumping the gun. We will have the advice of the director general as soon as he can reasonably provide it. Then my right hon. and noble Friend will decide whether to refer this offer to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Will my right hon. and learned Friend take it from me that I believe that a decision to refer this offer would be a mistake and against the interests of British aviation? However, will he assure me that, whatever decisions are taken, they are taken speedily so that the many thousands of my constituents who work not only for British Caledonian but for British Airways may take advantage of the splendid opportunity that this merger represents?

Mr. Clarke: No decisions will be taken by the Government until we have the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. My hon. Friend's submission is the type of submission that should now be made to the director general so that he can give his advice to the Secretary of State as quickly as possible and as quickly as practicable in this rather complex case.

Mr. David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): How on earth can the Minister square what he has said with the 1984 Government White Paper? The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) quoted part of that White Paper, but the full quotation reads that the Government's objective was "to encourage a sound and competitive multi-airline industry with a variety of airlines of different characteristics"

Surely the proposed merger is inconsistent with that statement. Indeed, that statement was repeated in the prospectus for the British Airways privatisation.

Mr. Clarke: It was a sound policy in 1984 and it may be that—[Interruption.]—and it may be a sound policy now. The fact is that an offer has been made by British Airways upon which we have taken no decisions and have given no reaction. It is being assumed that a decision has been taken about whether or not to refer this merger. That is not so. That decision cannot be taken by the Secretary of State until he has the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. Therefore, all that is happening is that hon. Members are beginning to ask hypothetical questions about events which may or may not arise when my right hon. and noble Friend is in a position to make a decision.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): If the Government have to consider this case later on, will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind that British Airways is not all that large in international terms? It has to compete with sizeable airlines overseas, many of which are much bigger than British Airways. Although we want to see as much competition as possible in Britain, probably on the domestic routes, an airline must be large to compete overseas. Perhaps British Caledonian is not big enough to compete on the international routes and that may be a very good reason for allowing this merger to go ahead. Presumably those factors will be taken into account.

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend's arguments are extremely relevant. It is obvious that there will be a variety of opinions and submissions on this matter. Those opinions and submissions are best made, at this stage, to the Director General of Fair Trading. He will give his advice upon a bid by one private company to suggest a merger with another private company. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will take his decision about whether to refer this proposed merger to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission when he has had a chance to reflect upon the advice of the director general, who will listen to all the competing arguments. That is the only stage we have reached to date.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): Does the Minister agree that the chaotic and anarchic situation in the industry is entirely due to the Government and the United States Government pressing for deregulation? That has led to the formation of mega airlines in the United States, six of which are bigger than British Airways. Does the Minister also agree that it is very bad industrial relations practice to announce this proposal on the same day that the unions got to know about it at 9.30 am? Surely the Minister cannot dodge his responsibilities by trying to skirt around that. Does the Minister also agree that, whatever happens, if the merger is referred, an early decision should be made because many jobs in the industry are at stake?

Mr. Clarke: It sounds as though the director general will hear some conflicting opinions from Opposition as well as Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) sounded fairly passionate on the subject of competition. It is my opinion that deregulation and increased competition on the transatlantic routes in particular have been of great benefit to the industry, especially its passengers. This exchange is already revealing that this is a complex issue which ought to be dealt with, as it has to be dealt with by law, by the proper process of waiting for the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. I suggest that hon. Members make their representations to the director general, stop getting so excited on the first day we have heard that the bid has been made and wait in due course for a considered decision by my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State when he has the director general's advice on the public interest involved in this matter.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): Can my right hon. and learned Friend say whether the Government were also caught by surprise this morning or whether discussions were going on behind the scenes? Will he say one other thing to the director general when the time comes? Will he say that, if this merger goes ahead, some 90 per cent. of all airline licences will be in the hands of one company, that it will have further licences which belong to airlines in which it has an interest and that, therefore, the death knell will soon be heard for the future of independent airlines?

Mr. Clarke: We have known within the Government about the possibility of this bid for about a week, but obviously we could not reveal that fact until the merger was announced at 8 o'clock this morning. That has enabled all these representations, including my hon. Friend's, to be made to the director general. He will weigh up all the competing considerations which have already been tumbling out within a few hours of the news going public. It will take perhaps a few weeks before he comes back with his advice to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I am interested in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's concept of the Government having no policy. Can he tell us exactly when the Government started to have no policy on competition in the airline industry and, when they last had a policy, what it was?

Mr. Clarke: I said nothing of the kind — [HON. MEMBERS: "Answer."] If I got up at the Dispatch Box and began, on the Government's behalf, to give instructions to the director general about what his opinion should be on this bid which he is now considering, the whole House would rightly be outraged. It is now the statutory duty of the director general to consider this bid. My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State has no power to decide whether to refer this matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission until he has the director general's opinion. Certain sections of the House have reacted to what has been said in this moring's newspapers or on the radio and are already sounding off about a complex takeover bid which we have to consider in the correct way, which is the way laid down by statute. It would be improper for me to anticipate what my right hon. and noble Friend's decision might be.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that this worrying episode makes it absolutely clear that there is a need for harmonised company law within Europe and deregulation in air transport to allow the emergence of transnational airlines? As that is not the case, will my right hon. and learned Friend make it clear that a policy will be instituted which will permit genuine competition, at least on the domestic side, or the scheduled domestic carriers will soon be gobbled up?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend raises interesting points about transport and airline policy on which I am tempted to comment, but I suggest that he take the first suitable opportunity to raise them in the House with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who takes a proper interest in this matter and, I think, shares many of my hon. Friend's views.

Business of the House

3.43 pm

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I ask the Leader of the House to state the business for next week?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 20 JULY—Remaining stages of the Finance Bill.

Motion on the Rate Support Grant (Scotland) (No. 2) Order.

Motions on the Rate Reduction (Lothian Region) 1987-88 Report and the Rate Reduction (City of Edinburgh District) 1987-88 Report.

TUESDAY 21 JULY—Motion on the Channel Tunnel Bill (Procedure).

Consideration of Lords amendments to the Channel Tunnel Bill.

Motions on Ministerial salaries and Members' pay and allowance.

WEDNESDAY 22 JULY—Motions on the Pensioners' Lump Sum Payments Order and the Supplementary Benefit (Requirements and Resources) Amendment Regulations.

Afterwards motion on the Hovercraft (Civil Liability) (Amendment) Order.

Followed by Motion on EC documents relating to research and development in telecommunications. Details of the EC documents concerned will be given in the Official Report.

THURSDAY 23 JULY—Motions on Northern Ireland orders relating to water fluoridation, charities, latent damage and enduring powers of attorney. Details will be given in the Official Report.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

FRIDAY 24 JULY—Debates on the motion for the Adjournment.

Mr. Kinnock: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his statement.

Before we rise for the recess may we have a debate on the Government's non-interventionist economic policy, with particular reference to the complete absence of Government responsibility for change when unemployment goes up by millions and the claim that credit is due to them when unemployment goes down by thousands?

In view of the fact that we shall probably rise before the Government have reached a decision on references with regard to the merger between British Airways and British Caledonian Airways, could we also have a further statement next week about the Government's attitude to references relating to the merger, so that we do not go into recess without a more precise definition of the Government's attitude than we have been able to obtain this afternoon?

Could we have a statement next week on the future of the European collaborative programme on advanced communications technologies? Will the Leader of the House ensure that, in such a statement, the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry explains the Government's reasons for delaying the announcement of funding for information technology—the Alvey programme?

Before the House rises could the Leader of the House make arrangements for statements to be made by the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for the Environment, which will give the former an opportunity to explain why the Government took the phasing-in of poll tax out of their legislation for Scotland earlier this year, and give the Secretary of State for the Environment the opportunity to explain why the Government want to put phasing into the English and Welsh legislation, whenever that appears? I am certain that that slight lack of consistency will have occurred already to the Leader of the House, if not to the Prime Minister.

Given that the Government's own advisers, the Social Security Advisory Committee, and many other bodies, cannot support the Government's proposals for the social fund under the social security legislation, will the Leader of the House also arrange next week for a statement, before we rise for the recess, from the Secretary of State for Social Services, to tell the House how he intends to modify his proposals in the light of the criticisms from the Government's own advisory body and many other professional and involved bodies?

May I repeat my request of last week that reports of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools be published before the House rises? Will the Leader of the House give us an assurance, in view of the possibility of those reports being published, that time will be allowed next week for the Secretary of State for Education and Science to make a statement on the findings of those reports?

Finally, will the Leader of the House confirm that the Government have now agreed that there should be a Scottish Minister on the Standing Committee considering the Local Government Bill, in recognition of the considerable significance that that Bill has for Scotland and the people of Scotland?

Mr. Wakeham: The right hon. Gentleman has raised eight points. He wanted a debate on economic policy. I cannot promise a specific debate next week, but I would have thought that, with a certain amount of ingenuity, some of the points that he raised could well be dealt with on Third Reading of the Finance Bill on Monday.

I shall refer the matter of whether it would be appropriate to make a further statement on British Airways to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I shall also refer the right hon. Gentleman's point about advance technology to my right hon. and noble Friend. It seems to me that the debate on Wednesday night might well cover some of the aspects of that.

The right hon. Gentleman asked me whether I could arrange for a statement on what he sees as a difference in policy between the community charge as enacted for Scotland in the last Parliament and what he believes to be the view of the Department of the Environment now. All that I would say to the right hon. Gentleman is that I would not necessarily believe everything that I read in the newspapers. I shall refer his points to my right hon. Friends. The right hon. Gentleman asked about the DHSS and the social fund. I shall refer those matters to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Services. The right hon. Gentleman asked me about the reports on schools by Her Majesty's Inspectorate. I can give him the undertaking that they will be published before the House rises next week. I shall refer the question about what statements should be made to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about Scottish Ministers. Following the points of order that were raised last week, I undertook to have the question of a Scottish Minister being appointed to this Local Government Bill Committee discussed through the usual channels. In the light of these discussions, I have agreed that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton), should be a Member of the Committee to deal specifically with Scottish aspects of the legislation. As I told the House last week, there are of course, ample precedents for Committees on Bills relating to Scotland not having a Scottish Minister as a member. While I have acceded to the Opposition's request in this case, my agreement is without prejudice to the composition of any other Standing Committee that may be set up in future.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): Will my right hon. Friend take this parliamentary opportunity to deny categorically on behalf of the Government the report in The Independent this morning that a nuclear weapons test took place at North Luffenham in 1974 using radioactive material with a half-life of 25 years? Will he confirm that any such test would have involved a low-level material with a life of three to four months as described yesterday by the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces?

Mr. Wakeham: I have been in touch with my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for the Armed Forces and I can confirm that no such material was used and that the allegations in the article in The Independent to which my hon. Friend refers are completely untrue.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): As a matter of urgency, will the Minister arrange for a statement, and preferably a debate, next week about the European Commission's decision to harmonise value added tax? The Leader of the House will be aware that the Prime Minister appointed Lord Cockfield, a former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in her Cabinet, for the prime purpose of harmonising the internal market, of which harmonising VAT and excise duties is a vital part. The Prime Minister has not given any assurance about using the veto against VAT increases on clothing, books and newspapers. A debate or at the very least a statement is important so that we can pinpoint the areas in which the Government will use the veto. A deal should not be stitched up after the House rises on Friday of next week so that when we come back the whole thing has been shuffled off between the Prime Minister and Lord Cockfield.

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot add anything to what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on the substance of the matter. I regret that I cannot find time next week for a debate on the matter.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Is it my right hon. Friend's intention that the departmental Select Committees should be re-established before the House rises for the summer recess; and if not, why not?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise that my hon. Friend and other hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Worthing (Mr. Higgins), are anxious that these Committees should be set up promptly. However, necessary preliminaries, including membership, have to be agreed first. The House appreciate that Select Committees proceed best with all-party agreement, and we should not lightly depart from that basis. We hope to make progress on further Select Committees later today.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Does the Leader of the House agree that the four Northern Ireland orders which are unamendable and which the House will consider on Thursday are exactly the sort of orders that ought to be referred to the Northern Ireland Committee under Standing Order No. 99? Has he been able to find time to consider the representations I made to him about this matter? Does he accept that the decision not to re-establish the Select Committees before the summer recess is entirely that of the Government?

Mr. Wakeham: As to the second part of the hon. Gentleman's question, the decision was made by the Government, but it was done to seek all-party support for the Select Committees, which is the best way to proceed. I know that the hon. Gentleman is interested in making further use of the Northern Ireland Committee under our Standing Orders, as are other hon. Members, and I am willing to consider that.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Will my right hon. Friend reconsider his last answer? Does he think that the present procedures for dealing with proposed Northern Ireland legislation are satisfactory? Does he think it right that we should not be able to amend the greater part of the Northern Ireland legislation that comes before the House? Will he give further consideration to that point?

Mr. Wakeham: I am happy to confirm that I did not say that I would do other than consider those matters.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): As to Thursday's business, is it not an affront that the House should be expected virtually to rubber stamp Orders in Council for Northern Ireland without any opportunity to amend? Is the Leader of the House prepared to give an assurance that he will seek to remedy that position before we return after the recess?

Mr. Wakeham: I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's concern about the inadequacy, as he sees it, of the manner in which Northern Ireland business is dealt with in the House. I am happy to talk to him about that to see what can be done, but I cannot give him an undertaking that an agreement can be reached.

Sir Peter Hordern (Horsham): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the Director General of Fair Trading will be severely handicapped by being unable to study the wise advice that would have come his way about the British Caledonian bid had questions been allowed to continue? Therefore, will he say when he expects to see the director general's report, and will he undertake that in the next Session we shall have a debate on aviation and competition policy in general?

Mr. Wakeham: The length of questions is not a matter for me. The report of the Director General of Fair Trading is made not to me but directly to my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. I have taken note of what my hon. Friend said, and I shall consider it.

Mr. Michael Foot (Blaenau Gwent): Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the latest developments concerning the Peter Wright memoirs intensify the dangers of an infringement of the freedom of the press in this country? It would be monstrous for the House to adjourn and leave the matter unresolved. Therefore, if the right hon. Gentleman cannot provide an opportunity for a debate, will he ensure that the Attorney-General makes a statement to the House next week?

Mr. Wakeham: I appreciate that these are important matters, in which the Government have an important interest. The Government are upholding what they consider to be an important principle. I shall refer the right hon. Gentleman's point to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General.

Mr. Jonathan Aitken (Thanet, South): Does my hon. Friend's announcement of yet another procedure motion on the Channel Tunnel Bill mean that the Government intend to ask their supporters to overthrow this morning's important ruling by the impartial Standing Orders Committee that progress on the Bill should be halted because of the violations of fair play and petitioners' rights? If that is the Government's intention, is this not the most shameful episode in a long history of dubious practices and downright cheating on the Bill with regard to individual petitioners, and does my right hon. Friend understand that there will be ferocious opposition to this alteration of Parliament's will?

Mr. Wakeham: I appreciate that my hon. Friend feels very strongly about this issue, as do a number of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen. I understand that the Standing Orders Committee met this morning and recommended that Standing Orders should not be dispensed with in relation to amendments made to the Bill in another place. In the view of the Government, it is essential that the Bill reaches the statute book before the House rises for the summer recess. Therefore, I propose to invite the House to reconsider the matter.

Mr. Seamus Mallon (Newry and Armagh): The Leader of the House will be aware that, arising out of the Sampson report, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary has this week ordered an inquiry into police procedure and organisation in Northern Ireland. In view of that, and as inquests have not yet been held on six people who were shot dead by that same police service in County Armagh in 1982, will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate on this important matter, which some of us may feel is more important than the debate on the fluoridation of water in Northern Ireland, which is scheduled to take place next week? Will he try to ensure that the Sampson-Stalker report is laid before the House for detailed debate and scrutiny because that is the only thing that will dispel the suspicion in relation to this whole sorry incident?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sorry to disappoint the hon. Gentleman, but I cannot promise him a debate next week. However, I will certainly refer the points he has raised to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): It is now 13 years since Turkish troops invaded Cyprus. In view of the hardship that that has caused, and in view of the interest of the United Kingdom in seeing an early solution to the problem, may we have an early debate on the report of the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs dealing with Cyprus.?

Mr. Wakeham: I realise that it is an important matter and I will refer my hon. Friend's comments to my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary. However, I cannot promise a debate next week.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House give further consideration to the reply he gave to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition in relation to the poll tax? He suggested that we should not believe what we read in the newspapers, but the fact is that we know that Scotland is to be a guinea pig for this tax. Will he bring his right hon. and hon. Friends together to ensure that we are treated equitably in relation to the whole of the United Kingdom? Is it true that the formation of the Select Committee on Scottish Affairs is being held up because of the Government's difficulty in finding sufficient Back Benchers for it?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not have anything to add to what I said to the Leader of the Opposition. It is not true that the only thing holding up the formation of the Select Committee is an insufficient number of Back Benchers.

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): My right hon. Friend has received two requests today for further information with regard to the British Caledonian and British Airways proposed merger. He received one from the Leader of the Opposition for a full statement before the House rises for the summer recess, and one from my hon. Friend the Member for Horsham (Sir P. Hordern) for a full debate when the House returns. I do not think that the first suggestion is adequate, and I think that the second suggestion will be too late.

Surely the House requires an adequate opportunity for hon. Members who did not get an opportunity to express a view today, to express it fully before the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry reaches a decision on whether to refer the matter to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. Will he give consideration to a short debate, even though it may be for only one and a half hours, before the summer recess so that we can make clear to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry that we do not want the matter to be referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise my hon. Friend's strong views on this matter, but I cannot add anything to what I have already said.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): Will the Leader of the House enlighten us about the conduct of the Standing Committee on the Local Government Bill that met for the first time this morning? The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland did attend, but he did not respond to any points made by no fewer than four Scottish Members. We were given an assurance by the Minister for Local Government that Scottish questions would be replied to from time to time as was seen fit, or words to that effect. Does the right hon. Gentleman feel that that is an adequate response to the Scottish aspect of the Bill?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not think that during business questions I should answer detailed questions about proceedings on Standing Committees upstairs. However, I am certain that my right hon. and hon. Friends who represent the Government on that Committee will give adequate and excellent answers to the points raised.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): In the context of my right hon. Friend's reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price), he will be aware that the Secretary of State for Energy has announced within the past fortnight that he proposes to have major legislation on the denationalisation of the electricity supply industry on the statute book in November. If the Select Committee on Energy is not reappointed, and since it is virtually the major vehicle of inquiry into such matters on behalf of Parliament, we will have a vehicle that is sitting without wheels and tyres until November and the opportunity of examining this major piece of legislation will not exist. Is this not a case of constitutional sack cloth and ashes?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend courteously wrote to me about these points and I appreciate that. I want to proceed as fast as I can, but I do not believe that I should proceed other than with all-party agreement as to the way we should proceed.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Has the Leader of the House noticed the publication of the report by the Select Committee on Trade and Industry about the United Kingdom motor components industry? Will he arrange for an urgent debate on the report in view of the apparent decision by Lucas Electrical to sell its automotive division to Fiat Motor company and other Italian companies on a piecemeal basis with a risk of further redundancies in Birmingham and the rest of the west midlands?

Mr. Wakeham: I cannot arrange a debate next week. In any event, it would be better to proceed when the Government have had a chance to study the report and make their response.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): May I press my right hon. Friend further on re-establishing the Select Committees before the summer recess? Will he accept that it is an urgent House of Commons matter since the Select Committees have an obligation to report and work on behalf of the House? Some of them are anxious to get on with some urgent work, particularly the Select Committee on Energy in view of the pending legislation.

Mr. Wakeham: I agree with my hon. Friend. It is a House of Commons matter and that is why I am seeking to proceed as fast as I can, but obtaining agreement from both sides of the House.

Mr. Alistair Darling (Edinburgh, Central): Has the Leader of the House noticed early-day motion 111 which was tabled yesterday and signed by myself and 18 other hon. Members?

[That this House expresses its concern at the announcement that 9,000 staff are to be made redundant by British Rail over the next three years; recognises that British Rail receives a lower level of support both per head of population and as a percentage of gross national product compared with other European railways; in addition, believes that the Government does not sufficiently acknowledge the benefits offered by rail as a national asset; calls on the Government to ensure additional and adequate funding for British Rail; and further calls on British Rail to look carefully at its staffing policies in the light of possible revenue generation.]

Does he recognise that there is concern on both sides of the House that British Rail may be forced, because of the reduction in the amount of grant coming from central Government, to concentrate only on its profit-making services, leaving many thousands, if not millions, of people without a rail service that they can afford either in terms of availability or of the price charged? Does the Leader of the House consider that, given the status of British Rail as a national asset, the House ought to have an opportunity to discuss its future, especially in view of the recently published report of the Select Committee on Transport? We ought to have an opportunity to discuss this before the recess, and I ask that time be made available to debate this important matter next week.

Mr. Wakeham: I should like to be helpful to the hon. Gentleman, but I am afraid that I cannot offer him time next week. I understand that job reductions will affect managerial and clerical support and not jobs giving direct service to rail users. British Rail aims to make the reductions through natural wasteage and internal transfers. Nevertheless, I recognise that it is an important matter, and I shall refer it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): In view of the obvious importance of the subject that she will be discussing and of the admirable leadership that she is giving, will the Leader of the House make it possible for the Prime Minister to make a statement to the House next week on her return from Washington?

Mr. Wakeham: I shall refer that matter to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister. I have no doubt that, if she wants to make a statement, I will make it possible.

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): May I support my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) and ask the Leader of the House when he will find time to debate the latest report from the Select Committee on Transport into the Alice-in-Wonderland situation within British Rail? Trains that arrive 10 minutes late are deemed to be on time, fare increases at six monthly intervals are deemed to be adjustments, reductions in PSO grant to the most under-funded railway network in Europe are described as tough but achievable, and the latest round of job losses will apparently include many grades except those of the chairman and members of the British Railways Board, which, together with incompetent Ministers, are responsible for this tragic and absurd situation.

Mr. Wakeham: I regret that I cannot offer the hon. Gentleman time for a debate next week. However, I know that he will use the opportunity on Monday to question the Secretary of State for Transport during transport questions.

Mr. Bowen Wells (Hertford and Stortford): May I press my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House further on the question of the establishment of the Select Committees? He said that he is endeavouring to proceed with the agreement of both sides of the House, which I understand he has. The Chief Whip on the Liberal Benches is indicating his assent, and I understand that the Labour party also wishes to move ahead. May I remind my right hon. Friend that, without the establishment of the Select Committee before we leave this place for the summer, the Clerk's Department will be idle and will be spending a great deal of money? I am sure that that would offend my right hon. Friend's natural inclination to save money or use it effectively.

Mr. Wakeham: I am glad that my hon. Friend accepts that I am doing all that I can to set up the Select Committees. I shall continue to do so as best I can.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): When will the House have time to discuss the serious and important evidence presented yesterday by the Committee of Public Accounts, condemning in remarkably candid language mismanagement and financial anarchy involving millions of pounds of taxpayers' money? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Welsh Office is condemned for showing no serious concern about the breakdown of management and control at the National Museum of Wales which has been going on year after year? How can we consider the possibility of giving the Welsh Office greater powers over efficient local authorities in Wales when it has been condemned in that document as being grossly inefficient?

Mr. Wakeham: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that a debate on these important matters will be the more useful when the Government have had a chance to study the report and to make a response.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): As the Member representing the eastern suburbs of the once great port of Hull, may I tell my right hon. Friend that the priority given by the Government to the regeneration of cities such as Hull has been warmly welcomed? Is he aware, however, that the biggest boost to the economy of areas such as Liverpool, Hull and Goole would be provided by abolition of the national dock labour scheme, which has played a significant part in the decline of Hull as a port? Is he aware that abolition would enable Hull and other northern ports to compete with Felixstowe and other non-scheme ports and private ports? Will he discuss legislation on those lines with his colleagues and at least provide time for a debate on a subject on which there is great feeling in the north of England?

Mr. Wakeham: These are very important matters and I will certainly refer them to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Dr. Jeremy Bray (Motherwell, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Chancellor of the Duchy to make a statement in the House about the future of information technology research in this country? The right hon. Gentleman is right in saying that it will be possible next Wednesday to discuss research and development in the European Community, but is he aware that the remarks of the Chancellor of the Duchy in Manchester this week mean that there will be no matching programme of United Kingdom research and that we shall lose control of the United Kingdom element in any European programme?

Mr. Wakeham: I will certainly refer the matter to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy. As I understand it, one of the most important aspects is to encourage the amount of private sector resources going into research as the Government are already putting in very substantial sums.

Mr. Michael Fallon (Darlington): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that, whether or not it is decided to phase in the community charge, the introduction of the national non-domestic rate will proceed on schedule as the north stands to gain substantially from rate reductions for business?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the validity of my hon. Friend's comments, but I cannot anticipate details of the Bill before it is published.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Given the difficulty experienced by the usual channels in setting up the departmental Select Committees, will the right hon. Gentleman consider removing any further embarrassment by allowing Back-Bench Members on both sides to elect Members of Select Committees directly, enabling them to be far more independent of Government and shadow Government and thus to carry out their role of scrutiny better than at present?

Mr. Wakeham: The Select Committees are appointed by the Committee of Selection. So far as I know, there are no Ministers or Opposition Front Bench spokesmen on that Committee.

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the concern in industry that the British space plans should be published as early as possible so that the many important projects that are under way can continue with some measure of certainty? Can he make any statement as to when the publication date will be announced?

Mr. Wakeham: I am not in a position to make any announcement, but I will see that my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry lets my hon. Friend know as soon as possible.

Mr. Peter Pike (Burnley): In view of the wide public concern about the Government's plans to privatise the water authorities, will the Leader of the House give an assurance that the Select Committee report on pollution of rivers and estuaries will be discussed by the Government and debated by the House before there is any further move towards privatisation?

Mr. Wakeham: I recognise the importance of the report. I cannot undertake here and now to give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks, but I will look into the matter.

Mr. Eric Forth (Mid-Worcestershire): May I echo the request for an early debate on the membership of Select Committees? In view of the privileged position in which Scotland finds itself in terms of very high public expenditure and of greater per capita expenditure on the Health Service, does my right hon. Friend agree that there should always be English representation on Committees dealing with Scotland so as to keep an eye on the amount of taxpayers' money going to Scotland from the general Exchequer?

Mr. Wakeham: My hon. Friend makes his point and tempts me to try to organise a debate, but I regret that I must give him the same answer as I gave earlier.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Is the Leader of the House aware that in the past couple of weeks there have been calls from Tory Members such as those from Bournemouth for a six-day week for miners? Will he arrange a debate on that subject between 24 July and 21 October? I am sure that people in the mining industry will be pleased to fill the public gallery if Members of Parliament are prepared to return to work during their three-month recess. Will the Government also accept a paper to read from Mr. Christopher Benson, chairman of the London Docklands Development Corporation — a man who is supposed to be super-efficient and receives £27,096 per year for working a two-day week — as it may help Tory Members who think that miners should work six days a week while some of those Members are moonlighting all the time?

Mr. Wakeham: If I organised such a debate during that period, I should certainly be here and I imagine that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) would be here, but I wonder how many of the hon. Gentleman's hon. Friends would come along. I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman's comments about Mr. Christopher Benson are in any way justified.

Mr. Skinner: It is in Hansard.

Mr. Wakeham: That gentleman has done a great deal to turn around the situation in the London docklands and snide remarks of the kind made by the hon. Member for Bolsover are not appreciated.

Mr. Skinner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No. We often receive answers that we do not like.

Mr. Skinner: The Minister did not give any answer. One of his friends——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I order the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) to resume his seat.

Mr. William Cash (Stafford): In view of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister's visit to Washington tomorrow, will my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House consider arranging a debate in the immediate or near future on the dangers of a trade war between this country and the European Community, on the one hand, and Japan and the United States, on the other, as the matter is becoming of ever grave concern?

Mr. Wakeham: Trade matters are very important and we shall have to find opportunities to debate them before too long, but I cannot go any further than that today.

Mr. Bill Michie (Sheffield, Heeley): The Leader of the House has announced that on Tuesday we shall have the opportunity to debate the ludicrously high salary increases proposed for Members of Parliament.Will he give an assurance that in dealing with allowances we can discuss the allowances paid for secretarial and research staff, and so on, as that is far more important than whether Members of Parliament get a rise?

Mr. Wakeham: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. Allowances are paid so that Members of Parliament can carry out their work efficiently. Those matters can, of course, be raised in the debate on Tuesday.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I remind my right hon. Friend that the Easter recess came and went and the general election intervened and that if the statement requested by my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) on the national space plan is not made before the summer recess it will be a grave dereliction of duty on the part of the Government? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the Select Committee on Trade and Industry, whenever it is established, should consider as a matter of urgency the decision-making process in relation to the United Kingdom space plans as there are clear signs that the Government either do not care or do not attach to these matters the priority that they deserve?

Mr. Wakeham: I do not accept what my hon. Friend says. I believe that this is an important matter and I shall certainly refer it to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Is there any prospect of an urgent statement by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate and Consumer Affairs regarding the measures necessary to protect tourists against blatant exploitation because the law appears to be inadequate? If the Leader of the House would agree to walk through Parliament square, he would find that a vehicle is habitually abusing the law by selling goods at extortionate prices. Both the police and the local authority claim that they have no power to prevent this from happening. Surely the law should be strengthened and measures taken to protect tourists who are so welcome in this city and in this area of it.

Mr. Wakeham: Obviously, I shall refer that to my right hon. Friend, but, as he is answering questions on Tuesday, that seems to be an opportunity for the hon. and learned Gentleman to raise the matter with him directly.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Before the House rises for the recess, will the Leader of the House allow time for a debate and division on the question of the Government's lack of a democratic mandate in the nations of Scotland and Wales? Will he comment on rumours circulating in the House that both Front Benches are united in wanting to avoid a debate and division on this important topic facing the Scottish and Welsh peoples?

Mr. Wakeham: As far as I am aware, this is not a matter on which there is any agreement between the two Front Benches. It seems that the matter has arisen several times since we have returned from the general election and that the hon. Gentleman is most concerned that his view is not finding a great deal of favour.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will my right hon. Friend find time for a debate on the coal industry in the light of the comment of the Leader of the Opposition that he is now in favour of a six-day working week for the mining industry?

Mr. Wakeham: I note my hon. Friend's request, but I cannot promise a debate next week.

Summer Adjournment

Mr. Speaker: I remind the House that on the motion for the Adjournment on Friday 24 July up to eight hon. Members may raise with Ministers the subject of their choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next; a ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

Prisons

4.22 pm

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement.

The House has from time to time been warned of the dramatic rise in the prison population. Last Friday that population stood at 51,029, nearly 4,000 more than a year ago and over 9,300 above the certified normal accommodation, which is the uncrowded capacity of the prison system. Six hundred and forty-eight of those prisoners were being held in wholly unsuitable conditions in police cells, so diverting police officers from operational duties.

The main reason for the latest growth in the population is the substantial increase in the number of offenders being dealt with by the Crown court and an increase in the average length of custodial sentences passed by the Crown court. Moreover, despite our efforts to reduce court delays, the number of prisoners held on remand has increased by about a further 1,000 over the last year to 11,000.

Those who commit serious offences should receive severe sentences. The Government have legislated to increase the sentencing powers of the courts where necessary, and the courts in their decisions have reflected public concern by passing longer sentences, for example, for rape and armed robbery. At the same time, we have made clear, most recently in our election manifesto, the need to strike a balance between tough sentences for those who pose a threat to society and lesser sentences for those who pose no such threat. Hence the emphasis which we have placed on tough and challenging alternatives to custody, to which the courts have responded with a substantial increase in the proportionate use of community service orders.

Sentencing decisions are for the courts, and the responsibility of the Government is to make sure that the decisions of the courts are not frustrated by a lack of prison accommodation. Prisons have to be places with the right levels of security in which prisoners can live, and prison staff can work, in tolerable conditions. The problem of overcrowding, and what it means in practice, is well known to any hon. Member who has visited one of our local prisons. We have 5,000 prisoners crammed three to a cell designed for one. A further 14,000 are doubled up. Virtually all these people are in their cells for most of the day, relying on pots and periodic slopping out for sanitation. Such overcrowded prisons are hard to control and, I would argue, more likely to result in re-offending.

This Government have invested record sums in the prison service. Expenditure on the service has increased by 34 per cent. in real terms since 1979 and the capital budget has more than doubled. The building programme already known to the House involves the opening of 20 new prisons as well as the refurbishment of existing prisons, and this will have delivered a total of 17,500 more prison places by 1995. The programme has been expanded in each of the last two public expenditure rounds. Immediately, the programme will produce some 3,000 new places in the 12 months from September. We are making every effort to maximise the use of the existing prison estate and I should like to pay tribute to the efforts of the prison service in doing so. They are hard pressed and they deserve our thanks. However, in recent months the rise in the population has outstripped the supply of new places, as I warned in the debate on the Loyal Address and the gap between supply and demand looks set to grow wider still. The report by Sir James Hennessy on last year's prison disturbances, which I am publishing today, reminds us all of the delicate balance between order and disorder in our prisons.

Further action now is essential. That action must be enough to deal with the immediate problem and to prevent it from recurring. We must also preserve the momentum of our restructuring of working practices under the fresh start initiative.

I have therefore taken the following decisions. First, immediate steps are being authorised to secure the opening on a temporary basis of a camp for prisoners — Rollestone in Wiltshire — which will hold 360 inmates. This will be managed and staffed by prison service personnel. I shall keep the need for further camps or other additional temporary accommodation under close review.

Secondly, we shall also need a substantial expansion and acceleration of our plans to provide more prison places in the long term. We propose to set this in hand and I shall make a further announcement in due course.

Thirdly, I am sure that the skills and knowledge of the private sector have a bigger part to play in ensuring the speedy delivery of this accelerated programme. It takes too long to build a prison. I am, therefore, setting up a new prison buildings board within the Home Office, but with a strong outsider element to supervise the building programme and to exploit to the full private-sector techniques in bringing new prisons on stream. My noble Friend Lord Caithness will report immediately to me on further possibilities for using the private sector, following his forthcoming visit to the United States, in the light of the Select Committee's recent report.

Fourthly, I have considered, but rejected, using the power of executive release to ease the pressure of the prison population. Rather, I propose to lay amendments to the rules for prison department establishments, increasing the amount of remission dependent on good behaviour by those serving sentences of up to and including 12 months from one third to one half of sentence length. This is an interim measure, applying only to less serious offenders serving short custodial sentences and the period of remission is, of course, dependent on good conduct. It will remove the anomaly, criticised by the courts, that those on sentences too short to qualify for parole serve a higher proportion of their sentences than more serious offenders who are selected for parole. As it takes effect over the coming weeks it will help the present problem of overcrowding, to the extent of about 3,500 places, by relieving pressure, particularly on local prisons, and it will enable prisoners to be removed from police cells, thereby returning police officers to their proper duties of dealing with crime and preserving public order on the streets.

Fifthly, this measure is an interim one, pending a wide-ranging review of parole and remission arrangements. The operation of the parole scheme in relation to shorter sentences has, as I have said, been criticised, not least by members of the judiciary. In our manifesto we untertook to set up a thorough review of the workings of the parole system and of the arrangements for post-custodial supervision. I can announce today the setting up of that review, which will also look at remission, under the chairmanship of a distinguished former Member of the House, Mr. Mark Carlisle QC, with terms of reference which I shall publish in full in the Official Report.

The Government have consistently shown in deeds over the last eight years their commitment to the prison service and to resolving the long neglected problems of the prison system, including the lack of capital investment and the reform of working practices. The immediate pressure of the rise in the prison population means that we must amplify and extend that strategy. The measures that I have announced today on prison building, parole and remission, and the opening of Rollestone, are designed to achieve that.

Following are the terms of reference for parole review:

To examine the operation of the parole scheme in England and Wales, its relationship with the current arrangements for remission, time spent in custody on remand, and partly and fully suspended sentences and their effect on the time which offenders sentenced to imprisonment spend in custody after sentence; and to make recommendations on —

(a) whether a parole scheme should be retained as a feature of the penal system; and, if so,

(b) its objectives

(c) any changes which should be made in law or practice affecting either eligibility or criteria;

or, alternatively,

(d) any different scheme which might be introduced to provide for release befor expiry of sentence, either generally or for particular categories of prisoners;

and, in any case,

(e) the possibility of prisoners released before expiry of sentence being required to perform work of value to the community, having regard to the relative cost and effectiveness of custodial and non-custodial disposals;

having regard to the need for—

(i) fairness and consistency in the treatment of prisoners;

(ii) a clear understanding of the relationship between determination of the original sentence by judicial decision and the proper limits of executive discretion in giving effect to it;

(iii) public and judicial confidence in any new arrangements that might be proposed;

(iv) the resource implications of any changes proposed.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): First, let me thank the Home Secretary for the courteous welcome that he gave me earlier today and say how much I look forward to working with and sometimes against him in the years to come.

I should make it clear at once that the Opposition support the central proposal in the right hon. Gentleman's statement, namely, to increase remission for prisoners of good behaviour serving short sentences for minor offences. The right hon. Gentleman will recall that a month ago several of my hon. Friends warned him that some such action would have to be taken after the law and order rhetoric of the general election campaign was over.

Can the right hon. Gentleman give an estimate of how many police officers are today being used, or I might say misused, in the supervision of prisoners, and how many of those officers will be released to go about their proper duties as a result of his statement? On a more fundamental note, does he agree that it would have been far better if, instead of being forced to take action now to avoid a summer prison explosion, he and, more important, his two predecessors had taken more considered action to reduce the prison population in the past?

The right hon. Gentleman will recall — although, apparently, some of his hon. Friends do not — that the

[Mr. Roy Hattersley]

Opposition supported Government proposals both for Executive and for supervised release. Does he not now regret that Lord Whitelaw's unhappy experiences at the 1981 Conservative party conference made him back-pedal so desperately on at least one of those sensible proposals? I assure the Home Secretary that we very much welcome the inquiry into the parole scheme and hope that it will examine supervised, Executive and conditional release. We wish him well in implementing what may and, I hope, will be sensible conclusions arising from the report.

We know from the Home Secretary's speech at Grantham that he, too, believes that we send too many people to prison and keep too many trivial offenders in prison for too long, and we wish him well in his attempts to educate his colleagues to the same enlightened and practical view.

Mr. Hurd: The right hon. Gentleman's technique is very different from that of his predecessor. He is trying to kiss me into oblivion, whereas his predecessor never made such an attempt.

In answer to the right hon. Gentleman's first question, the Metropolitan police tell me that about 625 London police officers are being deployed on day-to-day duties connected with accommodating London prisoners, and that over 200 provincial officers are engaged in similar duties. Some other provincial officers, particularly in the north, are engaged in looking after provincial prisons. When my right hon. and hon. Friends consider the present strain on the police and on police manpower, they will understand that we cannot go on expecting the police to carry that extra burden.

The right hon. Gentleman, albeit courteously, displayed a good deal of cheek in the latter part of his intervention. What my noble Friend Lord Whitelaw and my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan) had to do was to take courageous action to remedy the neglect that they had inherited. The Government in which the right hon. Gentleman served presided over a system under which crime was rising fast and the overcrowding of the prisons was already evident, but they did nothing about it. If a prison building programme of some substance had been started in the mid-1970s, when signs of the need for it were clear, we would not be facing the problems that we face today.

What my right hon. and learned Friend and his predecessor Lord Whitelaw did was courageously to set about remedying that neglect. My right hon. and learned Friend actually accelerated the programme that he had inherited, and thank heavens he did, because we are now beginning to get some relief from the problem. We now have to accelerate the programme again, as well as expanding it.

It is not my job to say whether, in general, too many people are in prison in this country; that is a matter for the courts. What I do say—what we said in our manifesto, and have constantly said — is that the courts, taking account of the realities of the position, need to pay attention to a distinction which I am sure the public perceive very clearly. This is the distinction between those who deserve long sentences because of the severity of their offences or the danger that they represent to the public, and those who the courts may decide, in accordance with the circumstances of the case, could be properly punished by tough and challenging alternatives to custody.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Does the Home Secretary feel any concern about the number of prisoners on remand, who represent more than 20 per cent. of the total in prison? Is that not unacceptable in the light of the presumption of innocence, and is it not time that we in England adopted the 110-day rule, which has served Scotland so effectively for 100 years?

Mr. Hurd: One should always be a bit sceptical when the Scots urge us to accept all their institutions. There is usually a link between one Scottish arrangement and another, and one cannot be accepted without the other.

The hon. and learned Gentleman will know from the discussions on what is now the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 that the Home Secretary has power by order to introduce provisions for time limits in England and Wales comparable to those in Scotland. He will also know that, after a period of trial, I have begun to operate different time limits in different parts of the country. I believe that that can contribute, although there will be no magic results, to accelerating the speed of the flow of justice, and so bring down the number of people held in our prisons unconvicted, which I agree is too high—about one-fifth.

Mr. Leon Brittan (Richmond, Yorks): I fully recognise the serious problem that my right hon. Friend faces, and warmly welcome the opening of Rollestone Camp to house prisoners. However, does he not agree that it is wrong in principle, and quite contrary to the rule of law and to everything that we stand for, to release convicted criminals prematurely — by whatever procedural means — not on the basis of an individual consideration of their cases, or because of the application of some new and more liberal penal policy, but simply because there is no room to house them? Does he accept that there will be considerable public disquiet at the prospect of some 3,500 prisoners being released prematurely, 630 of whom have been convicted of offences of violence or of sexual offences? Would it not be better to open more camps now than to hold out the prospect of doing so, as my right hon. Friend has done? Would it not also be preferable to make it clear now that what has been done is a one-off crisis measure,, which will not be repeated?

Mr. Hurd: The part of the package that deals with remission is certainly interim, as I said, and for the reason that I gave. May I take up the two specific issues raised by my right hon. and learned Friend, with which he obviously wrestled in his time as well? First, as he correctly observed, I did not rule out the use of additional camps or other temporary accommodation. In considering whether there should be further camps, I had to take into account a number of matters. First, as my statement and one of the exchanges that followed it showed, much of the problem is a result of the growth in the remand population. Camps are not a great deal of use in most circumstances, because unconvicted prisoners need to be held reasonably close to the courts where they are likely to have to be produced.

Secondly, I have to take into account the fact that camps are not a great deal of use, or can only be used, at great risk, for prisoners who could be a danger to the public. My right hon. and learned Friend will have read

Sir James Hennessy's report on the disturbances last year, and he will have seen the dangers that were encountered at Northeye when people were in dormitory or similar accommodation and the situation got out of hand. I do not want to replicate that by opening camps and putting into them people who are unsuitable for camps.

Thirdly, I have to consider staffing. The prison service is stretched to its utmost. The facilities for recruitment and training are at full stretch. I believe that the House and the public expect the job of guarding prisoners in Her Majesty's prisons to be done by prison service officers. Therefore staffing, as well as the choice of sites, is a consideration.

Those are three factors that I, like any other Home Secretary, have to weigh up when deciding on the further use of camps.

I understand entirely my right hon. and learned Friend's point about remission, but it already exists. Unlike Executive release, we are not introducing a new principle. We are altering a principle that already exists in different forms in different parts of this kingdom. Remission is awarded only on the strength of good conduct. The fact is that 82 per cent. of those who might qualify for early remission under the proposal that I have announced are in prison for non-violent offences. As for the remainder, whatever the offence—for example, the pub fight or the street brawl—the courts thought that they did not deserve long sentences.

My right hon. and learned Friend will immediately have grasped that the greatest possible difference in the length of an individual sentence as a result of my announcement will be two months—no more.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): I support and understand the reason for my right hon. Friend's statement, but may I ask him to assist me over two points? First, will he confirm that the 630 prisoners whom he anticipates will be released sooner are offenders who committed very minor offences? I hope that we are not talking about rapists or serious offenders. Secondly, my right hon. Friend mentioned the improvement in and the expansion of the prison building programme and referred to the involvement of the private sector. Is he able to say how he thinks that will be carried forward?

Mr. Hurd: The relief that I expect as a result of the remission element in the package is 3,500. One cannot give an exact figure, because it depends on good conduct. I said earlier that 82 per cent. of those who might qualify for early remission have been found guilty of non-violent offences, and that the courts did not think that the remainder deserved a long sentence.

As for the introduction of new private techniques into prison building, I have announced the organisational change. We have already been in touch with a number of private companies which we think might be able to help. We are in touch with American experience, which has been triggered to some extent by the report of the Select Committee to which my hon. Friend contributed. After identifying a design, I hope that we shall stick with it and not nibble away at it in an effort to improve it. That is what I mean by acceleration of the programme. There is plenty of scope for acceleration, while preserving the required standards

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): Does the Home Secretary accept that confession is good for the soul, that now is the time to say that everything that the Opposition told him was right and that the only reason why the Government did not sanction the release of large numbers of prisoners before the election was that they knew that it would be the final nail in the coffin of the most disastrous law and order policy that has ever been imposed on this country by any Government?

Why does the right hon. Gentleman not follow through his own logic, ignore the more rabid voices behind him and introduce a conditional release scheme that is fairer and contains an element of control, which the increased use of remission does not contain? Why does the right hon. Gentleman continue to peddle the fiction that he will not interfere with the sentencing policy of the courts when he, the Home Secretary, has a Bill before the House that gives power to hon. Members to refer lenient sentences? That means Members of this House, in response to public demand, will call for tougher sentences. Why does the Home Secretary not follow his logic home and abolish that proposal too?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is referring to our proposal for lenient sentences, which, so far from removing, we are proposing to strengthen. There was an exchange about that this afternoon at Question Time. I said to his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) that the general election seems to have brought about a loss of memory. That is perfectly true in his case, too.

The policy that the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) revealed in March to The Independent is entirely different from anything that could possibly find favour on this side of the House. He proposed the stopping of the present building programme. I cannot imagine anything more destructive or irresponsible. He also said that, as a matter of policy, a Labour Government would bring about a reduction of the prison population by 20,000 in the lifetime of a Parliament. That seems to be a wholly unreal and destructive approach.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Is my right hon. Friend aware that Conservative Members consider that his proposals are both necessary and timely, but they will mean the early release of people to whom judges have given appropriate sentences for crimes of violence? Will he explain to the House why he cannot exempt from his proposals all offenders who fall within this category, but who have been sentenced for crimes of violence?

Mr. Hurd: I have considered that question, because my hon. and learned Friend was kind enough to put that point to me privately early today. I am not inventing remission. My hon. and learned Friend accepts that, and I think that the public would accept it, too. The law gives me no discretion to distinguish between different types of offender on the basis of the offence. Remission exists on the basis of good conduct and on the basis of the sentence passed, not on the nature of the offence. Therefore, I do not have the discretion to discriminate as my hon. and learned Friend wishes. In practice, even if I had the power, to do so would be very difficult. I repeat that a small minority of people who have been sentenced for offences of violence to 12 months or under might qualify for earlier remission. These are cases which the courts thought did not deserve longer sentences. I gave the example of the pub fight or the street brawl. The greatest possible difference in the length of individual sentences would be two months, no more.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does the Home Secretary not see a link between the economic policies that have produced so much unemployment and the greedy, atavistic policies espoused by his Government for this prison crisis? Will he elaborate on the private sector proposal, about which he has been very vague? He says that he has been in contact with some American area of activity. Does that mean that he will hand over the prisons to private contractors, or does it mean that he will use the industrialised building techniques that were recommended by his friend Geoffrey Rippon, which produced Ronan Point and all the other magnificent examples of private enterprise techniques?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's first point was the platitude of the previous Parliament. He did not serve in that Parliament, so he does not know how platitudinous and often rejected that was. However, he did fight the election and he knows that the awful "crimeometer" was one of the flops and duds of the election. Therefore, I am surprised that he should rehearse that idea again today.

The hon. Gentleman has got it wrong about privatisation. We are faced with a dangerous situation, which my right hon. Friends and I have been trying to remedy after a period of disastrous neglect, using the conventional methods of design, arguing with hon. Members in the House where a prison should be, taking into account the planning and the comings and goings, getting on with the design, renewing a design and interfering with a design. We have continued to improve as best we can all the conventional ways of proceeding. As I said in my statement, the procedure is too slow.

I do not think that there is a case, and I do not believe that the House would accept a case, for auctioning or privatising the prisons or handing over the business of keeping prisoners safe to anyone other than Government servants. However, I do not think that we can afford to sit back and say that the way in which we have been doing things in the prison building programme is absolute and cannot be improved.

I was impressed by the Select Committee report. The accounts cited about the United States vary, and I do not say that we should be slavish followers of what happens there. However, it is our clear job in this dangerous situation to look around the world to see whether in this area, as in others, bringing private sector techniques to bear earlier and more vigorously can improve a very serious public sector situation.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): With regard to the establishment of a prison camp at Rollestone in my constituency, will my right hon. Friend confirm that it will be staffed by prison officers and that there will be no predictable effect on the requirements of the Wiltshire constabulary? What category of prisoners will be housed there?

Mr. Hurd: Rollestone will be equipped and designed as a category C prison, and that bears on the reply that I gave to my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan). Obviously there will have to be discussions with the chief constable of Wiltshire as a matter of practical arrangements. However, I do not envisage asking the Wiltshire police to contribute to the manning of the camp. If I did that, I am sure that the police authority, the chief constable and my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) would be on to me for more men at the drop of a hat.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): Does the Secretary of State accept that those of us who demand a high standard of protection for our people welcome the modernisation of our prisons, both for the morale of the staff and for the care of those who have suffered—quite justifiably in most cases—the deprivation of liberty?

The Secretary of State will be aware of a movement to transfer people to Northern Ireland. When speaking of remission, will he accept that there is something unfair in transferring people to complete sentences in Northern Ireland, where they receive a better approach to remission, while those who may be sentenced under Diplock courts and sent to prisons in England do not get the same facility? Does he accept that that kind of approach in dealing with remission causes unrest?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman represents a part of the United Kingdom where there is 50 per cent. remission at the moment, although there are no arrangements for parole. That is the kind of variation of experience that I would expect the committee of inquiry that I have announced to consider to see whether any lessons can be drawn. I can certainly send the hon. Gentleman the rules that apply to the applications that we receive from time to time, as he rightly said, for people to be transferred to prisons in the Province. He will know that the rules and criteria are strict. Most of the letters that I write on this subject explain why we cannot do that. I shall certainly write to the hon. Gentleman and set that out in greater detail. He can come back to me on that if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Will my right hon. Friend resist pressure for lesser sentences as a means of solving the problem? Is he aware that many of our constituents are deeply concerned about some of the lenient sentences that come out day by day from the courts? I congratulate him on the more robust prison building programme that he has announced and I commend that to him. I hope that in addition there will be considerably better pay and conditions for the prison officers who will man the new buildings.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right on his first point. The occasional what we might call "wayward" lenient sentence shakes public confidence in the criminal justice system, in particular at the upper or violent end of the scale. I believe that we need to strengthen the proposals in the Criminal Justice Bill in that respect.

My hon. Friend will also be aware that we are in the middle of the biggest single reform of the prison service system for many years. We are trying to do away with the ruinous appalling over-dependence on overtime and get decent arrangements for basic salary and working conditions, and to settle the tasks in the prisons and how they are to be carried out. There was always a difficulty in introducing the fresh start reform at a time of overcrowding. However, if we had waited, we would have lost the opportunity. It would not have gone ahead. We now find that the prison officers are still worried about the limitations, but they have balloted overwhelmingly to support the reform. There is a great prize and we must press on, for the reasons that my hon. Friend gave.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): In view of the reply that the Home Secretary has just given, is he aware that the morale of prison officers is now at an all-time low? Sadly, at all major prisons they are reading the small print in fresh start and they feel that they have no confidence in it. What will the Home Secretary do to build up the confidence of prison officers who at the end of the day will be responsible for running any establishment for which his Department has the overall responsibility?

If the Home Secretary is thinking only of privatisation for the building of new prisons, will the people who are to run the establishments be brought in at a very early stage of the planning and designing of those establishments? Very often the people who build those establishments never have to run them.

The Home Secretary referred to people being kept in police cells. His right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), the former Home Secretary, said in 1983 that that system would be ended. It has not been ended. Has the Home Secretary visited any of the police cells in London where men and women are now being kept?

Mr. Hurd: In response to the hon. Gentleman's last question, my answer is yes.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks gave an undertaking and carried it out. He undertook that the use of police cells would be ended, and it was. It has now resumed in my time, and I accept responsibility for that. It is thoroughly undesirable and has acted as a safety valve. However, there comes a time when the safety valve becomes dangerous, and that point has been reached in the use of police cells.

With regard to design, we must certainly consult the users. I went to what used to be RAF Lindholme, which my right hon. and learned Friend the former Home Secretary brought into the prison system several years ago. The users were consulted on the design for refurbishing that camp to turn it into a prison. The design there is admirable. Having made a decision, we must carry it out. We should not nibble away at it.

I disagree with the hon. Gentleman's point about morale. There was an all-time low. However, when people realised that the opportunity for fresh start was substantial, they rallied round to it. I acknowledge that there are problems of implementation and timing and those are particularly serious in London, as the hon. Gentleman knows. If he follows these matters closely, he will be aware that we are in close discussions with the unions involved about how to overcome those problems and the useful progress that we have made in the past few days will, I hope, be underlined and reinforced by what I have had to say today.

Sir Eldon Griffiths (Bury St. Edmunds): Taking the five points in the statement as a whole, I congratulate and thank my right hon. Friend on making some important proposals and on taking what must for him have been a very difficult and uncomfortable decision on remission. Is he aware that he inevitably places some of his friends and admirers in something of a quandary, insofar as we are bound to welcome the relief that the decision will bring to the police service and the prison service, while at the same time we are apprehensive about the consequences of releasing earlier than the courts have judged right a proportion of the offenders—perhaps 18 per cent.—who will have been convicted for crimes of violence or sex crimes?

Will my right hon. Friend reassure the House, the police service and the public that this is an interim solution to a genuine crisis and that he does not intend to continue with it, without the authority of the House, beyond three or four years? Finally, will he reconsider the possibility of taking powers within the Criminal Justice Bill to enable examinations to be made of individual cases of violent crime so that he can overcome the problem of release that he has mentioned?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the spirit behind his question. I do not believe that what I said about remission will exist in isolation for as long as three or four years. I shall be discussing with my former right hon. and learned Friend, Mr. Mark Carlisle, the speed with which his inquiry will proceed. I hope that it will be concluded long before three or four years. As my hon. Friend said, this is an interim measure, but I think that the time scale will be rather tighter than he thought might be acceptable.

I understand exactly—my hon. Friend put it well—the reservations that must be felt about some parts of the package. The right hon. Member for Gorton and others say that we should not press ahead with prison building, and there are others who have understandable reservations about remission. It would have been possible to continue hoping that without taking action the immediate crisis would pass. It might do so, but I am not sure about that.

My colleagues and I came to the conclusion that we had to tackle the problem by finding a solution that would have a lasting effect. I believe that there must be a package. I do not think that supply side measures only, or measures directed only to the demand side of prison places, would produce an adequate answer. I hope that on balance, and with reservations that are understandable, the House will agree that the balance is right.

Several Hon. Members rose—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am bound to have regard to the business that will follow this statement, and we are likely to have a long night. I shall allow questions to continue for a further 10 minutes. I ask for questions and not statements.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The right hon. Gentleman has given long replies.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): I am sure that the Home Secretary's statement will be extremely welcome to the staff of Winson Green prison in my constituency. The conditions there are foul, and the conditions for the prisoners are the conditions for the prison officers. Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that most of the prisoners who will be released under the conditions that he has set out were convicted of trivial offences and that many of them have mental health and literacy problems? The real way to restrict crime is to apprehend those who are guilty, and that is not achieved by a substitute for a law-and-order policy that results in inadequate people being locked up for ever-increasing periods. That substitute policy does not help prison offices or prisoners, and it does not enforce law and order either.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Lady is not correct. The prisoners who might benefit from remission are those who have been awarded relatively light sentences by the courts. That is the basis on which remission is calculated and awarded, and the only basis on which it can be considered by law. I shall not comment on the remainder of the hon. Lady's comments, because I have already been accused by some of her hon. Friends of going on for too long. We have had our exchanges on this "balance" often enough in the past and the hon. Lady knows why I do not agree with her.

Mrs. Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I am delighted that my right hon. Friend is to visit Lancaster castle prison a week on Friday. He will find that over many years the governor and his staff have pressed into use every square inch of prison, but it is still overcrowded. Therefore, prison officers will welcome a reduction in prison numbers. However, neither they nor my constituents would want sex offenders, many of whom have been too lightly sentenced, to share in the scheme that he proposes.

Mr. Hurd: I look forward to visiting Lancaster prison. As I always try to do on such occasions, I shall set aside time to talk to members of the prison service unions, including the Prison Officers Association. They will make their points to me about overcrowding, as they always do. I have already responded to questions about the nature of offences and the nature of the powers that are open to me in altering the rules governing remission.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Does the Home Secretary recognise that the major cause of overcrowding at Leeds prison is the many prisoners who are on remand? Will he say whether he intends to take any steps to reduce their number? It has been clear for a long time that Leeds is probably the most overcrowded prison, and I ask him to explain why we must wait until the 1990s for any new building projects at the prison.

Mr. Hurd: One of the most encouraging visits that I made shortly before the general election was to Leeds prison. I am aware of the high state of morale of those of the hon. Gentleman's constituents who run the prison, and that, on the eve of fresh start, was extremely impressive.

It is for the courts to decide whether an individual should be given bail. It is reasonable to encourage the probation service to provide the greatest possible information so that the courts can make the right decisions. It is right to establish reasonable time limits where we can so that the process of justice is accelerated. It is reasonable to ask magistrates throughout the country to consider the reasons for the wide variation in the granting of bail. There may be good reasons for local decisions because of local circumstances, and that is a matter for local magistrates, but they need to establish to their own satisfaction that decisions are made on that basis.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a high proportion of my right hon. and hon. Friends regret his decision to release 3,500 prisoners early? First, early release trespasses upon the independence of the judiciary. Secondly, it reduces the deterrent effect of sentences that increasingly do not mean what they say. Thirdly, the form of the order reduces the opportunities for discussion in the House and for voting against the proposition.

Mr. Hurd: I did not expect to carry my hon. Friend with me on this occasion. It would have been possible for me to proceed only on the supply side and to announce more camps here, there and everywhere. I do not think that my hon. Friend has addressed himself to the realities, including what I have said about camps, which are not sensible on the whole for remand prisoners. Nor are they sensible on the whole for those who might be a danger to the public. The problem of staffing camps properly when the prison service is severely stretched, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Mrs. Kellett-Bowman) said, and securely, which the public would expect, is a difficult one. I am not excluding the further use of camps, but those are the sorts of considerations that I must bear in mind.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): Given the considerable increase in the prison population, will my right hon. Friend consider as a matter of priority bringing back into service A and D wings at Parkhurst prison? Will he consider also making an early change to the law to allow compulsory screening for AIDS in our maximum security and long-term prisons? As the Isle of Wight has one of the largest prison populations of any constituency, will my right hon. Friend consider making an early visit to my constituency to meet prison officers?

Mr. Hurd: I am much obliged to my hon. Friend. I congratulate him on his arrival at this place. Even before the glad news of his election reached me I had arranged —I trust with his approval—to visit the prisons in his constituency during the summer recess. My hon. Friend is right to drew attention to the fact that it has taken too long to make the necessary security changes in a couple of wings at Parkhurst. That has been drawn to my attention, and we are getting on with the changes. I entirely accept what my hon. Friend said about that. Perhaps I could write to him about screening for AIDS. The issue does not arise immediately from my statement. I could give an answer off the cuff, but I might get the detail of it slightly wrong. As it is an important subject, that would be a mistake.

Sir Nicholas Bonsor (Upminster): My right hon. Friend will be aware of the sympathy that is felt for him by my right hon. and hon. Friends and myself in his predicament over prison accommodation. He will be aware also of the support that he has had from the Opposition over having to release about 3,000 prisoners prematurely. I hope that he will be aware further of the deep feeling of Conservative Members about a system whereby people are sentenced to appropriate sentences by judges, only to serve a small proportion of them. I hope that in the long term my right hon. Friend will make adequate provision to ensure that violent and sex offenders serve their full sentence, not a proportion of it.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend puts that clearly, and he will know the thinking on the proposals that are in hand on lenient sentencing and maximum sentences and on several of the offences that he mentioned. Of course, there is a problem, which, as he rightly says, goes wider than the statement about remission and parole. Both of them offend against the principle that he proclaims, but both have been here for a long time. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond, Yorks lowered the minimum qualifying period for parole, in a move that I strongly supported. The House knows that there continue to be problems and criticisms, which will not be removed by my statement, but will not be created by it. That is why, in our election manifesto, we proposed an inquiry, and that is why we are now getting on with it.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): Might not an inquiry on this be counter-productive, when judges can look at all the circumstances of the case and simply increase sentences to take account of additional remission? Could not the splendid abilities of Mr. Mark Carlisle be better put to considering ways by which we might more effectively deter potential criminals from getting engaged in crime in the first place?

Mr. Hurd: The splendid abilities of the Government Front Bench, and particularly of my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), are devoted to that second subject. There is a clear need to study the first subject, which is what I have asked Mr. Carlisle to do. My hon. Friend makes a fair point about the judges, but it is the judiciary who have been complaining about the present relationship between parole and remission. Their criticisms, expressed to me courteously but forcefully for more than a year, led me, some time ago, to favour an inquiry, which will cover this whole subject.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the general public will not understand how it is that a Conservative Government, faced with overcrowded prisons, are about to release on to the streets thousands of convicted criminals and hundreds of violent criminals before their time is up? Is there not a strong argument for providing additional prison accommodation rather than doing what my right hon. Friend proposes? Is this not an error of political judgment?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is putting a point to which I have already replied. It would have been possible, although unrealistic and unproductive in the long run, or even in the medium run, simply to come forward with the part of the package of plans for expanding and accelerating provision for the prisons. For the reasons that I have given about timing, staffing and the limitations of camps, I would have had an easier afternoon if I had done that, but I would not have tackled the problem seriously.

As regards remission, my hon. Friend spoke about letting people out on to the streets before their time, but already the upper range beyond that about which I am talking has a system of parole and of remission of one third. I am making an adjustment at the lower end, for those whom the courts have not thought fit to award serious and heavy sentences. The maximum difference in an individual sentence as a result of this proposal is two months.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall bear carefully in mind those hon. Members whom I have not been able to call when this matter is next discussed.

Business Questions

5.13 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not consider myself a journeyman in the ways of this Chamber, so I must seek your guidance. Is it in order for an hon. Member during business questions to pose a carefully prepared question to the Leader of the House that elicits an equally carefully prepared answer? Neither question nor answer referred to the business of the House; it simply enabled the Leader of the House to make a governmental statement on a newspaper article on the day in question and to make a denial. Is this not a disorderly use of the proceedings of the Chamber? Is it not a practice similar to that which obliged you, Sir, only recently to admonish the Government for an abuse of the proceedings of the House? Would not a similar admonishment be proper in this instance?

Mr. Speaker: Business questions are traditionally wide. I have no foreknowledge of a question that an hon. Member may ask, nor of the answer that may be given to him. I cannot help the hon. Gentleman on that.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that during business questions I referred to the call by some Members of Parliament for a six-day week for the miners and to the need for a debate on the issue, especially when Tory Members of Parliament are just off on three months' holidays. During the course of my question I referred——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not continue business questions.

Mr. Skinner: I want to refer to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman cannot do that. We cannot have a continuation of business questions. The hon. Gentleman asked his question and got his answer. I accept that it may be an answer that he did not like, but——

Mr. Skinner: It is not that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a point of order for me.

Mr. Skinner: Yes, it is.

Mr. Speaker: Unless the hon. Gentleman can make this a point of order for me, I will have to stop him.

Mr. Skinner: Mr. Speaker, everybody knows that you have some responsibility for the Official Report. In my statement, I quoted the fact that the chairman of the London Docklands Development Corporation received £27,096 a year for a two-day week. I said no more and no less than that. In his response, the Leader of the House said that I had said things that were not true about this chairman. I quoted from Hansard, column 135, on 7 July and I have made——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the Leader of the House wish to clear this matter up?

The Lord Privy Seal and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John Wakeham): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is a simple matter. The hon. Gentleman will know, when he reads Hansard, that I did not question the fact of the salary paid to Mr. Christopher Benson. I disagreed with the hon. Gentleman when he said that the salary paid was not justifiable. Mr. Benson is worth every penny of his salary and he has done a great deal for the London docklands.

Mr. Speaker: I hope that this will not be a precedent for carrying on.

Sound Broadcasting

5.18 pm

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I seek your help. I understand that the sound recording of the Home Secretary's reply to the first question and all subsequent exchanges were not forwarded to the BBC as is normal practice. Would you inquire how this came about and report back to the House? I understand this to be unusual, if not unprecedented.

Mr. Speaker: I will look into that, but I am not responsible for what the BBC transmits, thank goodness.

Mr. Mullin: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The House is responsible for feeding the sound downstairs to the BBC. Therefore, it is not a matter for the BBC.

Mr. Speaker: I will look into the matter.

BILL PRESENTED

PUBLIC UTILITY TRANSFERS AND WATER CHARGES

Mr. Secretary Ridley, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Walker, Mr. Kenneth Clarke, Mr. John MacGregor, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Mr. Secretary Parkinson, Mr. Colin Moynihan and Mr. Michael Spicer, presented a Bill to confer powers on water authorities, electricity boards and the Electricity Council to act in relation to proposals for the transfer of any of the property or functions of water authorities or electricity boards to other bodies corporate; and to make provision for and in connection with the fixing of charges by water undertakers: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 10.]

DUCHY OF LANCASTER BILL

Resolved,

That the Duchy of Lancaster Bill be referred to a Second Reading Committee.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

Further considered in Committee

[SIR PAUL DEAN in the Chair.]

Clause 80

ROLL-OVER RELIEF NOT AVAILABLE FOR GAINS ON OIL LICENCES

5.19 pm

Sir William Clark (Croydon, South): I beg to move amendment No. 48, in page 45, line 40, leave out from 'not' to 'an' in line 41.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 63, in page 45, line 45, leave out subsection (2) and insert—

'(2) This section has effect in respect of gains or disposals made on or after 14th May 1987.'.

No. 49, in page 45, line 45, leave out subsection (2).

Sir William Clark: This amendment relates to roll-over relief. It is available to most industries in our fiscal system. Rio Tinto-Zinc challenged the Inland Revenue over whether it could deny roll-over relief, and took it before the special commissioners. The case related to the oil industry. The special commissioners ruled that RTZ was entitled to roll-over relief. The Inland Revenue then said, "All right, we will alter the law." If the Inland Revenue wishes to do that, it is fine, but I regret the fact that the Bill states that roll-over relief was never available to the oil industry. This is retrospective legislation.

If a Labour Government had introduced retrospective legislation, we would be screaming blue murder. Ministers should alter this clause, preferably as I have suggested in amendments Nos. 48 and 49. Roll-over relief is available to other industries, and I do not understand why the oil industry should be singled out for this penal treatment.

It is said that, since the Government grant licences to oil companies, they are entitled not to allow them some fiscal advantage which is available to other industries. That cannot be correct. Although the Government issue licences to the oil companies, private enterprise exploits those licences. Had it not been for private money, North sea oil would not have been developed as quickly as it has been developed over the years. If the clause remains as it is, it will have an inhibiting effect on oil exploration in the future, which would be detrimental to our economy. The retrospective element is bad.

I am heartened that one hon. Member said:

"In my view, it is a most unsatisfactory principle"

he was talking about retrospection

"because of the degree of uncertainty it introduces into the affairs of the business men of this country which we legislators so constantly exacerbate. If we establish this principle of retrospection, we are on a slippery slope down which we shall be heading like Gadarene lemmings, and I am delighted to be on this side of the Committee in opposing the principle."

[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 6 June 1978, c. 747.]

That was said by my hon. Friend the Paymaster-General. I know that he will not have changed his mind. Nor will my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who said yesterday in a debate on another clause that he was diametrically opposed to retrospection. At least two Treasury Ministers are on record as saying that they oppose retrospection.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): Does my hon. Friend recall the debates on the Finance Act 1975, which introduced capital transfer tax, and the complaints from Conservative Members that the tax would apply from the date of its announcement but the details of which would not be revealed until 18 months later?

Sir William Clark: My hon. Friend reinforces the point that I am trying to make, and I am grateful to him for jogging my memory and that of other members of the Committee. The Conservative party has always turned its face against retrospection. Perhaps the Government will say that the clause will not affect any company which has appealed before the date of Royal Assent, but only one company would be involved in that—Rio Tinto-Zinc—and the judgment was in its favour.

What has happened to the other oil companies? When there is some disagreement between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue, it is a well-known practice to send the case to the commissioners as a test case. Other taxpayers wait until the result of that test case is known before doing anything about it. Indeed, when a case is pending, the Inland Revenue—it might be too brutal to say that it drags its feet—is in no hurry to settle the disagreement between it and the taxpayer. I hope that my hon. Friend will not argue that the oil companies had the opportunity to appeal. This is the test case principle.

This matter is fundamental to the philosophy of the Conservative party and the Government. I agree with my hon. Friend the Paymaster-General and my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary that in no circumstances should we have an element of retrospection. If the Government or the Inland Revenue wish to change their minds, they should change the law, but they should not make the law retrospective. I urge my right hon. and hon. Friends to remove the element of retrospection. I appreciate that time is short. Report stage of the Bill will be on Monday and Royal Assent must be obtained before the House rises next Friday. There may not be time to do as I suggest in this Finance Bill. But I hope that my hon. Friends will assure me that the Government will take the matter seriously and include it in next year's Budget. If they do that, it must cover past and future roll-over relief.

I have kept my speech brief because we started late. I hope that the brevity of my speech will not militate against the seriousness with which my hon. Friend treats the matter.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): There is general agreement that clause 80 raises some important questions in relation to the oil industry and retrospection and the principles that should govern the House of Commons when considering whether to pass retrospective legislation.

We debated the principle of retrospection on an Opposition amendment to clause 62, but it is right to debate the matter again because there are significant differences between the considerations that affect clause 62 and those that affect clause 80. This case relates to the availability of roll-over relief for oil companies on the disposal of their business assets. In normal terms, the capital gains tax liability on the disposal of assets can be deferred or rolled over if the proceeds are used to acquire replacement assets. If a company sells its buildings, land or fixed plant or machinery, and uses the proceeds to purchase new land, buildings or fixed plant or machinery, roll-over relief is available. Deferral can usually be obtained until the replacement asset is disposed of.

The difficulty in relation to oil companies arises on what happens to their licences, especially the process that is called farming out licences. I am far from being an expert on the oil industry, but I understand that farming out operates as follows. The Department of Energy awards a licence to an oil company. That company will complete its initial working obligations, which might include the drilling of one or more exploration wells. It might not make an immediate commercial discovery, so, to share the risk of continuing exploration and discovery, it farms out a share of the licence to another company in return for the further drilling expenditure being paid by that "farmingee"—if I can use that ugly word. I did not coin that word. It was used by the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association.

5.30 pm

Company A may spend a certain amount of money on exploration, then decide to sell 50 per cent. of its licence to company B in return for company B spending a certain amount of money on further exploration work. The Revenue is insisting that company A, the original licensee, should pay immediate capital gains tax on the expenditure contributed by company B, the company to which the licence has been farmed out. That farm-out is considered to be a capital gain.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): Surely there is no capital gain. If a third company is brought in, that company will take over the obligations of the initial company that obtained the licence. At the development stage I can understand that profit will accrue, but such profit will not accrue at the exploration stage.

Mr. Blair: The hon. Gentleman may have misunderstood my argument. The Revenue considers that there is a capital gain, but the oil companies do not. That is the issue between them.

When company A farms out 50 per cent. of its licence, it does not get any cash. Therefore, the oil companies believe that there is no capital gain and that it is perfectly right to defer liability. We are aware that the Revenue takes a different view. However, I believe that a test case was referred to the special commissioners by RTZ and judgment was given in favour of the company.

Sir William Clark: I have already said that.

Mr. Blair: I was listening, but it is important that the issues are made clear.

It is not the case, as it was when we debated clause 62, that everyone had always agreed that a particular tax relief was not available, but then the special commissioners suddenly found a loophole so that that tax relief became available. The Financial Secretary argued for retrospection in clause 62 on that basis.

I understand that the oil companies have never accepted that they were not entitled to this relief. The oil companies' understanding puts this matter in a critically different position from other areas of retrospection. It is not as though the test case in front of the special commissioners suddenly discovered a loophole that no one believed existed before. The oil companies have always taken issue on this matter.

I welcome the Economic Secretary to this Finance Bill debate. If the oil companies have always argued that they should be entitled to this roll-over relief, the Minister cannot advance the same argument as was used in favour of clause 62. Many cases are pending, awaiting the outcome of the test case. The Revenue's position is curious because it takes a particular view. It will allow a case to go to a hearing. If it wins the case, it is perfectly happy, but, if it loses the case, it immediately introduces legislation to reverse the effect of that decision. What is the purpose of allowing the matter to go to court if the Revenue intends to introduce legislation reversing the effect of the decision, should it go against the Revenue? Many people are waiting to take their cases to court on the basis of the outcome of the test case. It is unfair that they should be prejudiced as a result of waiting for the test case to be heard.

Can the Minister give us an idea of the sums of money involved? I have always made it clear that we do not regard the principle of retrospection as absolute in the sense that we are prepared to support the principle if the sums of money involved are large or there are extenuating circumstances. There must be a balance between the principle of retrospection and the funds that are involved in a particular case. We want to know whether such extenuating circumstances exist in this particular case. Is this retrospection in clause 80 simply in accordance with what the law has always been perceived to be, or does it directly affect the interests of a group of people and make the law retrospective contrary to their understanding of the law over a period of 22 years? Those important points require an answer.

Sir Trevor Skeet: I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has revealed an important point of principle. It is not clear which side of the Committee is responsible for the initial error. I remember that many years ago the Burmah Oil company took its case to the House of Lords and succeeded. The result was that legislation was passed to reverse that decision. A decision on RTZ was taken by special commissioner Judge Patrick Medd in April 1987, but now that decision has been reversed.

Clause 80 has established an extremely bad principle for the international oil companies. Let us consider the case of Enterprise Oil, set up by the Government. In the countries where it operates licences abroad, whether it be Indonesia, the Netherlands, France, Italy, the United States or Canada, the farm-out of licences is not subject to tax. Therefore, it is not wise to establish a principle in the United Kingdom that can be avoided.

This is a difficult period for small operators in the North sea and elsewhere as a result of cumulative tax levels. The tax on revenues at marginal rates works out at about 86 per cent. The notional capital gains tax under clause 80 will be a deterrent to exploration.

The effect of a combination of falling prices, varying exchange rates and the escalating cost of equipment and services in the North sea has led to serious difficulties. In the past 12 months the price of crude oil has risen from $8 to $20 a barrel, but in sterling terms it has risen from £4·96 to £13. The smaller oil operators in the North sea have come out of the deal extremely badly. This is not the time to consider using capital gains tax in the way outlined in clause 80. The roll-over procedure, which was advocated many years ago, should be used.

The retrospective element has been adequately dealt with in previous debates. I do not believe that there has been any tax avoidance. A case was brought before the special commissioners, and I believe that the judgment reached was realistic and equitable. Since the mid-1970s there have been roughly 200 farm-outs, of which only about 12 cases have been settled. There will be appalling difficulties for the industry and for the Revenue if all those farm-outs have to be settled in the next two years. Indeed, cases can refer back to 1965 with subsequent complications.

I believe that the Treasury has failed to distinguish between farm-outs made during the exploration and appraisal period — that practice has accelerated the fullest exploitation of the North sea — and those made after the grant of annex B approvals at the beginning of development. If, for example, a company wants to sell an interest in the Forties field or wants to sell an interest in a production capacity to the Japanese it is right that it should fall for assessment for capital gains.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): I apologise to the Chairman and the Committee for not being present earlier. As we deal with the vexed question of annex Bs, can the hon. Gentleman, given his knowledge of the industry, tell us how many annex Bs are not applied for or are held up because of fears in relation to this clause?

Sir Trevor Skeet: I do not have the figures, and that fact can be put down to the Department of Energy. I should have thought that some had been held up, but not a great number. The Inland Revenue says that enormous profits can be made, but I believe that all this can be rendered nugatory.

The risks and the uncertainties inherent in making an assessment today on future problems are shown in the RTZ case. The Inland Revenue had calculated a profit of £18·46 million which would be shared by the consortium, RTZ's share being £7·1 million, based on 35 per cent. interest. Those are fantastic figures and I dare say were matters of negotiation between the parties. On further assessment, the revised figures were £150,000, RTZ's share being £48,000. The arrangement that the Inland Revenue uses for its computations may impress hon. Members, civil servants and others, but it is pure guesswork. If it is pure guesswork, there is no reason why the exploratory elements operating in the North sea should be affected by it.

I should like to emphasise some further points. There is no real gain at the exploratory stage if a licence is farmed out from A to B, because B will have to put in the money to develop the field. In many cases, there will be no discovery. If, as in one in 10 cases, there is a good discovery, it may mean that the field will be productive for the benefit of all. With roll-over, when earnings begin to materialise, the company will be in a position to pay. Front-end loading or commitment is totally unrealistic in respect of legislation. Front-end loading affects the cash flow of the smaller firms much more than the bigger ones. It is much more equitable for demands for CGT projections to be carried forward to the time when the fields come into operation. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary will consider my remarks carefully and bring about changes next year.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I shall make a brief contribution because many of the points have been made. There are two issues at stake. The first concerns retrospective legislation. During last night's debate on clause 62, the Financial Secretary made it clear that the Government did not like retrospective legislation and that only in certain circumstances would it be a good idea. One of his key points was about the fact that the taxation commissioners had overturned what he described as the "generally understood" position. The Financial Secretary made that point no fewer than seven times in his contribution on clause 62. He used "generally understood" twice, "widely accepted" four times and "accepted" once.

As I said yesterday evening, I do not understand how the Government can possibly maintain their position on clause 80 if they follow the arguments used on clause 62. Whatever the rights and wrongs of this clause, there is no question but that there was substantial controversy about whether farm-ins were eligible for roll-over relief on capital gains taxation. It was not a "generally understood" position. If there were such a position, the industry would have felt that roll-over relief was available at least for certain types of farm-ins. If there is consistency in the Government's position on clauses 62 and 80, they will have the grace to withdraw or amend clause 80.

The second issue is whether this is the right moment to tighten oil taxation. We have heard some oil price figures, but we should also consider the number of exploration and appraisal wells drilled. At the end of last month 22 exploration and appraisal wells were being drilled, substantially more than in the spring this year, when there were only 13. The number is much less than at the end of 1985, when the total was 50.

5.45 pm

The industry is in a severe state. Part of the responsibility must lie with the Government's headlong and unwise pursuit of low international oil prices. [Interruption.] The Government encouraged and welcomed the decline in world oil prices. That was a mistaken policy for a major oil producer.

At this time it is unwise further to tighten oil taxation and further to restrict the necessary flexibility of people farming in to oil licences. In a previous incarnation the Economic Secretary knew something about this industry, so surely he accepts that it is a good idea to have this flexibility. If a company has fulfilled its obligation and been encouraged by the wells drilled, although no definite discovery has been made, it is a good thing for another company to be allowed to introduce new capital for further exploration wells. Surely the Government do not want to reduce flexibility and lessen the ability of other companies, especially small ones, to have particular licences, discover new fields and therefore secure the industry's future. I very much hope that, given those arguments, the Government will revise their position.

Mr. Michael Morris (Northampton, South): I support the submission of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). My right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary should be under no illusion that the oil industry believes that this is a not a very cumulative tax. Add to that the retrospective element, which goes back 22 years — it has not just happened in the past year or 18 months — and there is a double problem. I think that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor will recall, if he is prompted by my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary, that when he was Secretary of State for Energy he commented to the Treasury that the implementation of the advance petroleum revenue tax was wrong in terms of its timing and measures. The Treasury did not listen but, 12 months later, it changed the law because it found that the oil industry was right and that the effects were detrimental to the industry.

We are interested in further exploration in the North sea. Farming out has been a practice in some parts of the world, especially in the North sea, for years. The practice is not only well proven but helps small companies and British companies. If clause 80 remains as it is, the major companies will not be adversely affected. The Shells, BPs and Amocos of this world will be able to shrug it aside and carry on, but the British companies and small companies —the very ones that we want to develop—will lose. I very much hope that my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary has listened to the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): I can be relatively brief because many of the arguments have already been deployed.

The Committee is indebted to the hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) for tabling these amendments, although I did not think that it was entirely gracious of him to seek to take the credit for the development of our offshore industry purely for private enterprise. He may well be more interested in taxation than in energy, but he should recognise that the public sector has been involved substantially. This is not an amendment or a cause that should be approached in quite so partisan a fashion, but it is right that we should consider the matter seriously.

The fact that the response appears to have been rushed is serious. It is a rather spiteful and swift response, not made at a gracious speed, to a decision by the special commissioners that the Government find discomfiting. It certainly does not seem entirely reasonable that the measure should have been rushed through in this way without, apparently, adequate consultation with the industry. I am beginning to wonder—perhaps the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) shares my concern, to judge from his comments — whether the Treasury consulted the Department of Energy at all. The effect of the measure would surely run contrary to the interest and policy that have long been adopted by that Department. Its effect has already been described by the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) and other hon. Members, who recognise that the effect of the clause, if unchanged, will be to reduce the level of offshore activity.

My concern is not really a fiscal one, but has to do with energy policy. The Government have an obligation to ensure that we maximise the levels of extractions from each field in the North sea. That requires substantial investment. A tax policy that deters investment will mean that the amount of oil that we extract will fall. While oil prices have risen, though not, perhaps, on the significant scale that some hon. Members may have expected, the Minister cannot deny—he has experience of this—that oil prices in the 1990s will rise more substantially than they have in the past year or two. If that is the case, the Government should try to ensure that such a level of investment is maintained offshore as guarantees the encouragement of tertiary extraction, orders for British industry and technology and the opportunity for British companies to which hon. Members have referred.

All those aims will be embarrassed if the Government go ahead with this rather draconian step of retrospection. The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) may be much more opposed to the principle of taxation than I am; perhaps I take a more austere view of the cause of taxation than he does. While I accept that retrospection seems harsh and, accompanied by inadequate consultation, it is even more severe, I believe that the Government may well be giving my hon. Friends and me some ideas. The prospect of retrospection is obviously alien to a civilised society. On the other hand, I suppose that a new approach to the wealth tax, accompanied by some retrospective arrangement, might have some attractions, although I do not suggest that the Minister withdraw his clause for fear of that prospect.

However, I suggest that the Minister does not go ahead with the proposals until there has been adequate consultation with the oil industry and the Department of Energy to establish what the estimated effect of the measure is in terms of long-term energy policy and of maintaining a viable offshore industry. If the Minister examines the matter from that standpoint, he will make significant changes to the clause. If not, the Government will stand accused—with justification—of acting in a high-handed and draconian manner that is contrary to the best interests of sensible energy planning and development in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): I support the amendment moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark). Indeed, I could hardly fail to do so, having been a member of the Energy Select Committee in the last Parliament that spent the six months in the run-up to the election on a detailed and intensive study of the North sea oil industry, the effects of the lower oil price on declining activity in the industry and the problems facing it. We made a great many detailed proposals and recommendations and we are still waiting for a response from the Government. Naturally, we hope that the response in the Budget is not their only one.

One thing emerged clearly from that detailed report. We took a great deal of evidence, including evidence from the Treasury and the Department of Energy. Although the fiscal regime was, in our view, reasonably fair at that time, we made one specific recommendation that relates closely to the amendment. The report was published during the general election and has probably not been fully noticed yet by the House, but it certainly will have been noticed by my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench, even if the Treasury has not taken much notice of it. Our report is certainly relevant to the amendment:

> "Although the system of North Sea taxation is not the one which, with hindsight, might be most desirable, we have no fundamental criticisms to make except to emphasise the need for the Treasury constantly to watch developments in the rest of the world and to ensure that North Sea taxation is never a disincentive to activity. During the present critical period, the government, if anything, should err on the side of the taxpayers rather than the Revenue. We broadly welcome the two concessions contained in the 1987 Budget, though we believe that it is arguable that both should have been somewhat more generous in the broad national interest."

We now find that, at the last moment, the Treasury appears to have thrown in, not only retrospectively, but in a rather penny-pinching manner, a proposal that will undoubtedly have a damaging effect on continuing exploration activity. In view of the long lead times required and the slow-down in investment in the North sea that has already taken place, what is needed now, if anything, is a little pump priming by the Treasury rather than disincentives.

The retrospective nature of the measure is bad enough. My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Treasury are well aware of the detailed workings of the oil industry; they understand what farm-outs are about, and that they are as much a part of the oil industry structure as, for example, reinsurance and some underwriting are at Lloyds, or partnerships or consortia are in the rest of industry. However, the Revenue does not seem to understand that. To propose to tax farm-outs for capital gains before the true nature of the reserves of oil have been proved as economic seems ludicrous. The proposal is unacceptable not only because it is retrospective, but because it would undoubtedly hinder further development in the North sea.

The whole of clause 80 should be deleted until there has been more meaningful discussion with the oil industry to find a compromise. There are certainly plenty of precedents for proper negotiation, and the oil industry has always been prepared to come up with a compromise solution. In this case, it appears that the industry has not been properly consulted. Without amending or deleting clause 80, we shall be imposing a tax on the transfer of licences in cases in which no commercial discovery has yet been made in a way that will undoubtedly provide a major disincentive to further development. If there is not a major concession on this point, drilling activity will decline in precisely those critical years when we should be accelerating development in order to maintain self-sufficiency for the United Kingdom. If there is not a major rethink by the Treasury, the proposal will be not only counter-productive, but a penny-pinching, badly timed measure that is contrary to the best national interest.

Mr. Douglas: I shall be extremely brief and I apologise again to the Committee for my lack of attendance.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury should know better, because he has had deep experience of the Department of Energy, and he knows that there are distinct differences between exploration and appraisal and the development stage. What would one be trying to do, either from the point of view of the nation's industrial and commercial interests or from that of future tax revenue? The measure would tie the oil companies at the exploration and appraisal stage. This clause is a backward step and would restrict exploration.

I am not saying that the oil companies are not slick chicks and know how to manipulate taxation. On occasion the Government have been too generous in their taxation policy; I have made that plain. We are talking about trying to entice companies to specific licences in cases where either the consortium as a whole or one or two members on the licence have said, "We have carried out our exploration drilling, but we are in some difficulty and cannot go forward because of cash flow." They then look round to see if they can find someone who will come in. The company that comes in will not necessarily invest cash but may do something in kind. It will drill a couple of holes and get a share of the licence. That is totally in the national interest and seems a sensible way to proceed.

I take it that all hon. Members received a note from the United Kingdom Offshore Operators Association. It talks about companies A and B and says:

"'A' should pay immediate capital gains tax on the £10m expenditure contributed by 'B', which is considered to be a gain by 'A' on 50 per cent. licence disposal to 'B'."

Does the company pay on the total £10 million? We must be clear about that.

There is another vexatious problem about which one of the Ministers in the Department certainly ought to know better. Annex Bs are not given away like Omo gift coupons. They have to be analysed in great detail by the Department and the operator or the consortium that is operating the licence. It surprises me that apparently there have been no discussions on this matter between the Department of Energy and the Treasury. I plead with the Government, in the interests not only of the oil companies but of ensuring a much more even development of the North sea, to examine these matters and to have discussions with the oil companies. There is ample precedent for this.

The original Bill on oil taxation was moved by Edmund Dell and envisaged that tax procedures did not start immediately. If my memory serves me right, they started at clause 10 which gave more time for discussion with the oil companies. That was under a Labour Government.

These are delicate and difficult matters and the Minister will not cave in all at once under the pressure of the points that have been made. There are good technical and national reasons and long-term taxation advantages for not inhibiting the oil companies. If they are inhibited, it will inhibit the eventual tax flow from the development of the fields. The Government ought to know better and ought to behave much more sensibly.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): I join other hon. Members in thanking my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) for giving the Committee the chance to debate the two most crucial aspects that are raised by the clause. They are obviously matters of concern to hon. Members in all parts of the Committee. They are the issue of retrospection and the question whether the refusal of roll-over relief inhibits exploration activity. I shall begin by discussing retrospection.

Both the Inland Revenue and the oil industry have proceeded for a number of years on the basis that oil licences did not qualify for capital gains roll-over relief. The industry did not like this situation. Indeed, it lobbied annually for the law to be changed to make gains on oil licences eligible for such relief. However, the very fact that such lobbying efforts were made illustrates that there was broad agreement about what the law was – if not about what it ought to be. For example, before the 1983 Budget the United Kingdom Offshore Oil Industry Tax Committee wrote to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor saying:

"CG rollover relief is not available under Sections 115-121 CGTA 1979 for a capital gain accruing on disposal of an interest in a petroleum licence . . . UKOITC propose therefore that the law be amended."

Similar representations have been made by either Brindex or UKOITC before almost every Budget since then. In previous Finance Bills, my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South has put down amendments to change the law on these lines, as have my hon. Friends the Members for Havant, (Sir I. Lloyd), for Devon, North (Mr. Speller), for Wansdyke (Mr. Aspinwall), and for Bedford, North (Sir T. Skeet).

There has been broad agreement about what the law is. The hon. Members for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) and for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) said that there was considerable uncertainty about the law. I think that they were referring to another aspect of the capital gains law as it applies to oil licences. It is whether a gain arises on the transfer of an interest in an oil licence when no cash changes hands. That was in dispute until fairly recently, but a settlement was reached and the parties to the settlement agreed that a gain did arise and settled with the Revenue.

Only one company continued to pursue a case with the special commissioners and, as has been recognised, that was Rio Tinto-Zinc. It pursued the separate point about whether such a gain was eligible for roll-over relief. The resultant decision by the special commissioners casts doubt on this long-established application of the law. In that case, the special commissioners determined that an oil licence could qualiy for roll-over relief. Of course, a ruling by the special commissioners applies only to the specific case from which it arose and could be reversed in a higher court. To allow the matter to proceed through the courts would mean a long period of uncertainty and litigation until the courts had determined whether, and if so in what circumstances, gains on oil licence transfers are eligible for roll-over relief. Therefore, the Government announced on 14 May their intention to introduce clause 80 to establish the legal situation beyond doubt.

I well understand the odium that attaches to the word "retrospection". Changes in the law which retrospectively upset the established and accepted legal basis on which people have planned their lives clearly are odious. However, the clause has no such disruptive effect. On the contrary, it reaffirms the legal validity of the established and accepted understanding on which the industry and the Revenue have planned their affairs up to now.

About £150 million of tax on past gains is at stake. The bulk of this arose from a comparatively small number of sales of interests in developed fields. If these amendments were accepted, they could possibly give rise to an unexpected windfall gain to the companies that sold their interests in a field, and a corresponding windfall loss to the Exchequer and taxpayers. That is not right.

Mr. Douglas: The Economic Secretary should look carefully at the words that he is using. He spoke about "interests in developed fields." A cash flow could be available. It seems that the Minister is asking for tax to be paid at the exploration and appraisal stage and not at the development stage. There is a substantial difference.

Mr. Lilley: That is an important point, and it is an important distinction that has arisen in the debate. As I recall, no hon. Member, nor the industry, has ever argued that there would be any economic benefit or industrial gain from allowing roll-over relief on developed fields. The practical consequences of capital gains tax roll-over relief on oil exploration are restricted to exploration licences.

My hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, South, for Bedfordshire, North, for Northampton, South (Mr. Morris) and many other hon. Members have drawn this distinction, as has the industry, and they have argued that the lack of roll-over relief may inhibit transfers of interest during the exploration stage. I agree that such transfers can be beneficial. It is in the public interest that licences be in the hands of those who are most enthusiastic to develop them and who have the cash to do so.

Sir Trevor Skeet: My hon. Friend has used a very blunt instrument — the Finance Bill — to bring about the change. What happens to the other 50 or 70 prospective claimants who feel that they have a case but who are not as lucky as RTZ? Will they lose out?

Mr. Lilley: If my hon. Friend will contain himself, he may find that there is good news in store for them.

It is desirable that there is no unnatural inhibition of transfers at the exploration stage, not only because we want licences to be in the hands of those who have the greatest interest in developing them and the greatest ability so to do, but so that companies can spread the risk where appropriate.

My hon. Friends pointed out that, typically in these cases, no cash gain arises when a company farms-out in return for the farmer-in agreeing to undertake a programme of work on the block.

Having listened carefully to what hon. Members and the industry have said in the consultations that we have had recently, I am persuaded that a distinction could be made. However, it is not one that can sensibly be sorted out in the compass of this Finance Bill. Accordingly, while we believe that clause 80 should be enacted unamended, I propose to discuss further with the industry over the coming months the possibility of introducing some form of roll-over relief for gains, past and present, on work programme farm-outs at the exploration phase where no cash profit is realised. If those discussions are fruitful, and I cannot guarantee that they will be, the legislation could not be introduced until the spring 1988 Finance Bill.

I hope that my hon. Friends the Members for Croydon, South, Bedfordshire, North, Northampton, South and Erewash (Mr. Rost), as well as Opposition Members, will find that this goes some way towards meeting the points that they have made, and that it will reflect not only the work that they have done on the clause this year, but the efforts that they have made in previous years to obtain such relief. I hope that in the light of that my two hon. Friends who have tabled amendments will feel inclined not to press them.

Before I sit down I shall respond to some of the points that have arisen in the debate. It was suggested that the oil industry is not entitled to roll-over relief, but that is not the case. Roll-over relief is available for plant and equipment in the North sea. It is only in regard to oil licences that there has been a general understanding that it was not available.

Another point was whether the RTZ case that was before the special commissioners was a test case. It was not in any sense a test case. The other parties that had been involved in the earlier case as to whether a gain arose had settled, accepted that it did and had not pursued the question whether they were entitled to roll-over relief. As far as I know, there are no outstanding claims for roll-over relief from any company in the North sea, other than the company that is protected by a subsection of the clause.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North suggested that as a result of the main provisions of clause 80 the law would be affected as far back as 1965. Because there is normally only a six-year period during which back claims can be made, it merely alters the situation for the past six years. If the potential concession that I have announced is satisfactorily agreed, that would apply only to roll-over relief on developed fields.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North also mentioned that gains at the exploration stage were guesswork. There is an element of estimation, but, as a result of the change in the process of estimating gains that has recently been announced by the Inland Revenue, partly following the settlement relating to whether gains arose, the measured gain will be smaller than was previously thought to be the case.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) asked whether UKOOA's statement that oil companies would have to pay the full £10 million was correct. Under the recently revised method of valuing farm-out concessions, that is not correct. It may become hypothetical or academic, but they will be liable only for a fraction of the £10 million, which reflects the probability of success.

My hon. Friend the Member for Erewash mentioned the Select Committee report, in which he played a distinguished part. The Treasury has found that valuable and we have read it with care. He will note that the representations that were made to him confirm the general point that I was making, that the industry did not have any doubts about the existence of the law on roll-over relief and that it did not express any doubts about the uncertainty attached to it. That reinforces the general point that I was making with regard to retrospection.

I hope that that covers most of the specific points that have been made.

Mr. Michael Grylls (Surrey, North-West): The concession that my hon. Friend has given is helpful and practical. In view of that, I do not intend to pursue my amendment. It has been a useful debate and the House is grateful to my hon. Friend for what he has said.

Sir William Clark: We have had an interesting debate and it has shown the advantage and value of such debates.

As the House knows, I am a consultant to Texaco. These debates are valuable because they demonstrate how the implications, technicalities and fiscal changes that harm the industry are sometimes overlooked by the Inland Revenue. I say that with the greatest respect to the Revenue and I am not trying to denigrate it in any way.

With regard to retrospection, the assurances that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has given go a long way. In view of the unequivocal assurance that in next year's Budget we will have a clause that gives roll-over relief to the exploration element of the industry and that it will not only apply from 1988, I beg to ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 80 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 81

COMMODITY AND FINANCIAL FUTURES AND OPTIONS

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: I have a brief question on clause 81. It concerns the gains that are made on over-the-counter options and on the futures exchange. As I understand it, over-the-counter options mean the grey market in these options or in futures. The Economic Secretary will tell me whether that is right or wrong. Whereas these were previously taxed as income under case VI of schedule D, they will now be taxed as capital gains, which is a more beneficial tax treatment for the investor. Is the Economic Secretary aware of the cost of that tax change? Will he tell us why this has been brought forward now, bringing the over-the-counter options in line with the law on other options, and why it was not done before?

Mr. Lilley: I am sure that the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) was not intending to cast aspersions on the over-the-counter market by suggesting that it was grey. The distinction is between options carried out on a recognised exchange and those that are usually tailor-made and not regularly traded on an exchange but worked out for particular customers. There has been a distinction in the tax treatment between the two, partly because the tax treatment of traded options was related to the fact that they were traded on an exchange.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the cost. I understand that the cost of the change will be negligible. None the less, it will be beneficial to those who produce the tailor-made options. The reason for introducing this clause now is that it is possible to follow the provisions of the Financial Services Act 1986 in regulating these sorts of options and to use that framework to extend the tax treatment presently accorded only to those on exchanges to the tailor-made options as well. For that reason, the clause will not come into effect until the Financial Services Act regulatory framework is in force.

Clause 82 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 83

FAILURE TO MAKE RETURN FOR CORPORATION TAX

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: It may be helpful if I say one or two words about this part of the Bill, which will introduce a system of automatic penalties in relation to corporation tax and the pay-and-file system in an attempt to introduce some of the recommendations of the Keith committee. In essence, we support the structure of the scheme and have no objection to it. It will mean that the payment of corporation tax is speeded up and, therefore, that the tax system will work more efficiently.

I want to return to something that we raised on several occasions when we were debating value added tax and the proposals of the Keith committee in relation to that, the absence of any power of mitigation in relation to the fines that will be imposed. There may be amendments to clause 84 that raise a similar point, so perhaps I can speak about that later.

One of the great dangers of introducing a system of automatic penalties without mitigation is that the justice that we are introducing is a little rough. We have had the experience of the value added tax system of automatic penalties being applied without any process of mitigation being allowed. It is fair to say that that has caused widespread concern. The Opposition have made several attempts to secure some provision for mitigation of those penalties. Our pleas have fallen on deaf ears so far. I should be grateful if the Minister can tell us whether similar representations have been made in relation to the penalties to be introduced for corporation tax. Will he explain exactly why we cannot allow some system of mitigation when, especially with corporation tax, we could be dealing with large sums of money? There is a basic principle that if penalties are to be imposed there should be some attempt to allow a board of commissioners to consider mitigation in circumstances where it is clear that the offence was the result of inadvertence. The difficulty now is that businesses may be subject to considerable fines without mitigation being available. That cannot be in the interests of anybody. I would be grateful if the Minister would respond to that.

As I said, we are generally in favour of the structure of the implementation of the proposals, but the absence of a power of mitigation is a grave drawback to the corporation tax proposals in the same way as it was for value added tax.

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I support my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) in all that he said. It is convenient for the Revenue or, in the case of VAT the Customs and Excise, to have these standard penalties inserted into the legislation. However, as my hon. Friend has said, they can sometimes operate unfairly where there is no demonstrable offence or negligence on the part of the taxpayer but where there may simply be inadvertent neglect, if one can use that expression.

The absence of mitigation is a fault in the legislation. What my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield said about VAT is true. The fixed penalties have given rise to considerable concern. I hope that we shall have some indication from the Minister this evening that the question will be looked at again and not only in relation to this clause.

Mr. Lilley: I welcome the support from the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) for the general structure of pay and file which will be a considerable advance for taxpayers when it is introduced, although that will not be until April 1992. It is intended to overcome the incredibly complex problems in the existing system where there is no direct obligation on companies to file their accounts. About two thirds of companies go to appeal before accounts are extracted from them by the Inland Revenue. It is possible to make an assessment only then.

We have decided to simplify that by introducing pay and file, the essential principles of which are that companies will have an obligation to file their accounts within 12 months of the end of the accounting period. After nine months they will have an obligation to pay their self-assessment of tax due. Interest will be earned if they overpay when the final assessment is made and interest will be incurred if they have underpaid in their original assessment.

It is important that we move to automatic filing of accounts so that the Revenue can reach an agreed assessment of the tax due. To achieve that, it is necessary to have fixed penalties. A phased system of penalties is proposed. After a delay of between 12 and 15 months the penalty will be £100 flat rate. After a delay of between 15 and 18 months the penalty will be £200, after 18 months and up to two years it will be £200, plus 10 per cent. of the underpayment of tax when eventually worked out, and after two years it is 20 per cent. of the underpayment of tax.

We have avoided mitigation for three reasons.

Mr. Blair: Is it not the case that there can be automatic filing and automatic penalties and that that can still lie easily with a system of mitigation? Is it not the case that, if a small company were to make a tax return incorrectly, it could still be subject to stringent and draconian penalties?

Mr. Lilley: These clauses deal solely with the filing, not the payment. Any penalties that arise out of the clauses are due to late filing. The system of penalties relates to that. There is not so much of a problem with over and under assessment because that is dealt with by the automatic interest payments. In any case, that is dealt with in later clauses of the Bill. Therefore, we are dealing with penalties for late filing of accounts to the Revenue.

Powers of mitigation have been avoided for three reasons. First, companies have the right to plead reasonable excuse for not filing their accounts. If that is proved, there will be no penalty, assuming that they eventually get round to filing accounts. Secondly, we have set the maximum penalty below that suggested by the Keith committee. Thirdly, the penalty is lower than that which is theoretically available under the present system, which could be as high as 100 per cent. of the tax underpaid.

Because we wish to avoid a situation in which everyone goes to appeal, we cannot have a system of mitigation. If it were open to the special commissioners to mitigate the penalty, there would be nothing to stop everyone lodging an appeal on the offchance and we should be back in the present situation in which 430,000 appeals are lodged every year.

Mr. Blair: The argument that if mitigation is allowed everyone will wish to mitigate is the classic argument of bureaucracy, and we should be extremely cautious about accepting it without challenge. The same could be applied to the "reasonable excuse" get-out. On the whole, people do not seek to use such provisions if they have no argument to put. It is argued that the way to deter appeals is to have a system of automatic penalties without the power of mitigation, but one must balance the interests of the Exchequer in getting the tax in properly with those of the taxpayer.

In relation to VAT, there have undoubtedly been cases of real and substantial injustice, to the extent that the president of the VAT tribunal has said that the law should be changed to allow for a power of mitigation. That tribunal does not expect to be flooded with unnecessary appeals as a result. I wish to put down a marker about this as we have raised the matter many times before and will doubtless do so many times again. We must be careful of moving to a situation in which bodies have power to levy substantial penalties but in which there is no power to graduate the amount of penalty according to the turpitude to the offence.

Mr. Lilley: As I said, the penalty is automatically graduated in terms of the delay in filing the accounts. As delay is the essence of the offence, there is an element of automatic graduation.

The experience with VAT has given rise to the hon. Gentleman's concern. He will know that a review of that system has been promised in advance of the 1988 Finance Bill. Doubtless any lessons which come out of that review will be taken into account in a wider context.

Mr. Millan: The Minister says that the taxpayer could plead reasonable excuse, but I do not see that in the clause. Could the Minister say where it appears?

Mr. Lilley: It is a feature of the Taxes Management Act and is automatically incorporated in this.

Mr. Blair: The Minister referred to the review in relation to VAT. Was he implying that the lessons of that review would be applied to automatic penalties in relation to corporation tax?

Mr. Lilley: They would not be applied unless there were a logical relationship leading us to do so, but clearly we take all reasonable matters into account all the time.

Sir William Clark: The taxpayer may plead reasonable excuse, but the Inland Revenue will be judge and jury in deciding whether the excuse is reasonable. I shall deal with mitigation on a subsequent amendment. Under this clause the penalty is imposed for failure to file accounts, but there is no pressure on the Inland Revenue to agree the computation within a certain period. Given the current backlog of work, is my hon. Friend satisfied that when these provisions become operative the Inland Revenue will be able to deal expeditiously with the accounts?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is correct. In the first instance, the Inland Revenue will decide whether an excuse is reasonable. However, if a company objects to that ruling, it can appeal to the commissioners. It can take the matter to appeal on the question of reasonable excuse.

Under the pay-and-file system, there will be an incentive for the Inland Revenue to deal with matters expeditiously because if a company has overpaid the Inland Revenue will have to pay interest on the money that turns out to have been paid in excess of the due assessment.

Clause 84

ASSESSMENT OF AMOUNTS DUE BY WAY OF PENALTY

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 60, in page 53, line 1, leave out from 'assessment' to the end of line 7 and insert—

'or may reduce it to such an amount as they consider appropriate having regard to the provisions of that section and all the circumstances of the case; and

(b) if it appears to them having regard to all the circumstances of the case that no penalty ought to be awarded, may set the assessment aside.'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. James Lamond): With this it will convenient to take amendment No. 61, in page 53, line 7, at end insert—

'(6A) In any appeal against an assessment by way of penalty under section 94 of the Management Act unless the Commissioners are satisfied on the basis of lawful evidence provided by the inspector or any representative of the Board and by or on behalf of the taxpayer that a penalty has been incurred they shall set the assessment aside.'.

Sir William Clark: The amendments need not delay us for long, because much of the ground was covered by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) in the previous debate.

There is no power for anyone to mitigate the various fines, although I appreciate that there is some scaling of the fines in relation to the delay in filing accounts. In the recent VAT tribunal case of Gailey, Jackson and Pook, the chairman of the tribunal described section 15 of the Finance Act 1985, which contains the automatic penalty provisions, as follows:

"The section is draconian in that it imposes a penalty of 30 per cent. without power to any authority to mitigate, without reference to the amount of tax lost to the state and, indeed, without reference to the justice of the matter".

That is a severe indictment of fixed penalties, because all cases are not the same. I accept that interest will be payable in the event of overpayment or underpayment, but I do not accept the argument that thousands of people would appeal if mitigation were possible. They do not do so in the normal course of events when assessments are made under the present system. People do not automatically appeal in relation to ordinary computations. They may appeal to protect their position, but very few cases go to the special commissioners or to the general commissioners. The matter is settled before the appeal comes up. A case goes to the commissioners only if the taxpayer appeals against an assessment but does not provide accounts and cannot prove that the assessment is wrong.

In all justice, it is a bit much for my hon. Friend the Minister to say that there is to be no mitigation of penalties simply because the Government or the Revenue believe that everyone would appeal. That has not happened in practice, and I see no reason why it should now.

On amendment No. 61, if one appeals against an assessment in the normal course of events, it is up to the taxpayer to prove why that assessment is wrong. If the Revenue, under the penalty procedure, says that there is a penalty and makes an assessment of that penalty, does the Revenue have to prove it, or does the taxpayer have to disprove it?

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend referred to a criticism that applied to the original Keith committee recommendations, rather than to the modified version incorporated in these provisions. We have responded to that criticism by reducing the maximum proposed penalty from 30 to 20 per cent. of outstanding tax and by increasing the time before it becomes applicable. Therefore, a longer delay is allowed before any penalty comes into force for the non-filing of accounts, and the penalty is less than it was. Theoretically, the present maximum penalty is up to 100 per cent. of tax and obviously that is much more liable to require some degree of mitigation.

Sir William Clark: The chairman of the tribunal said that 30 per cent. was draconian. My hon. Friend says that it has been reduced to 20 per cent., but that is still draconian.

Mr. Lilley: Clearly it is less so, and it becomes applicable much later. This problem of appeal which my hon. Friend suggests is unlikely to be serious could become important and there could be widespread appeals. The practice of going to appeal already stands at about 400,000 cases a year, so we are not talking about small numbers of people who are in the habit of appealing. We cannot be sure that they would not continue this habit even under a regime where it was less appropriate.

Mr. Blair: We must be a little careful. The Economic Secretary talks about people in the unfortunate habit of appealing, but they are perfectly entitled to appeal if they feel that their interests have not been properly considered. We should not necessarily think that everyone who appeals is attempting to abuse the procedures.

The two amendments deal with the question of litigation and we have substantially dealt with that, but I wish to pursue a matter arising from amendment No. 61. I thought that in effect the commissioners, on appeal, would have to be satisfied that a penalty should have been incurred. I should be grateful if the Minister could tell me whether that is the case. Or is it the case that at present the duty is on the taxpayer to show that a penalty should not be incurred?

Mr. Lilley: When the hon. Gentleman said "at present", did he mean in the clause as it stands, or under the present regime?

Mr. Blair: Under the amendment.

Mr. Lilley: I am not criticising the practice of appealing. It is almost built into the present structure of corporation tax and it has become established practice. However, I would regret its continuing under the new system, because it is partly to avoid the necessity of that that we are introducing pay and file. It would be sad to create a new system under which appealing was legitimate and so people did it. If mitigation was built in, obviously it would be open to people to lodge an appeal, because they would stand some chance of having their penalty mitigated. They stand to lose nothing, except in trivial cases where the cost of lodging an appeal may not be worth it.

In answer to the question about the onus of proof, the Revenue must prove that a penalty is applicable. It must demonstrate that the filing had not been made by the relevant time. In that regard, the amendment probably has no effect. I can reassure my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) that the onus of proof remains where it is now and the Inland Revenue will have to prove that it has gone through the relevant processes of showing that a penalty is applicable.

The amendment could require the Inland Revenue—it would depend on how the amendments were interpreted by the courts—to prove, for example in the event of a plea of reasonable excuse, that the company had no reasonable excuse: that is, not that a specific excuse was not reasonable, but that it had gone through all reasonable conceivable excuses and could prove that the company did not have one. Obviously, that would be extremely unsatisfactory, and I am sure that it is not the intended consequence of my hon. Friend's amendment.

Sir William Clark: In view of the current investigation and review, which will be completed before the next Budget, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 84 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 85 and 86 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 87

INTEREST ON TAX OVERPAID

Sir William Clark: I beg to move amendment No. 25, in page 56, line 1, leave out subsection (3) and insert—

'In relation to a repayment of income tax falling within subsection (1)(b) above the material date is the 15th day following the end of the period specified in paragraph 2(2) of Schedule 20 Finance Act 1972 in which the corresponding payments referred to in subsection (1)(b) above fell to be received.'.

The Temporary Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 26, in page 56, line 49, at end add—

'(9) For the purposes of subsection (1) above, where income tax is set-off against corporation tax under section 240(5) Taxes Act 1970, it shall be treated as a repayment of income tax made on the material date for payment of that corporation tax'.

No. 27, in clause 90, page 60, line 6, after 'assessment' insert

'For the purpose of this subsection, income tax deducted at source from income received shall be deemed to be corporation tax paid on the material date in section 87(3)'.

No. 28, in clause 90, page 60, line 17, at end insert

'this subsection shall take precedence over section 240(5) Taxes Act 1970'.

No. 29, in clause 95, page 62, line 25, leave out subsection 3 and insert—

'(3) Except in relation to sections 87 and 90(5) for which the appointed day shall be 6th April 1988, no day may be appointed by virtue of subsection (2) above which falls earlier than 31st March 1992'.

Sir William Clark: These are probing amendments. The effect of amendment No. 25 is to ensure that the early payment of tax by companies through the deduction of income tax at source from the receipts of interest is fully recognised by the new interest on tax overpaid regime. Amendment No. 26 is necessary to give effect to that.

Amendment No. 27 is to give corporate taxpayers the same right to recover an excess of tax paid by deducation of tax at source as they would enjoy if that pre-payment had arisen through an excess of corporation tax paid. Amendment No. 29 accelerates the date to after 1 April 1987 instead of the existing words.

If my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary can answer those points, I am sure that we can proceed with the rest of the Bill without further delay.

Mr. Lilley: These amendments would fundamentally alter the structure of the existing tax system, virtually abolishing the system of deducation of tax at source for companies. This would have serious effects. In the first year it would cost the Exchequer more than £1,500 million, more than £1,000 million of which would go to the chief beneficiary—the insurance industry. Naturally, this is a cash flow effect and I am not suggesting that it would permanently increase the cost to the Revenue by that amount.

I can see the analogy that my hon. Friend the Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) draws between the interest charges on pay and file and the delays in payment inherent in the position particularly of the life insurance industry which can claim back tax paid at source on income that it has received. However, I do not think that the analogy is sufficiently close. Certainly it would not be appropriate to pursue the change in this Bill.

Our proposed interest charge under pay and file is viewed as a commercial restitution in the circumstances where a company accidentally overpays tax against what is eventually assessed. Likewise, if it underpays tax, it will have to pay a measure of restitution for underpayment. That is different from the sort of timing difference which is inherent in taxation at source, which my hon. Friend wants to seek compensation for or alter altogether. I understand his point, but I do not think that it would be appropriate in this Bill to consider changes that would affect the Revenue so substantially.

Sir William Clark: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Clause 89

PRESCRIBED RATE OF INTEREST

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: Clause 89 enables the Treasury to fix the rate of interest from time to time as it wishes. I should be grateful if the Economic Secretary would tell me what practice the Treasury intends to pursue. Will it be the same as it is at present?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman has raised an important point. We intend to consult widely on the appropriate structure of interest rates within pay and file, and that consultation will begin shortly. The Government have no fixed view. It will, of course, be important to ensure that the system is both workable and fair, and is as widely agreed within the industry as possible, while at the same time meeting the needs of the Revenue, but we do not approach it with a fixed idea in our mind.

Sir William Clark: After consultation, let us suppose that it is agreed that the interest chargeable is one, two or three points above base rate, or whatever is thought reasonable. If we hypothesise a charge of two points above base rate, which today would give a rate of 11 per cent, would it not be unfair to keep the rate at the previous level —particularly if the base rate came down? I think that a month or two after the base rate comes down the interest charge should come down by the same amount.

Mr. Lilley: I shall certainly bear that in mind. If there were too great a difference between the rate applied and that prevailing in the market, problems would indeed arise. We should have to take such considerations into account when reaching a decision.

Mr. Blair: I should like to pursue the point a little further. Presumably at present interest is simply loaded on to whatever corporation tax is unpaid, and that is fixed by the commissioners in some way. How is it done? I am a little concerned about the Treasury fixing the interest rate. We are told that there will be consultation on the proper basis on which that is to be done. However, the whole structure of the provisions in the Bill is to put considerable power into the hands of the Inland Revenue or the Treasury, which will be making the assessments. There will be automatic penalties, and the prescribed rate of interest will be fixed by the Treasury from time to time.

What concerns me is that there will probably be very little opportunity for us to debate the outcome of the change in structure. When the Treasury decides the prescribed rate of interest, will we have an opportunity to decide whether it is correct? The hon. Member for Croydon, South (Sir W. Clark) has raised a fair point. Will the rate be one, two or three points above the base rate? The difference between those figures could be millions or even hundreds of millions of pounds. It is important that we obtain clarification and are given some assurance that any Treasury decision on the prescribed rate of interest will be made only after the widest possible consultation, and that we shall have an opportunity to comment after that decision.

Mr. Lilley: At present the interest rate is determined by statutory instrument placed by the Treasury. In theory, the House could object every time that the interest rate is changed. I understand—although I will correct this if I am wrong—that we will be able to establish a system that must be agreed by the House rather than the present pattern in which rates are altered by statutory instrument. However, that point may have to be clarified.

Mr. Blair: It would be helpful and worthwhile if we were given some opportunity to assess the mechanism that the Treasury intends to use. The Economic Secretary has put his finger on a significant change. At present, through statutory instrument, we can vote against the Treasury's decisions. Presumably that will change when we have agreed to the new method of assessment. The Treasury will then be able simply to change the rate of interest, and there will be no opportunity to dispute it after we have agreed that method.

Mr. Lilley: One option that will have to be considered is a differential between interest rates. At present the differential relates to the time when interest becomes payable. It is payable after six months if the company underpays, and after 12 months if it overpays. Although there is currently the same rate of interest, there is no symmetry between the two. If there were symmetry, there might be a possibility of round tripping, and so forth. I do not wish to mislead the Committee by suggesting that just one rate of interest will necessarily result.

Clause 96

INTERESTS IN POSSESSION

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Blair: We have debated the principle of inheritance tax and the Government's reduction in it before, and I do not wish to rehearse old arguments. Last year the Government abolished inheritance tax on lifetime gifts between individuals. Clause 96 will extend that abolition to lifetime transfers into and out of interest in possession trusts—effectively, any trust that is not discretionary. I should be obliged if the Financial Secretary would tell me how much the abolition will cost, and whether I am right in thinking that it is primarily the better off who will gain.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): The cost of the new relief is negligible. Although it may be affected by behavioural changes, we do not believe that it would be significant.

Mr. Blair: Am I right in thinking that when the Treasury says "negligible" it is referring to the same principle as it uses in the Red Book, which is less than £5 million on an annual basis?

Mr. Lamont: I am not sure that that is the same principle as that which is used in the Red Book, but it would fall within the definition of "negligible". If I can add to the definition of "negligible", I shall let the hon. Gentleman know. I do not know whether he wants me to confirm his understanding of the clause. As always, he interpreted it perfectly correctly.

We are extending to transfers into interest in possession trusts the principle of potentially exempt transfers. That is because we recognise that many businesses and a great deal of the heritage are held in interest in possession trusts. This change was urged on us by various professional bodies. Having looked at it, I came to the conclusion that it was justified. I know that my hon. Friends are very much in favour of it, too. However, it is necessary for the change to be carefully buttressed with anti-avoidance provisions. It is emphatically not our intention to extend the principle of the exempt transfer to other trusts, such as discretionary trusts. We have stopped here. We were subjected to a great deal of pressure to extend exempt transfers into all sorts of trusts, but we have said that there are special features about interest in possession trusts. We have included the anti-avoidance provisions in the schedule so that it stops here.

Mr. Blair: I suppose that we should be grateful for small mercies. I am happy to have the assurance that the abolition of inheritance tax will stop here. If the Treasury were to exempt transfers into discretionary trusts it would open up a huge loophole for avoidance.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 96 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

SCHEDULE 7

INHERITANCE TAX: INTERESTS IN POSSESSION

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I beg to move amendment No. 91, in page 93, line 14, at end insert

'and

(d) that, within six months of the coming to an end of the relevant interest, any of the property in which that interest subsisted has neither—

(i) become settled property in which a qualifying interest in possession subsists or to which section 71 below applies, nor

(ii) become property to which an individual is beneficially entitled.'.

As my right hon. Friend the Financial Secretary pointed out a moment ago, clause 96 and schedule 7 seek to restore the parity of treatment between life interest trusts and outright gifts made by individuals — an essential element of the old capital transfer tax legislation that was lost on the introduction of inheritance tax in 1984.

I warmly welcome the changes that the Government have introduced in the Finance Bill. My right hon. Friend pointed out that had he gone further there would have been the prospect of considerable avoidance, and schedule 7 seeks, in a complex way, to prevent that from taking place. Were it not for schedule 7, property could be routed through life interest trusts to discretionary trusts. That could be misused in a variety of ways, two of which I shall mention by way of example and for the edification of the Opposition. The first is the so-called Chelsea pensioner scheme, whereby property is settled on somebody who is not expected to live for very long. The second example is the so-called man of straw scheme, under which property is settled on a person for life; but the trustees are given wide powers to appoint the property into a discretionary trust and thereby get around the limitations of life interest schemes.

Schedule 7 is targeted accurately at these avoidance devices. My small amendment does not seek to disturb the safeguards against abuse in schedule 7. Many people, however, have come to the conclusion that, as drafted, schedule 7 is too wide and does not conform with the practice of trusts, particularly in relation to heritage property where life interests in possession are the normal way of passing on such property and of safeguarding it for the future.

When property is settled on somebody for life, the terms of the trust often allow for some flexibility for appointment in the trustees, in case the life tenant dies prematurely. The trustees are allowed a short period—conventionally six months—in which to decide whether to appoint to a further life interest or to transfer property into absolute ownership.

My amendment would allow the trustees a short breathing space before making the appointment without fear of being caught by the complexities of schedule 7. If my right hon. Friend wants a precedent, there is one in the Inheritance Tax Act 1984. Section 92 provides for the case where property is not treated as transferred on death until the beneficiary has survived for a given period that cannot exceed six months. The costs involved for the section and the schedule are negligible. If my small amendment were to be accepted, the cost would be even less. I commend it to my right hon. Friend and hope that he will accept it.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My hon. Friend referred to the principle of parity between lifetime giving and giving to trusts that existed under the previous regime before the introduction of inheritance tax. He has called in aid that principle for this amendment. I am prepared to respond favourably to it.

Although the principle of parity applied under the old regime, we do not feel that that principle should be incorporated into all trusts. We have made lifetime giving tax-free, provided the donor survives for seven years. Therefore, we did not feel that it was right to make that provision for all trusts. We have conceded that principle for interest in possession trusts, but we do not intend to extend it to discretionary trusts. Last year we made it possible for accumulation and maintenance trusts to be included in the potentially exempt transfers. The basic reasoning behind this, and my hon. Friend's amendment, is that the trust has a function as an instrument that is independent of any tax advantage. We do not wish to destroy the trust as an instrument. That is very important in relation to interest in possession trusts.

My hon. Friend's amendment provides an opportunity for trustees who are caught by the anti-avoidance provisions in schedule 7 to rearrange matters so as to avoid the special rate of charge. If an interest in possession that was created by a potentially exempt transfer comes to an end within seven years of the exempted transfer and the property then becomes subject to discretionary trusts, which would be the normal route that might be used for avoidance, the termination may be subject to a special rate of charge instead of the normal rate, if the settlor is still alive. The amendment would prevent the special rate from applying on that termination if, within the following six months, the property is made subject to another interest in possession trust, or passed to outright individual ownership or to an accumulation and maintenance trust that already qualifies for exempt transfers. The normal rate charge will, however, remain.

My hon. Friend's proposal has the merit that it would prevent people who have made perfectly proper trust provisions, with no avoidance motive, from being inadvertently caught by the special rate of charge. Without that a trust which provides for successive interests in possession at the trustees' discretion would be caught if an interest in possession ended prematurely, perhaps on the death of the life tenant, before the trustees appointed a successor. The amendment will allow trustees to make the appointment within six months after the life tenant's death without incurring a penalty.

I am content to accept my hon. Friend's amendment. My hon. Friend alluded to men of straw, bed and breakfasting and other contrivances. We have built substantial anti-avoidance provisions into schedule 7. We will monitor the operation of my hon. Friend's amendment very carefully for signs of abuse. I do not believe that counter-measures will be necessary. However, if they were, we would not hesitate to bring them in.

Amendment agreed to.

Schedule 7, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 97

ACCEPTANCE IN LIEU: CAPITAL TRANSFER TAX AND ESTATE DUTY

Mr. Millan: I beg to move amendment No. 89, in page 63, line 22, leave out 'may' and insert 'shall'.

We are dealing with a case where property is transferred in settlement of capital transfer tax and the property has a value attributed to it at a date earlier than the date that the property is actually accepted. At present, the clause nevertheless provides that interest may be charged from that earlier date. It does not make that mandatory, but it allows the Revenue presumably to determine or argue that the interest should be payable although the value of the property is as determined at the earlier date.

This is a case of the Revenue in certain instances trying to have it both ways. The logical position would be that if the value of the property was determined on a particular date, no interest should be payable from that date. The effect of my amendment would simply make that the position rather than allow what seems to be the present case in the drafting where there is an element of discretion on the part of the Revenue.

Mr. Norman Lamont: In the Budget and the Finance Act 1987, before the election, we enacted provisions whereby property could be offered in lieu of tax — that provision already existed — but we said that the interest calculation could be from the point at which the property was offered or the point at which it was accepted. Previously, it had been from the time when the property was accepted and interest ran to that point.

The right hon. Gentleman will appreciate that we gave the person offering the property the opportunity of having interest stopped at the point when the property was offered and he would have that choice. He would have the choice of a longer period of interest or the benefit of a possible higher value on the property over a longer period of time. That provision was enacted in respect of inheritance tax and it already exists in legislation. That legislation uses the word "may" to which the right hon. Gentleman objects. Clause 97 has only a minor function in that it mirrors the provisions to which I have referred, but in respect of pre-1985 capital transfer tax and estate duty. It has only a very narrow provision. If we simply alter the word "may", the right hon. Gentleman's amendment will not alter the provision with respect to the new tax. That is a minor reason against the amendment.

I am not violently opposed to the right hon. Gentleman's proposition. It is born of a little distrust of the Revenue which seems to inspire some of these debates. I do not believe that substituting the word "may" for the word "shall" will mean that the Inland Revenue will not operate the policy announced in the statement of practice which was announced to the House. The question is being deliberately left open so that it will be negotiable along with other terms for the acceptance. The acceptance transaction represents a purchase by the Government at a negotiated price, and the interest terms are part of that price.

In general, the offerer's options will remain open until the item is formally accepted, but I agree with those who have said that interest relief should be available only for bona fide offers. I do not think it would be right to allow the "offer date" basis to remain open indefinitely. That might encourage people to procrastinate in order to exploit the new arrangements — for example, by continuing to enjoy income from the property. We envisage that after two years have elapsed from the date of an offer without the terms being settled the Inland Revenue may give the parties six months notice that it will no longer be prepared to accept the item on the "offer date" basis. This was announced in a Revenue press release on 8 April.

However, we do not want to rule out the possibility of a property being accepted on the basis of its value as at a date earlier than that of the acceptance even when waiver of interest is not appropriate because the two-year period has been passed. That is the only reason why the word "may" rather than "shall" has been used. We might seek to negotiate and be generous to the taxpaper who may wish to negotiate on the basis of the "offer date" value because the current value is less. That is why the word "may" has been used. We have a statement of practice. The policy was announced, and that is the only way in which the Revenue intends to exercise its discretion. I hope that my words in this debate will have some effect. I am not violently opposed to the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. Millan: I am grateful to the Minister for what he has said. I appreciate the points that he has made about this being a matter for negotiation. On the basis of what the Minister has said and in the hope that the Inland Revenue will in practice apply the provisions in that spirit, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Option to Commute Annuity Rights for a Lump Sum

'It shall be permissible for the trustees or managers of a scheme which is an approved scheme under the provisions of Section 18 of this Act or which is an exempt approved scheme under the provisions of Section 21 of the Finance Act 1970 to amend the rules of the scheme so that a member of the scheme may after the completion of not fewer than ten years as a member commute up to one-quarter of his rights under the provisions of the scheme for the immediate payment of a lump sum which shall be liable for taxation in the same way and to the same extent as a lump sum payable at the normal date of award of benefit under the scheme.'—[Sir B. Rhys Williams.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams (Kensington): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Some time ago when the concept of personal pension schemes was under general discussion it was suggested in some quarters that it would be a good idea if this facility could be made available as a build-up of a personal identifiable asset available for discretionary use at any time during the beneficiary's lifetime. The idea did not find favour because it was not thought acceptable that the beneficiary could perhaps lose what was intended primarily as a retirement benefit through taking advantage of the right to draw the capital out at any time. The Bill does not, as I understand it, give any facility for the lump sum in a personal pension scheme to be drawn out before the normal age of retirement.

The object of my new clause is to give a partial option —a one quarter option—to the member if he requires his capital after a period of 10 years in the scheme. I think that it would be quite appropriate to allow this in the case of personal pension schemes and I can see no particular reason why it should not be permissible in all occupational pension schemes where the amount of money standing to the account of the member can be identified.

The clause would permit the extension of the facility to make a part commutation of the entitlement to annuity at the time of retirement so that the ability to draw a lump sum becomes available to the member after 10 years' membership of the scheme. If the lump sum is taken early in this way, it will reduce the amount of the eventual retirement annuity, but no more than if the lump sum were taken at the normal date. The clause partially changes the nature of a pension scheme so as to turn it into a savings scheme with a potential somewhat wider objective than a pure retirement benefit scheme. I can see no objection to that.

It is right to encourage savings and provision for emergencies as well as for retirement. If a man in middle life sees an opportunity to embark on a new venture or needs to have access to capital because of some emergency, is it not natural that he should be permitted to withdraw the money immediately from the fund which is accumulating for his benefit? My 10-year limit would prevent the abuse of the tax-haven status that we are offering to the schemes, which is founded on the principle of save now and pay tax later.

I am not suggesting that withdrawing a lump sum in the way that the clause would permit should have any special tax advantage for the beneficiary. I think that my right hon. and hon. Friends know that I personally believe that the withdrawing of a lump sum, in so far as it is acquired through contributions made in future years, should be taxable at the standard rate. The clause does not make any special provision in regard to taxation. The object is to widen the facilities available to savers through occupational pension schemes, and I believe that it should commend itself to the Committee.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As has happened on many other occasions during our consideration of the Bill, my hon. Friend the Member for Kensington (Sir B. Rhys Williams) has come forward with a new idea. We have been running hard to keep up with all his other ideas. Although we are digesting many of them and will talk to him about some of them, I cannot accept the new clause. I have no doubt, however, that as with his other ideas the drip, drip process will continue, and that in years to come we shall find ourselves wondering why we did not accept his ideas earlier.

As my hon. Friend has said openly, the new clause would, in essence, convert pension schemes into the form of a tax-sheltered savings medium. My hon. Friend has emphasied that pension arrangements take the form of a tax haven, but the rules governing them, especially when Finance Bill proposals are in place, are designed to ensure that a pension scheme is used for its intended purpose, which is to provide a replacement income in retirement when paid employment ceases.

The objection to the new clause is that it would allow any individual, no matter what his age, to withdraw a lump sum. He could take a part of his benefit at any time after completing 10 years' membership of the scheme. A person who joined a scheme at the age of 20 years could have a sum equal to one quarter of his benefits to date at any time after the age of 30. Although my hon. Friend expressed his reservation about the tax status of the lump sum, as he has done in all our debates, there would be benefit from the tax privileges even if we changed the taxation of the lump sum in the way that my hon. Friend suggests. I do not need to repeat what has been said about that and how that would be a radical change.

The new clause would turn occupational pensions and personal pensions into highly tax efficient savings vehicles that in many ways would compete with other forms of savings and investment. I do not think that that is a role that pension schemes, which benefit from generous tax reliefs, should fill. I always think about my hon. Friend's ideas and, as I have said, we shall have discussions with him about some of them, but I cannot commend this one to the Committee and I do not expect my right hon. and hon. Friends to accept it.

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams: I recognise the force of some of my right hon. Friend's arguments. On the other hand, there is an urgent need to encourage the savings motive as far as we possibly can. The country is not saving nearly enough, and we should not turn down any opportunity that is likely to be popular of encouraging people to save. Nevertheless, I have not put enough work into the drafting of the new clause to seek to insist that the Committee should accept it. I understand fully the arguments that my right hon. Friend has used. In the circumstances, I am glad that I planted the idea—I do not think that it is a new one—and I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Schedule 9 agreed to.

Bill reported, with amendments; as amended, to be considered.

British Shipbuilders (Borrowing Powers) Bill

Considered in Committee; reported, without amendment. Order for Third Reading read.

7.28 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (Mr. Robert Atkins): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

As the House will appreciate, we debated the Bill at some length a week ago. I think that it would be inappropriate and unnecessary for me to speak at length now. With the permission of the House and of yourself, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I hope that at the end of the debate I shall be able to answer any comments or contributions that hon. Members may make.

7.29 pm

Mr. Bruce Millan (Glasgow, Govan): I wish to raise one matter that follows on from the contribution which I made to the debate on Second Reading. I had hoped—I think that the Government did as well—that the Brittany Ferries order would come to Govan Shipbuilders. I do not wish to rehearse all that I said on Second Reading, but I wish to emphasise my wish that the Government pursue the matter with the greatest vigour. The Government took the issue to the European Commission on the basis that an unfair subsidy had been granted by the French Government to enable this important order to go to a French yard. On the basis of free and fair competition, it had been the intention of the prospective owner of the vessel, Brittany Ferries, to place an order with Govan Shipbuilders.

There has been a development since Second Reading, so I am intervening to ask for clarification from the Minister. The Commissioner responsible for these matters, Mr. Sutherland, yesterday announced that he had found both the French and British Governments in breach of the sixth directive on the maximum permissible amount of aid. There has been some rather misleading comment about this. It suggests that there was a deliberate intention on the part of British Shipbuilders and Govan Shipbuilders to put in a subsidised tender that was in breach of the directive so recently agreed within the Community, and operative only from the beginning of this year.

The reality is rather different. The tender submitted by Govan Shipbuilders was within the directive's maximum limit, and what has placed it above these limits is the later intervention by the French Government. They offered an additional subsidy of 10 per cent. to the operator of the vessel and the ship owner, Brittany Ferries. It is the addition of the two subsidies that has brought the British tender outside the limits laid down in the directive.

The French tender is an entirely different proposition, because this is a matter between the French ship owner, the French operator and the French Government. The French Government, having intervened in this matter—in my opinion quite improperly—have not only brought the French tender outside the limits, but have coincidentally brought the British tender outside the limits. They made, I suspect, a completely false promise that, no matter where the order went, the 10 per cent. subsidy would be payable. I do not believe that if Brittany

[Mr. Bruce Millan]

Ferries had persisted in putting the order into Govan the 10 per cent. subsidy would have been paid. I would have been astonished if that had happened.

The French Government have behaved deviously and cunningly in this matter, and have put us in the dock alongside them. I hope that the Minister will clear up the matter, because some newspaper reports today have suggested that we have been as much at fault as the French. I do not often defend the British Government, but in this case we are the injured party, not the culprit. I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to clarify the situation. I think that my understanding of this matter is correct, but it is important that this should be put on the record at this convenient opportunity.

I hope that the Minister will also take on board the point I made on Second Reading, and which I now repeat, that I hope that we will pursue this issue with the utmost vigour. It is my hope that we can start again the whole business of the placing of the order. However, being realistic, I am not hopeful that that can be achieved. The order has been placed with a French yard—I deplore that—but if there is any way to save the order for Govan I hope that the Government will attempt to do it. At the least, the position should be clarified. We should have an undertaking that the Government will continue to pursue this through the Commission in every possible way open to them.

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): Because of the pressure of time I was unable to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on Second Reading. As I have said many times, I welcome any amount of public intervention in shipbuilding borrowing facilities. Therefore, I have no shame in saying that I support the Government in their decision to increase British Shipbuilders' borrowing powers.

This is the first time that I have had to speak about Swan Hunter, which is in my constituency, when it will have no opportunity to benefit from such an order, because it has been privatised. However, that is not to say that the people in the north-east of England, particularly those connected with the long tradition of shipbuilding in the region, are not interested in what is happening in British Shipbuilders. Nor would it be true to say that they are not interested in the future of British Shipbuilders. I am pleased in one respect. The Government are still determined to keep this industry alive, in spite of world competition and in spite of the fact that they have faced the criticism of not being interested in this industry.

I notice that my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) is waiting to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I gather that my hon. Friend is still a Member of the European Parliament. As such, she has played an active part in directing attention to what the European Commission is doing to help in the crisis facing the European shipbuilding industry. I am sure that she will have something to say about that.

The people on Tyneside, especially those employed at Swan Hunter, are fully aware that now that the company is privatised they have to face the harsh realities of private and allegedly free competition, but in the big wide world they cannot hope to compete with other nations, particularly those in the far east. I should like the Minister to study the report on the shipbuilding industry produced by the Commission. I ask him to think seriously about how the Government can help in the implementation of the second of the three recommendations, that which concerns the social impact in the less-favoured areas of the EEC where shipbuilding takes place.

I know that successive Governments have made some social contribution to the economic consequences of the decline in the coal industry. However, as far as I am aware, there has been no political decision in the United Kingdom Parliament about the social consequences of the decline of the shipbuilding industry. It would be helpful if the Minister had some influence on, and consultations with, his colleagues to see whether the Commissioner responsible for shipbuilding policies in the EEC can bear in mind that the north-east should be considered a less-favoured area within the Community and therefore have some priority in efforts to meet the crisis in shipbuilding.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): The Opposition do not oppose the increase in the borrowing powers of British Shipbuilders. However, traditionally Third Reading debates are used to voice some wider concerns about the shipbuilding industry, and I should like to add my voice to some of those concerns.

I agree with many of those who spoke in the debate last week that a great deal needs to be done to ensure the survival of the shipbuilding industry. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) said, my main interest in the industry arises from my experience as the representative of Tyne and Wear in the European Parliament. In the past, the area had within its boundaries one third of Britain's shipworkers, and even today it accounts for about one third of the very reduced shipbuilding activities in Britain. I have been struck by two things during our debates in the European Assembly. First—this point was made last week—the British decline in shipbuilding has been more dramatic than the reduction in almost any other European shipbuilding industry. The figures certainly bear that out. Secondly, during the past 10 years, there has been a dramatic collective decline in European shipbuilding compared with the expansion in some areas of the far east. We must act to make sure that shipbuilding has a future in Britain and that our capacity will allow us to respond to the range of designs of ships that will be needed in the future. Some of those ships will be very sophisticated vessels.

The British and the EEC approaches to the industry have been too negative. Our response to the world market seems to have been that, since the market has been contracting, we had better contract twice as fast. Japan and Korea have said, "The market is declining, but we want a larger share of it." The emphasis in EEC policy has been very negative. It simply tries to reduce subsidies to the industry across the board. That was certainly the case in the EEC fifth directive on aids to shipbuilding. The sixth directive which replaced it is better in some respects, and I welcome the improvements, especially the fact that all aids are now included so that the more transparent British aids can be seen more clearly against the hidden aids that have been given in other countries.

However, it remains true that almost the only shipbuilding policy in the EEC is one of controlling subsidies and trying to even out competition among European countries. That does not deal with the main problem, which is the survival of European shipbuilding in the face of increasingly intense competition from the far east. European shipbuilding policy has not been successful in that sense.

I and some of my colleagues have argued repeatedly for a more positive and comprehensive strategy towards shipbuilding, including measures to stimulate demand in British and European shipyards and measures to scrap some of the older tonnage, which my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, North (Mr. Clay) mentioned last week. We must also spend more European money on research and development in shipbuilding. We need a European commitment to a level of capacity below which we will not go and which we will defend strongly in international negotiations, especially with Japan and Korea.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend mentioned the social and regional aspects of shipbuilding. Here again, British and EEC attitudes and approaches have been very dilatory. Perhaps the Minister remembers that, seven or eight years ago, there were proposals in the EEC to provide money for shipbuilding areas from the so-called non-quota section of the European regional development fund. That small programme took more than two years to negotiate, and when it was finally agreed it provided only 17 million ecu, which was about £10 million, for the whole of the United Kingdom shipbuilding industry over five years. That was totally inadequate, given the serious problems of many of our shipbuilding areas.

The European Commission and the member Governments have still not agreed a new programme on the regional and social consequences of the crisis in the shipbuilding industry. The Commission's proposals are more than a year overdue, and they are still not being properly discussed. We have been told that, because of the financial crisis in the EEC, there will not be enough money in the budget for some time to implement such proposals. That is selling our shipbuilding areas very short.

The Government and the EEC have treated the industry with insufficient priority. Britain's case has not been argued sufficiently in the EEC, and the European Community as a whole has not argued strongly enough for shipbuilding in its international trade negotiations. Can the Minister tell us when shipbuilding was last on the agenda in international trade negotiations with Japan and Korea? When will it be on the agenda in the future? I understand that it has been discussed far less often than the other areas about which we express concern when considering our trade balance with the far east—motor cars, video tape recorders or the range of consumer electronic goods. Shipbuilding is an important aspect of the unfavourable trade balance between Britain and the far east and it should be considered with more urgency than has been the case until now.

Looking around the Chamber, one would think that shipbuilding was not a great priority for the majority of hon. Members. But many hon. Members have within their constituencies industries which supply goods and essential parts for shipbuilding. The health or sickness of the industry cannot be seen in isolation. It has serious ramifications for many constituencies in Britain. The industry uses the products of the new technologies. They include CADCAM facilities, which are important to the survival of shipbuilding and to the survival of our new technology industries and the important new technological sector.

I plead with the Government to do all that they can to ensure the survival of shipbuilding for the long term, not just the short term, and to act in such a way as to give our shipbuilding areas and our shipyard workers real hope for the future.

Mr. Gordon Brown (Dunfermline, East): This has been a short debate, but we have heard wide-ranging and extensive contributions about the problems of shipbuilding. Our willingness to allow the Bill to go through quickly has nothing to do with complacency about the crisis in shipbuilding, but is a measure of our concern about the crisis affecting shipbuilding and our determination that measures should be taken as quickly as possible to allow the existing yards to flourish and maintain a merchant shipbuilding capacity.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) on her speech. Her eloquence and expertise will be of tremendous benefit in future shipbuilding debates, and I hope that the Minister will answer her main point. If there are problems with the European budget, social fund aid for shipbuilding areas should not be a victim of the disputes that are taking place in Europe. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) for mentioning the problems of Swan Hunter. My hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) did the same last week. Although warship orders are not the Minister's direct responsibility, I hope that he will bear in mind the problems of that yard.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) mentioned a problem which we read about in the newspapers this week and which arose in last week's debate. Those of us who have followed the amazing saga of the Brittany Ferries order during the past few months will find it extraordinary that the victims in the matter —Govan Shipbuilders and British Shipbuilders generally —have been found guilty by the Commission. I hope that the Minister will carefully consider what appears to be at best sharp practices by the French, and at worst a dangerous deception that caused Govan to lose the order. I hope that he will assure us tonight that, not only he will keep watch on what is happening in the Commission, but that he will press the Commission to a swift conclusion on this matter. This is the first case that has arisen since the new directive. There is no point in having an intervention fund and debating the future of that fund if we are unable to draw on it for major orders that we are capable of winning.

Last week much was said about the British Shipbuilders' order book. I am grateful to the Minister for writing to other hon. Members and myself giving us specific answers to the problems facing North-East Shipbuilders and Govan Shipbuilders as well as some of the other yards outside British Shipbuilders. I trust that the enthusiasm that the Minister has already brought to his job as Minister with responsibility for shipbuilding, evident in the debate of last week and from his written answers of the past few days, will be matched by the enthusiasm of his Department and British Shipbuilders, backed up by his Department, to win the orders necessary to sustain the industry.

My hon. Friends the Members for Gateshead, East and for Wallsend mentioned the draft European Commission report—it was mentioned in the press on 30 June—about the state of the shipbuildng industry in Europe and the world. I know the Minister agrees with me that it makes extremely gloomy reading. It suggests that even after a third cut in production capacity – it is estimated that it is likely to happen over the next two years – the yards in Europe will still run at 70 per cent. capacity for the rest of the 1980s and 80 per cent. capacity in the early 1990s. The report suggests that entire production centres will be shut down. It goes on to suggest that 30,000 jobs will be at risk in the European Commission countries. It paints an extremely gloomy picture.

Mr. Garrett: My hon. Friend is quite correct in saying that 30,000 jobs in the industry will be at risk, but the knock-on effect could run to 100,000 jobs. The Commission has concerned itself directly with the industry, but has failed to take account of the wider impact of the closure of production centres.

Mr. Brown: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to that. Throughout our debates on shipbuilding we should be concerned that, in the north-east and Scotland in particular, for every production worker affected by cuts and closures there are at least two or three others directly dependent on that production worker. When we discuss the number of jobs that have been lost in the past few years and the numbers still at risk, we are also talking about the effects on entire communities.

We have suffered more than most of our European competitors. On 7 July the Minister was good enough to give me figures concerning the losses among shipbuilders and they confirm my belief. During comparable periods since 1979 Belgium has lost 2,000 jobs; France 8,000 jobs; Germany 5,000 jobs; Italy 7,000 jobs; and the Netherlands 4,000 jobs. Up to 1986, according to the Minister's figures, the United Kingdom has lost 18,000 jobs. However, according to my figures, based on a more up-to-date calculation, we have lost at least 25,000 jobs. Therefore, not only did we suffer more than our competitors in the past, but we are suffering more now.

If we consider the current state of order books for the first two months of this year, as they appeared in Lloyd's List a few days ago, it is clear that, given the drastic problems throughout the world, Italy managed to achieve more orders in the first few months of this year than in previous months. West Germany managed to achieve more orders and South Korea has been able to move to the top of the shipbuilders' league. Taiwan has done extremely well, but, despite all the efforts of British Shipbuilders — management and work force — the number of orders that we have won is down on previous months. It is despite the orders won at Govan. Indeed, last week, my right hon. Friend the Member for Govan paid tribute to Mr. Eric Mackie for his efforts that enabled us to win the Chinese order. It is despite the work of North-East Shipbuilders to win Danish orders. Despite all those efforts, our share of the world market has not gone up.

In the previous debate the Minister spoke of the generosity of the Government towards British Shipbuilders. However, he must bear in mind that, not only have our European competitors done more over a longer period, and still do, to support their industries, but privatisation, by selling profitable yards dependent on public sector orders into the private sector, has done enormous damage and harm. That view is confirmed by two former chairmen of British Shipbuilders who talked about acts of political dogma that put the future of the corporation at risk.

The Government are still not doing enough to secure orders to guarantee the future of the yards. High wages are not the problem—we pay our workers less than most of our major competitors in Europe. The problem does not lie in the lack of advances in productivity because between 1979 and 1985 there was a 30 per cent. advance in the productivity of British workers. Indeed, since then there have been major improvements because flexibility agreements have been reached. British Shipbuilders is not technologically backward. A great deal of effort has gone into investing in the most modern computer techniques. The industry may be old, but it is no longer old-fashioned. The yards are not inefficient. A few weeks ago, with the completion of the North sea order at Govan, the chairman of P and O was so satisfied with the work that he has invited the work force to join one of the sailings of the vessel. Industrial relations are not a problem because the new chairman has expressed his satisfaction with the industrial relations record and has complimented the work force on it.

The fact is that, given the difficulties of world demand, not enough is being done to safeguard the industry. The Minister should reconsider what he appeared about to investigate last week — he then rejected it — the establishment of a task force to scour the world for available orders.

The Minister, as one of his first acts as Minister with responsibility for shipbuilding, should conduct a trawl of the various Departments to advance public sector orders. He should take the necessary action to persuade British shipowners to buy British. Large orders have been lost overseas in the opening months of this year.

I share the faith of the work force of British Shipbuilders in the future of shipbuilding in this country. The Government must now show their faith in that future by investing and protecting the industry and by securing orders. They must support the loyal, efficient, dedicated work force who have made every sacrifice to ensure that the industry is able to win world orders. I hope that the Minister will back up the efforts of the management and the work force.

Mr. Atkins: A number of today's points were dealt with at some length last week. I appreciate the fact that the hon. Members for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) and for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) were not able to be here then and therefore made their points tonight, but if they take the trouble to refer to last week's debate, which they may have done already, they will see that a number of their points were covered then.

The right hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Millan) referred to Brittany Ferries. I should like to take this opportunity to put the current position on the record. I think he recognises—there is not much difference of opinion—that we have tried to deal with the matter.

As I anticipated in last week's debate, the European Commission has now decided to open an article 93 procedure against the French and against ourselves in respect of aid offered for the Brittany Ferries order. There are two reasons for this. First, when British Shipbuilders tendered to Brittany Ferries, the French authorities were robustly maintaining that aid that they grant for ships flagged in France was not state aid for shipbuilding of the kind to be covered by the new sixth directive. It is evident that, as a result of its investigations, the Commission has satisfied itself both that this is aid that it regards as subject to the limits in the new directive and that the aid would apply to a ship purchased from Govan. As further evidence of the pressure applied to Brittany Ferries, I have to say that Brittany Ferries told British Shipbuilders that the French authorities had let it be known that in their case this aid might not be available. It appears that the French authorities, not perhaps for the first time, have now changed their tune in responding to the Commission

The second reason is that the Commission has confirmed, as a result of its investigations, that the Dutch authorities have offered a lower level of aid than either ourselves or the French and, according to Commission practice, this in itself gives rise to an article 93 procedure in a case where one Community member asks for an investigation under the new directive. We did so, of course, because of the way in which the French have behaved.

As to what happens next, under Commission rules both the French authorities and ourselves will have a set period in which to respond to formal letters from the Commission. We have nothing to fear in this. We indicated to the Commission in advance of its decision that we had no interest in being in breach of the directive and would adjust our offer of aid once it confirmed that French flagging aid was, indeed, to be counted under the sixth directive and the French authorities had confirmed that it would be available for a Govan ship. We shall decide how far we should adjust our aid once the Commission details its reasons for opening the procedure against us.

Whereas I applaud the action that the Commission is taking in ensuring that the aid applied to this order is fair and fully in accord with the new directive, it would be wrong of me to suggest—I suspect that the right hon. Member for Govan recognises this — that I thought there was any significant chance in the order coming to Govan. As I explained last week, the French are in a uniquely strong position to ensure that this order remains in France even if, for instance, Brittany Ferries ends up paying a far higher price than it would had it ordered abroad.

I shall be pleased to let the House know the result of the Commission's procedures in due course. I emphasise again what I said last week. We shall do everything in our power to ensure that the case that needs to be put to the Commission and fought by the Commission on our behalf is made with all the strength that we can muster. I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Govan for raising the matter and giving me the opportunity to put the current position on the record. I hope that he will find it helpful.

The hon. Member for Wallsend speaks with weight and authority on the matters that concern him, and I listened to him with interest, as always. He referred to social consequences, and his hon. Friend the Member for Gateshead, East, who is a Member of the European Assembly, will know of that authority's activities. I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's points are considered. He will know that Tyne and Wear is recognised by the Commission as a shipbuilding closure area. None the less, his points are well taken and I shall ensure that those involved listen to them.

The hon. Member for Gateshead, East made some thoughtful points and spoke with authority on the problems facing her constituency. As I said, a number of those points were raised last week. I hope she feels that they were dealt with in some detail then, but I recognise that the hon. Lady wanted to get them on the record now. I am glad that she agrees with the Government that the sixth directive is an improvement. There is always room for improvement, but this is at least a better directive than the fifth.

The hon. Lady suggested that the shipbuilding issues to which she referred were not the subject of as much discussion as they should be. I must disagree and point out that shipbuilding issues generally are constantly raised within the OECD. My ministerial predecessors raised points on behalf of the British shipbuilding industry and I hope that I, too, shall be in a position to do so.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown), in what was perhaps his vale as a Front-Bench spokesman on the shipbuilding industry, as he moves to higher and more important things in the context of the Treasury— [Interruption.] Well, "different" things; perhaps I should put it like that. The hon. Gentleman brought us back to the arguments that he advanced last week about the task force. I do not wish to bore the House, but I tried to deal with those matters at some length last week. I can do so again, but I think that I would only be emphasising what has already been said.

The hon. Gentleman will know that many of the problems faced by the shipbuilding industry are the result of changes in customers' ordering specifications and the problems associated with maintaining financial viability and with going into liquidation. Although there have been many improvements, as the chairman of British Shipbuilders and the hon. Gentleman have said, there have been problems with poor performance and delivery. I agree that the work force and management of British Shipbuilders are doing a lot to put matters right.

The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East was a little uncharacteristically churlish about the Government's efforts. We have tried to do a great deal by devoting resources and interest to, and giving support for, export orders, which the hon. Gentleman mentioned in terms of the Chinese order. I cannot accept the charge that we have not done enough. However, I should like to end on a reasonably friendly note on a subject on which there are not many differences.

We believe that the Bill will be passed on the nod, because we recognise its necessity and importance. I hope that the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East, as he moves to different duties, will not forget that the Government have played, and will continue to play, a part in looking to the interests of those involved in the British shipbuilding industry. I pledge that I shall do all that I can to assist the industry to maintain its position and, where there are difficulties, to work hard to try to solve them. I urge the House to give the Bill its Third Reading.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Coal Industry

8.7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. Michael Spicer): I beg to move,

That the draft Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) (Amendment) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 6th July, be approved.

This is a technical amending order. I hope that the House will bear with me in what inevitably will be a rather detailed, but short, explanation. The purpose of the order is to make consequential changes to the redundant mineworkers' payments schemes following the introduction of provisions in the Social Security Act 1986.

The redundant mineworkers' payments schemes provide for lump sum and weekly payments to mineworkers made redundant on or before 28 March 1987. Since 29 March 1987, British Coal has been responsible for its own redundancy terms, as announced by my hon. Friend the Member for Wirral, West (Mr. Hunt) on 24 March last year.

There are five schemes still in operation. They are set out in orders made in 1973, 1978, 1983, 1984 and 1986, as amended. They provide for deductions to be made from RMPS basic weekly benefit paid to people who also receive special hardship allowance under section 60 of the Social Security Act 1975. The deductions are made so that a person does not simultaneously receive both special hardship allowance in compensation for reduced earnings through sickness or injury and RMPS benefit based on his full earnings before the sickness or injury reduced them.

The Social Security Act 1986 replaced special hardship allowance from 1 October 1986 with reduced earnings allowance, which is payable in similar circumstances but subject to different detailed provisions.

The reasons for making deductions of reduced earnings allowance from basic weekly RMPS benefit are exactly the same as those for making deductions for special hardship allowance. Our initial view was that in this context reduced earnings allowance could be treated as special hardship allowance under another name. On that view no changes to the schemes were necessary. However, further consideration has led us to the view that the differences between the detailed provisions of reduced earnings allowance and special hardship allowance require consequential legislation.

An important difference is that, whereas special hardship allowance was an increase in disablement benefit, reduced earnings allowance is an allowance in its own right. A change made by the 1986 Act was to increase the threshold level of disablement for receipt of disablement benefit from 1 per cent. to 14 per cent. As a result, special hardship allowance, if it still existed, would no longer be payable to those with disablements of 1 to 13 per cent., whereas reduced earnings allowance is available to anyone with a disablement of at least 1 per cent.

I am therefore advised that for those who receive reduced earnings allowance and have disablements of between 1 and 13 per cent., it is likely that deductions of reduced earnings allowance from RMPS basic benefit are not provided for by existing schemes. It is arguable that the existing rules of the RMPS allow deductions to be made in respect of those with disablements of 14 per cent. or more. Indeed, in substance it is clear that for such people reduced earnings allowance and special hardship allowance are equivalent. However, rather than leave this question to be tested in the courts, the Government have decided to make full refunds of all deductions of reduced earnings allowance from RMPS basic benefit since 1 October 1986. Those refunds will be made as soon as possible and should be complete by the first half of September.

At the same time it is necessary to amend the redundant mineworkers' payment schemes to provide for the deduction of reduced earnings allowance from basic weekly benefit in the circumstances that I have described. That is the main purpose of the order before the House tonight. The draft order also makes minor amendments to the 1978, 1983, 1984 and 1986 schemes to anticipate the introduction of income support and housing benefit schemes under the Social Security Act 1986.

I invite the House to approve the order.

8.13 pm

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): I may take up the last comment that the Minister made because I believe that it is pertinent to the brief remarks that I shall make.

It would be churlish of the House not to welcome the Minister on his debut in a debate on the coal industry. I have had the privilege of welcoming Ministers for the past 15 years. That is a long time and I am sure that many of the Ministers' hon. Friends may be sick of me standing at the Dispatch Box. Nevertheless, time goes on and we must deal with the issues before us.

To some extent, I accept that a case could be made for saying that these are technical amendments that had to be made to conform with legislation that has already been passed by the House. However, we notice that there is a tendency nowadays to hold few consultations with interested parties. I make no apology for stating that I believe in consultation and conciliation. I know of no other way to further decision-making in industry. That is how I was brought up and that is what I believe.

My inquiries have revealed that there was no consultation or discussion with the mining unions by the gentlemen in the Minister's Department or by British Coal. Of course, we can say that all this is a shift in the policy of British Coal. I remember when British Coal voluntarily briefed hon. Members about legislation that affected the industry. I am sorry to say that it does so no longer. I raised the matter with British Coal during the previous Parliament, and the only response that we had was its press releases. Of course, there has been a great deterioration in industrial relations in the coal industry. British Coal last year had its industrial relations named as among the worst in Britain.

Whenever housing and concessionary coal are mentioned in any order that is associated with British Coal a raw nerve is touched not only among redundant miners but throughout the whole work force. In previous debates we have given a good airing to the policy of British Coal and to some of the scandalous cases that arose from its jumble sale approach to selling off its housing stock. Dubious, speculative figures, as far from the coalfield as London, appeared to be the new owners. It would have tested the powers of a modern-day Philip Marlowe or Micky Spillane to trace them.

We are aware that British Coal had to make some changes in its plans. They may have been minor, but they owed much to some hon. Members, and to the Coal Communities Council, in particular. Much of what we are debating was discussed during the Committee stage of the Coal Industry Bill last year.

As regards concessionary coal for redundant mine workers and other miners, the many unfair anomalies that have been before us have never really been given proper consideration. One case especially angers all redundant mine workers and all those who work in the mining industry. It relates to what is called a material change in circumstances, and it concerns the case of a widow and what happened following the death of her husband, who had enjoyed cash in lieu under a former agreement. It is surely harsh to classify the death of a husband as a material change, thereby disqualifying the widow from receiving cash in lieu. I am certain that hon. Members will find that absolutely incredible.

British Coal's policy on industrial relations is costing the country dear. I estimate that it is costing us not millions but billions of pounds. Today we learn that there is a danger of the whole of Yorkshire being locked into strike action because British Coal has introduced a new code of industrial practice without consultation or conciliation with any of the mining unions. This order affords us the opportunity to say that it is time the Government looked into the matter, because the unions are having a national ballot on the issue.

I confirm what the Minister has said about the order. As I understand it, weekly benefit under the redundant mineworkers payments scheme can be reduced or extinguished if beneficiaries are receiving a special hardship allowance, supplementary benefit, or workmen's compensation. Moreover, the rent addition payable with RMPS to some tenants of British Coal houses is not paid to claimants who are receiving housing benefit, rent or rate rebates.

The Social Security Act 1986 makes substantial changes to the social security benefit system. Among the changes is the fact that the special hardship allowance has been replaced, as the Minister said, by reduced earnings allowance from 6 April 1987. We shall need to examine the Minister's comment about not wanting to test the matter in the courts. A further change is that supplementary benefit will be replaced by income support from April 1988; and housing benefit, although still called housing benefit, will be completely different from April 1988 onwards.

As far as I can see, all that the draft order does is to substitute the new statutory references for the old. Thus, section 59A of the Social Security Act 1975, inserted by paragraph 5 of schedule 3 to the Social Security Act 1986, replaces special hardship allowance by reduced earnings allowance as the benefit for people whose earning capacity is reduced by an industrial accident or disease.

Section 21 of the Social Security Act 1986 gives the Secretary of State power to set up the new income support and housing benefit schemes by regulation. Income support replaces supplementary benefit as a means-tested benefit for people who are not in work. Housing benefit is means-tested help for rent and rates and is available to low-income families that are in and out of work.

The Minister apologised to the House for the rather technical nature of his speech. I have spent a minute or two illustrating how, although it could be argued that these are technical changes, the propositions put forward by the Government affect people in the industry. They affect members of all the mining unions. There should have been consultation and conciliation on this order. The order is about people. If the Government do not think that people are important, they should change their attitude. There should have been discussion about the order because it will affect members in the scheme, and those people are entitled to know the impact that the order will have upon them.

The Minister is making his debut. I hope that he will consider some of the matters that I have raised because they are important. The Opposition do not oppose the proposition put forward by the Minister.

8.21 pm

Mr. Spencer Batiste (Elmet): This is a slender order and I shall be brief.

It is a great pleasure to welcome my hon. Friend the Minister to his first coal debate. He has a hard act to follow, but, given his formidable reputation, I am sure that he will rise to the task.

The order is a postcript to a scheme that saw the dramatic transformation and restructuring of the coal industry. Those things were an extraordinary achievement because they were done without a single forced redundancy. The order is a technical postscript bringing the scheme into line with current legislation. My hon. Friend's speech was technical, albeit brief. I and my constituents would like to be assured that none of the people who accepted voluntary redundancy under the terms of the scheme as it then stood will be any worse off as a result of this order. If that assurance can be given, I am sure that the House will give a general welcome to the order.

The scheme as a whole has enabled the coal industry to face the future with optimism and with a promise of success. It has provided funds for a variety of important measures. British Coal Enterprise has brought hundreds of millions of pounds of investment into coalfield communities. The new realism that this has engendered has ensured that for the second time, following the last general election, there are now more mining constituencies represented by Tory Members of Parliament than ever before. Miners understand where their real interests lie. They lie with a Government who have resolutely shown——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address himself to the order before the House. I have clear recollections of the difficulties that he has created for me in the past.

Mr. Batiste: I am aware of your strictures in the past, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I shall not seek to strain your patience on this occasion. I was responding to the point made by the hon Member for Midlothian (Mr Eadie) who talked about consultation and the importance of good industrial relations in the industry. He spoke about the strike that erupted in south Yorkshire this morning. The continuing progress that has been made under the scheme depends upon all who are in the industry ensuring that it can take advantage of opportunities that are open to it. They must produce the right product at the right price and at the right time. Industrial action of the sort that we heard being urged today by the Opposition is the one thing that can cast a blight upon the future of an industry that is otherwise very rosy.

I hope that on mature reflection the hon. Member for Midlothian will reconsider his words and join

[Mr. Batiste]

Conservative Members in urging members of the National Union of Mineworkers and constituents of his not to take part in such action. We should tell them that Britain needs coal and if the industry can continue to supply that need at the right price and free from disruption there is no limit to the progress than can be made or to the prosperity that will be created. Such success in the mining industry will spread prosperity throughout the mining communities. That is what we all seek to achieve.

Mr. John Cummings (Easington): Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for affording me the time to address the House for the first time. As I was walking through St. Stephen's entrance shortly after the election it reminded me of going underground for the first time. I follow now the advice that I was given then. It was, "If you do not know, ask." I have followed the advice tendered by officers and staff of the Palace of Westminster and I am truly grateful for their support and help. I am also grateful for the help and advice tendered by hon. Members from all parts of the House.

I am mindful of the fact that I represent a constituency with a very rich Labour and trade union history. I am also mindful of the fact that I follow in the wake of Sydney Webb, Ramsay MacDonald, Manny Shinwell and, more recently, Jack Dormand who was respected by all hon. Members. Like me, Jack Dormand was born and bred in the Easington constituency. He was educated and worked in the constituency and served as a parish councillor, district councillor and district education officer. In 1970 he was elected as the Member for Easington. He served in the Whips' Office and finally was elected chairman of the parliamentary Labour party. I wish Jack Dormand and his wife every happiness and health for a long and happy retirement.

Easington is one of the eight districts in County Durham and it has a rich culture and history. We have fine Saxon and Norman churches, beautiful denes and woodlands and, of course, a delightful coast. Those are the areas that have not been despoiled by mining activities.

Perhaps the most precious assets in Easington are its people. They are a very special breed. The people who populate the area came from Cornwall, following the closure of the tin mines in the 1860s. There are also people who emigrated from Ireland, following the potato famine in the 1840s. Many of those people were called industrial gipsies at the time, and now in 1987 they are again being called industrial gipsies. History has turned full circle. People who moved into the area looking for a future and security mined the coal that was necessary for the nation's weaith and well-being. They made Great Britain great, but now those people are virtually being turned out of house and home and are having to travel or move out of the area to make a living elsewhere. That is a disgrace of tremendous proportions.

According to academics, Easington is a deprived area. It is a deprived area, but we should not confuse deprivation with squalor, for squalor we have not, but deprivation we have. We have been deprived of our pits and of our jobs. We have been deprived of our hospitals. We have been deprived of our beautiful coastline by an uncaring industry and by successive uncaring Governments, who have ignored the problems of deprivation in the Easington district. I believe that the Minister is the only junior Minister who has not been to Easington. We have had 16 Ministers in the past 10 years. They come with their tea and sympathy, but with no money, and the problem gets worse. I extend an invitation to the only Minister who has not been there to come along, follow in the footsteps of his predecessors and see the shocking conditions that prevail on our beautiful coastline. The polluter must pay. Must we ask Lord Londonderry to cough up? Must we ask the directors of the South Hetton coal company to pay up? It is no longer with us. British Coal must pay, because the price falls on the pit. As the hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) said, we must produce at the right price, but I fail to see how it can be done if the polluter has to pay.

We have been deprived and robbed—over the past eight years, in particular—of the necessary funds to improve a decaying housing stock. We have been deprived of our housing investment programme and our rate support grant. We are losing population. Some 12,000 people have left the area in the past 10 years. We have an abundance of council houses, but we have an ageing population and a chronic shortage of aged persons' and special purpose accommodation, which is necessary to accommodate the aged, who, after a lifetime of work in the mines, are chronically sick and disabled.

The tide must be stemmed, and that can only be done by an injection of funds into the area to enable us to help ourselves and to prime the pump. We do not bellyache or whinge, but we want the Government to help us to help ourselves.

The only job-getting agency that has had any success in the area is to be wound up in 1988. The Government are depriving us of the Peterlee Development Corporation, which has been the only success story in the area. The only direct tap that we have into the central Exchequer is being taken away. Someone has nailed his political dogma to the mast and decided that it should be wound up in 1988.

Feelings in the Easington constituency are of hopelessness and helplessness. We want to be able to help ourselves, but we require the funds to do it. We have the will, the people and the skills, but we require the Government to help us to help ourselves.

We do not want redundancy pay; we want the dignity of a job. I am a sixth generation child of the coal industry. We have had six generations at Murton colliery who have been born and bred for the pit. We went to school at the age of five years and left school at the age of 15 years.

My plea to the Minister—we should not have to plead; it should be our right—is for the Government to return a small proportion of what has been taken out of the area. Give us the opportunity, the funds, prime the pump, and we will get the area back to work.

8.35 pm

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I have had many honours in this Chamber in the past, but none has given me greater pleasure than to congratulate the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) on his maiden speech. It has been my pleasure not only to know the hon. Gentleman since he was elected but prior to that when we worked together in the Coalfields Communities Campaign. He was the vice-chairman of that august organisation, which is doing such marvellous work for the coalfields.

The hon. Gentleman spoke eloquently about his predecessor, Jack Dormand, who was respected on both sides of the House. I know no one who is more suitable to replace Mr. Dormand than the hon. Gentleman who, as he rightly told the House, was born into the coal industry and during his lifetime has given everything to it. He must have been so busy working in the coal industry that he omitted to notice that my hon. Friend the Minister was the Conservative candidate in Easington for 10 years. The hon. Gentleman described his constituency beautifully and made us all wish that we had a beautiful coastline to share with our constituents. If the price had been right, I might have been farming in his constituency rather than in Sherwood.

I listened with great respect to what the hon. Gentleman said about the coal industry. We represent different parts of the United Kingdom, but we are both concerned for this great industry which creates so much wealth for our constituents. I hope that for many years the hon. Gentleman will ensure that future generations have an industry in Easington in which to participate.

Some eight months ago in the debate on the coal industry I told the House that it was recognised that the major reconstruction of the industry would come to an end and that the generous redundancy payments would be phased out. During that debate the new scheme, which was to be funded by British Coal, was introduced. At that time I asked my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to consider the position of the Nottinghamshire miners over the age of 50 years who were unable to participate earlier in the redundancy scheme because of the coal dispute. As a result of the co-operation between the management and the Union of Democratic Mineworkers, I am pleased to inform the House that all those over the age of 50 years who wished to take part in the generous scheme that was implemented by the Government were able to do so.

In Nottinghamshire there is a very bright future for British Coal. We have a democratic union that accepts the wishes of its members rather than forces them to do what it feels is best. That arrangement provides a strong foundation for a prosperous environment. I am proud to say that Nottinghamshire has set the pace for the rest of the country. Productivity levels are at a record high without endangering the safety of the workers. That has brought about a reduction in unit costs that will guarantee the future for our industry, even after the Central Electricity Generating Board has been privatised. I must remind the House that the CEGB already has the power to buy coal from overseas but does not do so because we do not have the facilities to import large amounts of coal nor the long-term contract prices attractive enough to do so. Those who tell us that that might happen do not seem to understand the system that operates. To deliver the coal from the colliery——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. Gentleman that he is widening the debate way beyond the terms of the order. He must speak to the order.

Mr. Stewart: You are quite right, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am just coming to the bit for which you were waiting. I was explaining how the productivity and the means of getting the coal from the pit to the power stations on the merry-go-round would protect jobs from overseas competition. The idea of importing coal and putting ships on the merry-go-round is beyond belief.

Today the Government hope to integrate the redundant mineworker's payments schemes with the social services benefits. That has been the aim of every Government since 1967. The scheme itself is no longer available, but, in my opinion, its replacement emphasises how successful British Coal has become. Like the majority of employers, British Coal has taken on the responsibility for its redundancy payments. It is a sign that the coal industry is no longer the liability that it once was. British Coal aims to break even next year—an aim that I hope and believe will be achieved. The Govenment have pledged £2,000 million investment over the next two years, and new attitudes and new optimism within the industry have made that possible. Because of that, the need for large scale redundancy payments no longer exists.

The coal industry is no longer the poor relation of Europe and its plans for expansion highlight that. It is no surprise that it is the workers who understand the need for six-day coaling. I am sure that I have no need to tell the House that British Coal's proposals do not require the miners to work one day——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. There is nothing about that in the order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will stick to the order. I hope he realises that if I allow him to pursue this course I shall have to widen the debate for everybody else.

Mr. Stewart: Because of the prosperity of British Coal, about which we should all hear, we will protect those who work in the industry and we will not need to participate in debates on redundancy schemes.

I am sure that I have no need to tell the House that British Coal's proposals do not require miners to work one day, one shift or one hour longer. It is only the machinery that will be working for six days. The potential for an increased work force is a logical result as is its financial benefit to the workers. It was stated this week in the press that Sir Robert Haslam has indicated to Arthur Scargill that miners would receive up to £20 a week more, ensuring the future of the industry. In Nottinghamshire——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is opening the way for a debate on the working hours of the coal mining industry. That has nothing to do with the order. I hope that he will stick to the order.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I would have been thrown out before now.

Mr. Stewart: It is significant that most of the coal industry is following the Nottinghamshire miners and their optimism. How gratifying it is to see that new optimism in the coal industry and I hope——

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Does that new optimism extend to the Linby colliery, which is now under threat of closure? Will it be a further extension of the generosity of the scheme, as we have seen it on the borders of my constituency, with the recent closure of Hucknall and Baffington pit since the hon. Gentleman spoke in the debate last year?

Mr. Stewart: The Linby colliery is in my constituency. If you will permit me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to answer my honourable colleague, I will explain that four years ago it was expected that Linby colliery would have a life of seven years. As I understand it, it is being looked at by the management and the trade unions, and I would hate to prejudice the outcome of those discussions.

[Mr. Stewart]

The miners are entitled to have a redundancy scheme. That safety net is the right of every miner and it should be supplied and secured by British Coal. Alternatively, there has been the expansion of British Coal Enterprise Ltd. which provides alternative employment to those miners who have had to take redundancy, and I hope that this order——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that we can stick to redundant mineworkers and concessionary coal and not move on to the subject of British Coal Enterprise Ltd.

Mr. Stewart: I hope that the order will be accepted by the House.

8.46 pm

Mr. Martin J. O'Neill (Clackmannan): I am pleased to have the opportunity of following the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings). It was an exciting and relevant speech. It is significant that a new Member gave us a clear instruction on the rules of relevancy by the way in which he kept talking about the coal industry and its contribution to the constituency of Easington. I know that we wish him well in every sense, in the same way as he wished his predecessor, our good friend Jack Dormand, well. He was a much-loved figure among Labour Members. We know that the new hon. Member for Easington comes to the House with Jack's good wishes, and we wish him every success. I am sure that his maiden speech helped to give him the confidence that he will no longer require in order to address the House.

I should like to speak about the two issues that relate to the order. One relates to a group of my constituents who will continue to benefit from concessionary coal, and another group who will benefit from the order because their colliery is, sadly, being closed. I am talking about Polmaise colliery.

I want to refer to those miners and former miners who are at present in receipt of concessionary coal but whose support under the scheme may not be sustained because of the policy of the Scottish Special Housing Association. That policy is changing the nature of the fuel source in their homes from electricity, which attracts payments in lieu of coal, to gas. Many miners and former miners in my constituency living in Scottish Special Housing Association homes in the villages of Tullibody and Sauchie in Clackmannan are losing their benefit under the concessionary coal scheme because of the change in energy source.

Although the Minister may not be able to address himself to that problem at the end of the debate, I hope that he will take that matter up. It is a pressing issue which other Scottish colleagues will want to raise with him. It beggars understanding. The connivance of British Coal in Scotland with the Scottish Special Housing Association is denying people benefits which they have come to believe to be their right, and that has serious affects on the financial circumstances of many of the households in my constituency.

The next issue relates to Polmaise colliery. I intervened in a similar debate in the summer of 1983 when the work force at that colliery was locked out because of a disagreement with the then director of the Scottish area, Albert Wheeler. That walkout soured industrial relations at the colliery. It was subsequently shown to be the fault of management and the work force had to be reimbursed, at considerable cost to the taxpayer, for the period when they were out on the streets. Very shortly after that the miners strike began, again at a time when the colliery was under threat.

The miners today decided reluctantly to accept the closure of the colliery. It is not for us today to discuss the closure—that is for union and management discussion—but it is clear that the redundancy payments of some of those miners will be affected by the order. This is the third time that Polmaise colliery has been given the death sentence and it looks as though this time British Coal will succeed in closing the pit. The village of Fallin, where the colliery is located, has been devastated by the news. Youth unemployment there is more than 50 per cent. and it had been hoped that the development plan for the colliery, which had been such a great success, would provide opportunities for many of the young males at present out of work.

The dreams of that community have been dashed by the closure. The men at Polmaise fought hard during the miners' strike to save their pit. The strike had 100 per cent. support and pickets were not required because no one went to work. On one occasion, the close co-operation between the police and the striking miners resulted in the coal board being blamed for fomenting trouble at the pit gates.

That colliery contributed a great deal to the colour, verve and life of the Scottish coalfield, and it would be remiss of me not to mention one man now benefiting from the redundancy scheme—John McCormack, who was the delegate at the pit and led the miners throughout the strike and for many years before. The men involved, who may well have to benefit from the order before us, have broken all productivity records in recent weeks and months working on the £18 million development programme which the board brought in after the strike. Having spent £4 million of that sum wisely and well, the board now seems more interested in providing money through the redundancy scheme than in continuing the life of the colliery.

If more and more Scottish mineworkers are not to face the reality of the redundancy scheme, we must have far greater assurances about the long-term future of the coalburn in Scotland and of coal-fired power stations such as those at Longannet, which is just outside my constituency, but which is served by the mines at Solsgirth and Castlebridge. We need to know the Government's intentions in respect of the CEGB. Scotland has the capacity to produce very cheap coal-fired electricity which could be used in England if the Government would convince the CEGB of the desirability of installing switch gear to allow cheap Scottish electricity to be properly integrated into the national grid. If those guarantees are not forthcoming very soon, the order will apply to far more people.

With regard to the tragedy of Polmaise, the last thing that I wanted was to participate in this debate and to have to talk about redundancy for men who fought so hard to save their pit and to save the coal industry in their area. I hope that we can be told something about the board's proposals, and the Government's views on those proposals, for the heating of houses by means other than coal and the effect of that on the concessionary coal scheme as it applies to my constituents.

We shall be coming to the Minister very soon to see what assistance can be afforded to a village which has been devastated by the closure of its pit and which no longer has any industrial employment, where male unemployment is 30 per cent. and youth unemployment 50 per cent. We expect the Government to do for that village what that village has done for the country, to provide it with the sustenance required to create employment for the future. The people of that village have worked hard to make Britain prosperous through the coal that they have dug in the past 100 years. They are entitled to support, not just from British Coal, but from the other arms of the Government which have resources—the Scottish Office and the Scottish Development Agency—to remove that monument to the coal mining industry, the bing which so dominates the village. The village is entitled to something better.

I hope that today's debate will give the Minister the opportunity to appreciate what the cost of hewing coal and the consequences of closure mean for the people of that village. We need far more than the tuppeny-ha'penny order before us today to satisfy their needs and to give them hope and faith for the future.

8.56 pm

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Cannock and Burntwood): Like my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill), I congratulate the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) on a most eloquent speech, which will surely have marked him out in the eyes of those on the Opposition Front Bench at the time. It was well within the spirit set by his predecessor, whose presence was valued and respected by Members on both sides of the House.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Easington has such attractive Saxon and Norman churches in his constituency. My constituency used to have an attractive Victorian church. Sadly, it was undermined by mining subsidence and no longer exists. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's churches do not suffer a similar fate. I also share the hon. Gentleman's view about entering this place, although I had not thought of it in quite that way. He likened entering the portals of this wonderful parliamentary building to going underground for the first time. I remember when I went underground for the first time—I have been down three times now—and I understand what the hon. Gentleman means. I think that we work as much in the dark here as some of those in the mining industry.

Mr. Skinner: I have seen the hon. Gentleman poke his nose in the Bar.

Mr. Howarth: I do not frequent the hon. Gentleman's Bar. He just gives the impression occasionally of having been in there. That is what is so charming about him.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) so rightly said, this scheme was fundamental to the restructuring of the industry that has taken place and led to the great progress that has been made in recent years. It is worth putting on record the incredible generosity of the redundant mineworkers' payment scheme. It was one of the most generous schemes, not just in the United Kingdom, but in Europe, and was unquestionably much envied by others in my constituency who found that they did not have the benefit of such a generous scheme when they were faced with redundancy.

It is also worth bearing in mind that the painful transition that has been made by the industry has been achieved without any compulsory redundancies, because of the generosity of the scheme. No other British industries can claim that they have been able to make painful adjustments to improve modern international trading conditions.

This scheme has come at a time when the outlook for the industry has never been better, as my hon. Friends have said this evening. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate, not only the miners in my constituency, but those throughout the industry, particularly those in the western area, on their productivity record. It is absolutely essential to ensure that the sort of scheme that was concluded at the end of March this year will not need to be reintroduced.

Littleton pit outside my constituency has reached a productivity level of more than 4 tonnes per man shift and Florence colliery further north in Staffordshire has achieved more than 5 tonnes per man shift. Such output is in line with what is being achieved throughout the country. Productivity is at an all-time high. Last year no fewer than 15 national productivity records were broken, which is evidence that the miners are playing their part in strengthening the industry. I am sure that we all wish to pay tribute to them for all that they are doing.

It is also important to bear in mind the Government's role. Opposition Members often accuse the Government of having a hands-off policy and of having no interest in the essential industries. I hope that, as they usually do in these debates, to be fair, they will pay tribute to the Government's efforts, especially in respect of investment since 1979. We hear a great deal from the Opposition about what they call a lack of investment in manufacturing industry. I dispute that. I think that no Government since the war can hold a candle to this Government's record of investment in the coal industry. I saw it at first hand at Littleton colliery only a few weeks ago, when I saw the new skip winder introduced at a cost of £4 million. Indeed, the hon. Member for Clackmannan mentioned an £18 million investment programme at Polmaise in his constituency. It is important to recognise that these are substantial sums of taxpayer's money.

Mr. O'Neill: I was explaining that the £18 million programme has been cancelled after £4 million of it has been spent. The money must now be used for other purposes in the Scottish coalfield because of the constraints under which British Coal is forcing the Scottish coalfield to operate. Therefore, the exact opposite of what the hon. Gentleman was claiming for his coalfield is happening in the one in which my constituents are employed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Before the hon. Gentleman answers that, may I warn him that I have the impression that we are going rather wide of the order. We are dealing, not with investment in the coal industry, but with the redundant mineworkers payments schemes. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted by the intervention or continue with some of his earlier remarks, but will return to the order before us.

Mr. Howarth: I most certainly would not wish to be tempted down the road that the hon. Member for

[Mr. Howarth]

Clackmannan wishes to lead me. I would merely say that I am sorry if I misunderstood what he said. Nevertheless, I think that £4 million is a large sum.

This debate is the first and will be the last on the coal industry in this new Parliament before the House rises for the long summer recess. Therefore, it is important to set the redundant mineworkers payment scheme in the context in which it was introduced. I shall say nothing more about the productivity record or about the Government's generous capital programme, because I believe that those things are now firmly on the record, not only because of what I have said tonight, but because of what has been said on previous occasions. However, I am bound to say that the industry's future, and the opportunity of avoiding the need for Opposition Members to press my hon. Friend and his colleagues to introduce a further redundant mineworkers scheme, can be secured only if the industry itself takes the necessary action.

It has come as a great disappointment to me, and to many others, that the National Union of Mineworkers has rejected six-day working. I believe that the Margam pit will be launched only if six-day working is introduced. Let me quote from a constituent's letter in Coal News:

"Yes, I would like to work four days a week instead of five. It would do very nicely. The extra two hours down the pit is only like working over."

I think that Mr. Saunders has made my point for me.

I welcome the efforts made by my hon. Friend on his first appearance at the Dispatch Box in our debates on the coal industry, which are always very friendly, if sometimes rather energetic. He has sought to tackle some of the problems that arise from the workings of the social security system as they affect schemes such as this. I believe that the long-term future of the coal industry looks extremely good. However, no Government can guarantee the job of anyone in the country, and the future security of the industry is largely in the hands of the people who run and work in it.

9.6 pm

Dr. Lewis Moonie (Kirkcaldy): I am grateful for this chance to make my maiden speech on a subject that is close to the hearts of so many of my constituents, the mining industry. I ask for your indulgence, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if, as is customary on these occasions, what I say is somewhat wider than the narrow scope of tonight's debate.

I am privileged to have been chosen by the people of Kirkcaldy and the surrounding villages and towns of Buckhaven, Wemyss, Thornton, Dysart, Kinghorn, Burntisland and Auchtertool, to represent them in the House.

My predecessor, Harry Gourlay, should need no introduction from me. He served the constituency with distinction from 1959 until his untimely death in April this year, when he was denied the long and happy retirement that he and his wife Peg so richly deserved. He was well liked and respected in the House, both for his knowledge of its procedures and history and for his quiet, dry sense of humour. He served as Deputy Speaker, Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means and a Scottish Whip. He chaired important Committees of this House impartially and fairly. In short, I am sure that he will be missed by friend and foe alike.

Before I turn to the subject of tonight's debate, I should like to give some background to my constituency—historical rather than tourist—which may be helpful to hon. Members. It has hosted some important events in Scottish history. Lying in the south of Fife, opposite Edinburgh, the constituency houses in the Wemyss caves some of the oldest cave drawings in Europe, most of them sadly lost through the ravages of time and the failure of the owners of the land and of local and Government authorities to agree on a programme for their safe keeping. That same area is the ancestral home of the Thanes of Fife, immortalised by the Macduff family in "Macbeth"—not very accurately, I may say, but immortalised none the less.

Further along the coast, at Kinghorn, Alexander III fell to his death, precipitating 25 years of struggle that culminated with the victory at Bannockburn and the declaration of Arbroath in 1320.

More recently, the most famous son of the town was undoubtedly Adam Smith, the author of "An Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations", to whom so many hon. Members adhere and pay tribute, in particular the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon) with whom I share a university if not the same political ideology. I shall quote two short passages from Adam Smith which may give hon. Members some cause for reflection. Early in the section on labour he says:

"No society can surely be flourishing and happy of which the far greater part of the members are poor and miserable."

He also said:

"Poverty . . . is extremely unfavourable to the rearing of children. The tender plant is produced, but in so cold a soil, and so severe a climate, soon withers and dies."

Those lines could equally have been penned by somebody with a more Left-wing reputation. They certainly reflect my views on the ills that affect an unfair and unjust society. In my work in health care day after day, I see the results of poverty, unemployment and inequality. I see the full effects of what has tritely been labelled the north-south divide.

The Kirkcaldy constituency has been associated with coal mining for centuries. Prior to the nationalisation of the industry the pits were owned by the Wemyss Coal Company, renowned, as others, for its rapacity and selfishness. Its inheritor, the Wemyss estate, still owns a large chunk of my constituency. The decayed and derelict properties, the run-down houses that are still lived in by so many of my constituents and the overgrown gap sites in the potentially lovely villages of East Wemyss, West Wemyss and Coaltown of Wemyss pay a stark tribute to the estate's commitment to social change and its regard for the community.

What about mining nowadays in my constituency? Kirkcaldy lies on the northern edge of the Dysart main seam. The coal seam is 12ft thick and runs under the Firth of Forth for many miles, and is one of the richest in Europe. On our side of the Forth it is now worked from only one coal face, the Seafield colliery. Formerly, on the north side of the town, the Frances colliery also operated, but the face was lost during the 1984-85 strike.

The only other working pit, the Michael colliery at East Wemyss, was closed in 1967 due to the tragic loss of life after an underground fire. The seam is sadly prone to spontaneous combustion—hence the problems that we have with it. It has to be operated at the horrendous gradient of almost one in two. Anybody with any knowledge of mining technology knows that it is very difficult for modern machinery to work effectively on such a gradient. One of the most impressive sights in mining is to watch a machine come down the face at that angle, cutting 12ft of coal at a time. If frightened me when I was down there two or three months ago.

Only sterling work by miners and management saved that seam earlier this year, as well as the introduction of new technology, with gas injection around the face to maintain a reasonable working temperature. Spontaneous combustion is still a real danger, and with it would come the total loss of deep mining in the area. Seafield is a tribute to the hard work of its work force. They have secured their future by increased productivity, and in the Scottish coalfields that is not easy. They have increased their productivity to the magical figure of 4 tonnes per man shift. Therefore, the pit's future should be secure.

But faces do not last for ever. There is to be investment in one new face. That will retain the existing jobs and add further years to the life of the mine, but we need more investment in coal seams such as this. Seafield's coal is low in sulphur. Therefore, it can be burnt with very little environmental damage. The rate of extraction could be increased by the development of at least one other face, either at Seafield or at the Frances colliery, which is still maintained on a care and maintenance basis. That investment will depend on the development of a secure market for the coal that we produce both here and abroad.

We need Government support to develop outlets for our coal, perhaps for the new generation of coal-fired power stations that we all know we need so desperately rather than the monument to nuclear technology rising across the Forth from my constituency at Torness which I can only just see on a clear day from my house but which no doubt on a clear night will be much more visible as it comes into production.

I am not just speaking tonight in support of coal mining in Fife. We need to preserve workshops in Cowdenbeath in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown). Those are vital for the future of mining in my area. With the loss of Polmaise colliery, the future of the workshops must be in doubt.

The miners' strike in 1984-85 left a legacy of bitterness in my constituency which must be overcome if the industry is to thrive again. I want to see justice done to the men who were sacked unfairly during the dispute and those who have still not been reinstated two years later. The goodwill built up over the past few years must be encouraged and fostered, not neglected.

The subject of tonight's debate concerns concessionary coal and that subject is frequently raised in my constituency. Unfortunately, I have more ex-miners than miners now in my constituency and the concessions are important to them. I want to draw the Minister's attention to the difficult situation in which many of my constituents are currently placed. Those who live in what are euphemistically described as "non-standard" houses with non-standard flues have been told that, due to the dangerous condition of the chimneys, they can no longer burn coal for heating and the houses will therefore have to be converted. The houses could be converted to a safer system of coal burning, but unfortunately the Scottish Special Housing Association claims that it cannot afford to do that because of restrictions on money. Many elderly people and pensioners depend on concessionary coal as it is part of their income. It is not a freebie or a free gift that they have been given by a grateful industry. Part of their earnings was committed to that year after year while they were working and they are entitled to it now in their retirement to keep them warm in winter. They will lose that concession and be converted to more expensive forms of heating such as gas.

I am sure that the Minister shares my sympathy for the plight of those people and I want him to do what he can on their behalf. I acknowledge that the difficulty is largely due to the current agreement between the National Coal Board and the unions and there are also problems with the Scottish Special Housing Association. Nevertheless, if the Minister could do something I would be grateful.

I thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me the opportunity to speak in this debate and for your forebearance as I have rather wandered from the subject. My constituency shows the stigma of years of unemployment, poverty and ill health. Coal mining offers many presently employed in the industry, those who are unemployed and the apprentices who could be working a chance of a decent productive future. I will fight to see that they get it.

9.17 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): It is a great pleasure to congratulate a fellow Scot on making his maiden speech in the House. Both sides of the House will agree that the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) spoke eloquently and knowledgeably about his constituency and the problems facing his constituents. I also congratulate the hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) on his maiden speech. Having heard the hon. Member for Easington refer to some of his political predecessors, I wondered whether the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy would refer to the most famous political son to come from Kirkcaldy, and indeed he did. He rightly quoted from Adam Smith to show that perhaps all the propaganda that is sometimes associated with Adam Smith tends to be one-sided. If we read his writings as a whole, we find that parts of his writings could be learned and read by Conservative Members to great advantage. I forgive the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy for omitting to mention one of the other important sons of Kirkcaldy—my right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel). I understand that he was born in Kirkcaldy.

We all look forward to hearing the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy speak again. No doubt those of us who are privileged to be members of the Scottish Grand Committee will hear the hon. Gentleman speak in that Committee. We all share in the tribute paid by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy to the late Harry Gourlay who for many years gave great service not only to his constituents and party but to this House.

The order is detailed and limited in its scope, but the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) rightly expressed some concern about the lack of consultation that took place before it was laid. The order might be technical and its purpose may be limited to clarifying that which might give rise to a challenge in the courts, but it is important generally for industrial relations that people are not taken for granted. When that happens, resentment tends to build up in an industry which has had considerable industrial relations difficulties over recent years. I hope that that point will be taken up by the Minister.

[Mr. James Wallace]

The Minister has talked about the need to avoid court action. Even as a lawyer, I would agree with him about that. If court action can be avoided, it is desirable that it should be. It has been argued that payments have been withheld since the introduction of the new social security legislation. I ask the Minister to confirm, when he replies, that the payments have been reduced, not withheld, and that they will be repaid in full over the coming months.

The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) referred to the closure of the Polmaise pit. That is of concern to him as a constituency Member, and over the past 24 hours it has concerned the whole of Scotland. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy put his finger on the problem when he said that there are more ex-miners than miners in his constituency. I understand that 12 years ago there were 1,000 miners employed at the Polmaise pit, and we are now told that the closure will affect 112. That is a measure of the decline that we have seen in the industry. Many of the 1,000 who were employed at Polmaise 12 years ago will be in receipt of the benefits that stem from the scheme that we are debating. British Coal has said that it hopes to find jobs in other parts of the Scottish coalfield for the 112 who will be affected by the closure, but press reports say that many of the 112 are somewhat sceptical about whether they will all find jobs. There is the feeling that there will be redundancies.

However generous redundancy and concessionary schemes may be, they cannot be any substitute for real jobs. We are talking of a community in which over 50 per cent. of the young people are unemployed. Four years ago hope was engendered by an £80 million investment plan. A community can be devastated when that which it thought was within its grasp is taken from it.

I hope that the Minister will be able to answer the questions which have been asked about Polmaise, even though it may mean you stretching a point, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when deciding whether the hon. Gentleman is in order. I hope that he will be able to say whether those who find themselves out of work at Polmaise will have a real chance of re-employment elsewhere in the Scottish coalfield. The devastation that is brought to villages as a result of closures can be compensated only in small measure by redundancy payments. The various divisions of British Coal, the Scottish Office and the Scottish Development Agency must make every effort to ensure that new hope is brought to an area that tonight must be suffering great depression.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): The connection between the reduced earnings allowance and the redundant miners payments scheme, which is the basis of the order, highlights the fact that the Social Security Act 1986 was an ill-thought-out piece of legislation. The Government have neglected to tie up the loose ends by means of consequential amendments, and that is the reason for the order.

It is interesting to learn that the Government intend to make repayments to miners who are affected by the terms of the order without there being a need for court action. That is an interesting departure from the situation in 1984. A number of my constituents, and literally hundreds of mineworkers in Yorkshire, accepted redundancy slightly before the 1984 strike, but even now they have not received redundancy payment or the unemployment benefit that they should have received as a result of the redundant mineworkers payment scheme.

The redundancy scheme was voluntary and we have heard from Conservative Members on at least two occasions that no worker in the mining industry was forced to accept redundancy. Unfortunately, that is not the case. Quite a number of workers have been faced with unreasonable transfers or redundancy. In the circumstances, they have been made compulsorily redundant. It is wrong to talk about the redundancy scheme as being wholly voluntary, particularly now.

Many men were faced with redundancy either at a time when they did not want to accept it, because it would not benefit them, or when they were faced with a transfer to a colliery 30 to 40 miles away, which would involve too much travel-to-work time. These are the compulsory redundancies that have occurred throughout the industry.

We must look to the future to see what problems will arise with redundancy payments. The average age of miners is about 35 years. These are men of my own age and slightly older who want not redundancy but jobs within their industry — something to which they are entitled. The Government should expand rather than contract the coal industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) has already made that point about the closure of Polmaise. In the Yorkshire area, the South Kirby, Woolley Wath, Kilnhurst, Treeton and Manders collieries this year have suffered either partial or total closure. It is obvious that the smaller number of collieries and the increase in technology mean fewer job opportunities or transfers within the industry. Therefore, there must be redundancies if British Coal is to pursue its present policies. How is it to achieve redundancies without some compulsion, which is the next step?

With the problems facing the industry, compulsory redundancy is compounded by a number of issues that are being debated. We heard from the hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) that the NUM has rejected six-day working and flexible working. Had he been at the NUM conference last week he would have heard a decision to hold a ballot on the issue, so the members of the NUM have not yet made their decision on that issue. As to four-day working, that is within a seven-day cycle or a continental shift. The four-day period could be over a Friday, Saturday, Sunday and Monday nightshift. Would Conservative Members relish such a prospect? The industry is facing flexible working practices.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: I am interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman has said about the ballot. However, what is his view? What recommendation will he be making to his constituents on how they should vote?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not be tempted by an experienced Member into straying out of order.

Mr. Illsley: I shall not be tempted into replying to that question, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is obviously a question for the members of the National Union of Mineworkers, according to the advice that they receive from their leadership. It is not connected with this order.

To return to redundancies and the problems facing the industry, British Coal will be hard pressed to find the collieries and the job opportunities for future transfers. There will be thousands of job losses and colliery closures because of increased opencast mining, increased imports—especially from South Africa and Colombia—and the privatisation of the electricity supply industry, which will be a forerunner to the privatisation of British Coal.

Earlier in the debate, we heard that there has been a total lack of negotiation and consultation about this order. Since the end of the strike, there has been no negotiation or consultation on any issue between British Coal and the NUM. That includes flexible working, the wage increases that have been imposed during the past two or three years, the conciliation machinery and the disciplinary code of practice.

The dispute over the latter during the past few days has resulted in about 18 collieries in my area taking strike action. Unless British Coal returns to the negotiating table with a genuine and sincere desire to negotiate on these issues, including redundancy, flexible working and a disciplinary code, there will be no peace in the industry and no prospect of achieving the future of which Conservative Members have talked. The industry does not have a rosy future. There will be more decline, more job losses and more pit closures. The problem will be eradicated only if British Coal has a genuine desire to negotiate.

9.32 pm

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I am pleased to be able to speak in the debate, partly because I was able to listen to two maiden speeches by Labour Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie) is a doctor. He has a doctor's voice. I can imagine a decent Socialist going into his surgery and coming out feeling better. I look forward to hearing a lot more from my hon. Friend.

The same is true of my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings)—a different voice fashioned in a different way. He is not here now, but no doubt he will tell me later that I am right in thinking that his voice was fashioned in the canteen, when it is crowded in the morning, when there is fag smoke—unlike the doctor's surgery—when people have a problem, when the miners are a bit unsure and when there has been no consultation, as with this document. People have to raise their voices and appeal for solidarity. We have all done it—well, nearly all. The Liberals have been doing a bit of that lately. There has been some shouting and bawling going on with them. I do not know whether it has been in the SDP canteen. Of course, they do not have a canteen; it is a telephone box.

Mr. Wallace: That is an old one.

Mr. Skinner: It is an old one, but the old ones are very good. They keep coming back.

It was delightful to hear the Liberals talking about a merger. It was a little gem to hear a Liberal standing up here and condemning the Tories and British Coal because there had been no consultation, after what their leader has been doing these past few weeks. I know that that has nothing to do with this order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I want to make it clear——

Mr. Wallace: The hon. Gentleman will be talking about nothing else for months.

Mr. Skinner: I think it is a good subject. The hon. Gentleman keeps intervening. He is heckling me and just encouraging me, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It is a delightful side show and there is no doubt about that.

When all the other things have gone off the front page of the newspapers, the editors can always turn back to the SDP and Liberal merger. The headlines will read "Is it on, or is it off?" That ballot will take longer than our ballot.

I am delighted to see that my hon. Friend the Member for Easington is now back in the Chamber. I had just referred to the way in which he was able to deliver a wonderful maiden speech and capture the attention of the House. I said that my hon. Friend's voice, unlike that of my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy, was probably fashioned in the canteen, early in the morning, when it is necessary to raise one's voice to get the message of solidarity across. I look forward to hearing more from my hon. Friend.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Easington mentioned churches. It gives me the opportunity to put on record—it does want putting on record—that I have enabled the coal board, or British Coal as it is now called, to start negotiations with Bolsover parish church over subsidence. Negotiations had reached a deadlock, and I was called in. The parish council said that British Coal would not pay subsidence costs. I said, "I will start the negotiations. I will have a debate in Bolsover parish church between me and Haslam." It was not long before British Coal went to its lawyers and started negotiating again.

I am pleased to take part in this debate because a new Minister is on the Front Bench. I shall not welcome him, because I do not know how long he will be here and I am not into that anyway. However, I hope that he will make a better fist of this than he did the Tory party computer. /Interruption./ Well, we judge people by what they do, not what they say. The Minister got involved in running this outfit, the Tory party computer. The computer was to link up with every constituency in Britain, but what happened? The firm went bankrupt. There were 150,000 other bankruptcies in Britain, but there was only one computer firm involved. The Minister picked the wrong one. When we come to think of it, the Minister could have been in easy street now.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The hon. Gentleman is going back a bit and scraping the barrel about my past. The Tory party purchased about 200 of those computers. My constituency purchased one and it is still working. I believe that the others are as well. I believe that that computer was rather successful, and we won the election as a result.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The whole House is enjoying the preamble of the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), but I hope that he will now come to the order.

Mr. Skinner: May I just say that the Minister's reply sounded a bit defensive. The truth is that the Prime Minister and the rest of them in Tory party central office said, "Get it out and start afresh."

This order is important because we believe that debating redundancy payments is not something that we should welcome. As my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) said earlier, this is all about more people being chucked on the Thatcher scrap heap. Every time we get one of these orders before us, however technical it might be, it is about people being thrown on to unemployment benefit and going to the Department of Health and Social Security. It is about people going for additional payments to Sheffield as contained in this order. It means that more and more taxpayers have to pay more money to keep people idle. The Opposition want people back in work. If people were back in work we would not have to import coal from about 30 different countries, some of it subsidised up to the hilt by those countries. We would sooner not have these dates on redundancy payments.

One of the reasons for this debate is the special hardship allowance. One of the reasons why the Government have changed from special hardship allowance to income support is that they have decided to get rid of that special hardship allowance. That allowance has been part of our welfare state since 1948. The miners needed that allowance because many injuries occurred in the industry. The result was that the Government changed the system in the Social Security Act 1986. Many miners and others will finish up with less on "special hardship", with its new title, and some will not receive any special hardship-type allowance at all. No doubt there will be a favoured few, but it is worth remembering that that is why the order has been introduced.

The same is true of rent allowances. The adjustment has been made because the Government ensured in the Social Security Act 1986 that people would get less on rent allowance and rent rebate. The result is that people have to make up the money from another source—in our case, the Sheffield headquarters of British Coal, which pays the money out.

The debate is not about sacked miners, as you said, Mr. Deputy Speaker. If we could get those 350 sacked miners back to work, that would be 350 people who could contribute to the nation's wealth, pay taxes and national insurance and reduce the mammoth bill of £21 billion paid out for those who are out of work. Although this debate is not about them, we cannot talk about redundancy without referring to them.

The same is true of the new problem in the coalfields. British Coal thinks that it has the whip hand. It thinks that it can put the boot in, assisted by Tory Members, many of them moonlighters who come into this building only two days a week, yet want miners to work six days a week. I heard them say that the other day. It is a scandal. They are trotting off for a three-month holiday, yet telling miners to work six days a week.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Withdraw.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman is a farmer. He is getting subsidies from the taxpayers, the miners, yet he wants them to work six days a week.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Skinner: I shall give way to jackboot.

Mr. Howarth: I shall ignore that remark, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman has to do so. I shall not withdraw it.

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman has just said that miners will have to work six days a week. He knows that that is a total untruth and that the British Coal Corporation has made it clear that no miner will be required to work six days a week. What will be required to work six days a week is the machinery.

Mr. Skinner: I have to say as quickly as possible, because I know that it is not quite within the realms of the order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that the hon. Gentleman cannot find written evidence from British Coal that is being reported to the NUM or any other union in the industry.

Mr. Howarth rose—

Mr. Skinner: The hon. Gentleman is holding a press release. I have seen it. It means nothing. There have been no consultations with any of the trade unions concerned. That is just a bit of sky writing for people like the hon. Gentleman to pick up to try to confuse people in his coalfield. They will not accept six-day working. There will be a majority against it in every area—[HON. MEMBERS: "In South Wales?"] And in South Wales.

The debate is also about coal allowances—it says so in the title. What has been happening lately to the miners' widows of 75 or 80 is a scandal. The Government are taking away the cash in lieu and the coal allowance. They have even introduced a new scheme under which people are put into little flats and bungalows and receive an allowance of 3 tonnes of coal a year instead of 5 tonnes. The Government have introduced other schemes under which people who have gone to live with in-laws, their daughter or son for a short period and then returned home have had their money or allowance taken from them. This is going back to Victorian days.

I make a final plea to the Minister, if he wants to make a name for himself. I have said about a dozens times in the House—perhaps more—in the past 17 years that there is a small group of people who are part of redundancy schemes introduced before 1968 and who do not receive any allowance coal. It is time that they were allowed that coal. There are a few hundred in Lancashire, Derbyshire and elsewhere.

The order is part and parcel of the whole jigsaw which, if the Tory Government remain in office, is a prelude to privatisation of certain parts of the British coalfield. That is why the Government like redundancy payments and coal imports coming in and taking away the jobs of miners. That is why they want to create a rat race and introduce flexible working and a six-day week. It is all part of that same pattern, and that is why we can understand that redundancy payments orders and coal allowance orders are all part of that same Tory creed.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I welcome the maiden speeches that have been made tonight and since the general election, particularly those by my hon. Friends. I find that we have much quality on our Benches, as demonstrated by the contributions of our new hon. Members.

Unlike my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), I welcome the Minister to the Dispatch Box. I questioned him on Monday during questions on energy. He said that he was going to help me and my constituents who are in difficulty with claims for mining subsidence. I only hope that he will keep his word and kick over the traces of the raw deals that my constituents, and those of other hon. Members who serve in mining constituencies, have suffered on the issue of subsidence. We want some straightening up and some management of the board from this House.

Under its new name, British Coal is running away with things. I remember the Prime Minister saying fairly regularly that management is there to manage and the workers are there to work. The order speaks of what I experienced as a lad in the pit when managers managed and workers worked — and we were trampled on and pushed around and had to put up with it. If we did not, we got our cards. That is what we are going back to, and the order is encouraging it.

The Minister comes from a different job. I regularly saw him on the television news. More often than not he was standing in an airport somewhere, so he has obviously been involved with aircraft and flying about all over the place. I am asking him to put his feet firmly on the floor——

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): Underground.

Mr. Haynes: I was going to say that, but my hon. Friend beat me to it. He should put his feet underground, too. I hope that he will make the necessary visits to talk to the men in the industry, and that he will do something else that British Coal is not doing. I refer to what my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) said about non-consultation between British Coal and the trade unions. That is a shocking state of affairs. It is now up to the Minister — the ball is at his feet — to put this right, because it is wrong. The machinery for consultation should exist and there should be consultation with the trade unions on this order, and on other measures too.

To hear Conservative Members talk, one would think that they were ex-colliers. They have never seen underground workings and do not know what mining is about. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover about moonlighting. The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) had the nerve to talk about the subsidy and the investment in the mining industry. The Government pour money into his pocket because he is a farmer. He is doing two jobs.

Mr. Andy Stewart: It is not illegal.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman tried to patronise us in his speech. He should be honest about the matter, because he knows full well that the policy underlying this order is linked to the problems in the mining industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) talked about more pit closures and about more people being made redundant. More money will have to be found to provide redundancy pay for those people. There are no jobs for the youngsters in the towns and villages where the pits are situated. There is no work elsewhere either, so the Government put them on a phoney training course that takes them off the dole queue. The hon. Member for Sherwood can grin and scratch his head, but we know what is going on. The hon. Gentleman is not prepared to accept but he knows full well that the unemployment figures are fiddled. Unemployed lads can no longer get jobs at the pits as lads used to do in years gone by.

The order mentions concessionary fuel. The more pit closures we have, the fewer men will be working in the pits. I worked underground for 35 years and made my contribution from my fuel every month to a pool for widows and retired miners. Where has that coal gone? What happened to it? I think that there has been a fiddle. The Government talk about what they will do with concessionary fuel, but they do not realise that, with fewer miners, fewer contributions are being made to the pool.

Retired miners nowadays are living far longer than they used to. There is an army of retired miners who have to be provided with concessionary fuel. The Government keep closing pits and reducing manpower, and the remaining work force is making fewer contributions to the pool for the people who have given a lifetime of service to the industry and to the nation.

Conservative Members are looking at me in a way that shows that they understand what I am saying but that they did not understand it before. This is a real problem and the Government are not grappling with it. Most of the problems stem from non-consultation. I have many years of experience in the industry and I know what is going on today. I shall not wander to the subject of flexible hours, but even that will have a serious effect on redundancy pay and concessionary fuel.

Many years ago, the management managed. They kicked us around all over the place. The hon. Member for Sherwood may grin, but he is only a lad and he does not understand.

Mr. Andy Stewart rose

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman should sit down. He has made his contribution.

Mr. Stewart: If the hon. Gentleman is so informed about the mining industry, why was it that at the recent election his majority went down and mine went up?

Mr. Haynes: I cannot explain that. You should tell me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, not to answer that question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I believe in being fair. The hon. Gentleman should answer the question briefly, but we must get back to the order.

Mr. Haynes: I am obliged, Mr. Deputy Speaker. That is the first time that you have said that to me and I shall take it on board.

How can I know why people voted as they did in Sherwood? I tell the hon. Member for Sherwood that I do not represent only the UDM. I represent all the miners in my constituency, which is more than can be said for the hon. Gentleman. He has been yawping about the UDM, but he never mentioned the NUM. He has NUM members in his constituency, but I represent all my constituents, not just one section. The hon. Gentleman might not get a 5,000 majority next time.

Mr. Stewart: It will be 10,000 next time.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman might have to return to farming, which would be welcome.

The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues think that they know about the mining industry, but they have never seen a No. 10 shovel. It is as big as a table top. Conservative Members may laugh, but this is a serious matter. I had a No. 10 shovel in my hands for donkey's years. I know what it is like to work underground in a mine. In this order we are talking about people who have given a lifetime's service to the industry but who have been put out of work by the Government because of their policies with regard to the mining industry.

My final plea is that we must return to the way that things were before I came to this place, when the National Coal Board, the trade unions and the men worked as one. That is how it used to be, but it is no longer like that.

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): When my hon. Friend mentioned returning to the way that things were, there were sniggers from the Conservative Benches. However, if we returned to the way that things were in Ogmore in 1979 we would have seven collieries employing 5,500 miners. I am sure that my hon. Friend would like to comment on that.

Mr. Haynes: I shall comment on that, and I hope that Conservative Members will wipe the grins off their faces, because this is a serious matter. Conservative Members have a job, and some of them have as many as seven. One has only to look at the Register of Members' Interests to see the moonlighting that occurs, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover said.

I used to have nine pits in my constituency, but there are now only four. That is all that is left under this Administration. The young lads who are leaving school cannot get a job at the pit. There are a lot more men who are not making a contribution because of those five pit closures. Therefore, money has to be found from somewhere else and the Government keep coming back with orders such as the one that we are discussing tonight.

I saw a list, not from British Coal to a Member of Parliament, or from British Coal to the trade unions, but in the Today newspaper only this week. It showed a list of pits that are uneconomic and ready for closure. All four of the pits in my constituency were on the list. If British Coal continues in that way, we will not know what is going on until Energy Question Time, when, if we are lucky enough to be called, we can ask the Minister what British Coal is doing and what is going on. It is not telling us anything.

The hon. Member for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth) held up a copy of a press release from British Coal. It means nothing. We are not talking about that; we are talking about the real things taking place in the industry, such as non-consultation. We have to keep emphasising that, and I hope that the Minister will do something about it. There is no consultation, either with the trade unions or with the men themselves.

The industry cannot work without the men. The results of the men are fantastic, they really are. The Minister knows that each week output records are being broken. I agree that the machines are doing the job, and they will be doing a bit more in the future if an agreement can be struck between the coal board and the union. That is where it must happen, not in here, not by talking to Tory Members of Parliament who represent mining constituencies. It has to be done in a proper way, like it used to be done before I came to this place. It is only since 1979 that it has all gone wrong. We have told the Government time after time, but they are not prepared to listen. They do not want to know. All they want to do, as my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover said, is to let British Coal keep putting the boot in. That is all that is happening. It is high time it stopped, and I hope that the Minister will do something about it.

10.2 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I intend to speak briefly, but I must say to the House, particularly to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart), that Conservative Members view the anger of Opposition Members as the anger of people who find that they no longer exclusively represent coal-mining areas. That is largely the reason for the invective imposed upon my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood, who — I shall be corrected if I am wrong — looks after the interests of more pits than any other hon. Member, and Labour Members do not like that.

I thought that the invective coming from Labour Members was a bit rich. It was unfair to my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood. The fact that he may be a farmer has nothing to do with this debate. We are debating an order. Snide remarks about people such as my hon. Friend, who happens to do a good job as a farmer as well as an excellent job as a coal-mining constituency Member of Parliament, are wrong. He did not deserve the abuse that he received this evening.

I wish to make two points in connection with the order, and they have both been raised in the previous two contributions. They were raised by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). One would imagine that since the Tory Government took office, and only because the Tory Government took office, we have seen mass redundancies, on an enormous scale. What we never hear from the Labour party spokesmen is that none of them has been compulsory. Those concerned have taken redundancy on very generous terms. It is wrong for the Labour party to suggest otherwise.

It is a smear on the Coal Board, and Sir Robert Haslam in particular, to say that it is asking for six-day working. The hon. Member for Bolsover said that it is all sky writing. I do not think that that is fair either. Sir Robert Haslam has made it perfectly clear. In a press release dated 9 July 1987—sent not just to Tory Members, but to all Members—British Coal states:

"There is no intention to introduce six-day working for miners. British Coal are proposing to introduce six-day coal production at a limited number of less than a dozen new or extended pits."

To hear the invective from some Opposition Members, one would not think that that had been stated publicly and in writing. Unfair party political smears are not to the benefit of hon. Members' constituents or of the industry: the order is.

10.6 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): As usual, the debate has been extremely lively, as it always has been and always will be because there are so many differences of opinion about this great industry.

The Minister says that this is a technical order which makes technical changes. Rather than seeking to explain the details at the Dispatch Box, perhaps the Minister will put explanatory notes in the Library about the technical changes, how and why they have come about, why they are needed and the effects that they will have. When the Government talk about technical changes, it usually means that someone will lose. It does not mean that everyone will win or even stay the same. Under the cover of technical changes, people lose money. I hope that the Minister will place explanatory notes in the Library so that we can advise our constituents.

I was surprised and annoyed that such a measure should be introduced without consultation with the trade unions concerned—any trade unions, as my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie) said. It is important that there should be consultation. The six-day week proposal is not new. It has been mentioned many times in the past. There have been changes, because restructuring did not begin in 1979. It began on vesting day and has been a continuing process ever since, and it will continue for some while yet. That is why there must be consultation before we debate orders of this kind.

When people consider the six-day week, they forget what has happened in the past. Output used to be calculated as output per man shift. Collieries with a high output per man shift were regarded as economic and fairly safe. That no longer applies because profitability is now calculated not in output per man shift but in cost per gigajoule. Miners have never been fools and they realise what six-day working will mean. The coal already on the floor will increase because six days' output will flow from six days' production. If we cannot cope with five days' output, what will happen to the increase? Without a shadow of doubt, it will mean colliery closures.

Lack of consultation shows lack of trust, and trust is very important in the mining industry. Back in the 1930s and 1940s, we had the Fleck report which said that there was too much academic experience in management and not enough practical experience, especially in industrial relations. Colliery closures have made this order necessary and not only miners, but administrative staff have become unemployed. The old, long-in-the-tooth managers and industrial relations officers have gone and we are left with a lot of whizz kids who have no practical experience and do not understand our history.

Before the strike we warned the House in a similar debate what would happen. In Yorkshire 19 collieries are on strike and the warning bells are ringing again. It is no use the Government saying that that is no responsibility of theirs. It is a nationalised industry with a chairman appointed by the Government. The Government must say to that chairman, "Let's bring back consultations. Let's get round the table and talk about these problems and measures." If they do not, they will again force the miners into a corner and the reaction will be exactly the same because that is the mining industry as it is, always has been and always will be.

The problem is that we have Ministers and bosses who do not understand the history or future of the mining industry. A future is there providing the Government take the men along with them. Without the men, the Government will fail. That was my first lesson in industrial relations. However good the idea is, it is no good unless the men accept it.

Let us have more explanation of the order and let us now have an assurance from the Minister that no one affected by it will lose either now or in future.

10.12 pm

Mr. Eadie: I am proud to refer to the maiden speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings). He said that he was a sixth generation miner and was a child of the mining industry. He has mining skills and experience of the coal industry, and he has worked in local government and for his trade union. The whole House will agree that his maiden speech showed that he will make a good contribution to this House as Member of Parliament. I am particularly proud because my hon. Friend is now a member of the largest industrial group in this House, the miners' parliamentary group, and on another occasion we had the opportunity to welcome him warmly.

I should also like to refer to my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie). He has special significance for me because he happens to be my Member of Parliament. When he described the seams of coal and the gradients of one and two in the Wemyss area where I worked for 30 years at the coal face, man and boy, I began to feel a little sore. He showed in his speech, as he has already shown in the constituency, that he will make a worthy Member and successor to the late Harry Gourlay. I am pleased to welcome him to the House.

The most depressing aspect of the debate is that only Opposition Members have talked about conciliation and consultation. The hon. Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) completely distorted everything that I said. I made a plea for consultation and conciliation. We heard nothing about that from Conservative Members.

It is wrong to impose, for instance, a code of conduct without any consultation or conciliation taking place with the mining unions. As a consequence, the whole Yorkshire coalfield is now alight. That should be a lesson to us. There must be a fresh attitude. We must get down to talking, discussing and arguing with British Coal as an employer. The Government must assist in that, because they are being accused of conspiring with British Coal to destroy industrial relations. This great industry of ours will never work without proper industrial relations.

There have been no negotiations about the six-day week. It is not good enough to quote a press release. Sending out press releases and saying, "This is what we are going to do" is no way to bring about good industrial relations. New proposals must be discussed with the representatives of the industry. Unless British Coal gets down to consultation and conciliation, when the miners' union decides to hold the ballot vote, I am afraid that British Coal will get the result that it does not want. Now is the time for talk; now is the time for consultation; now is the time for conciliation. That should be our message, and only the Opposition have tried to convey it throughout the debate.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) talked about the closure of Polmaise. I am very sorry to hear about that, because I was an agent in the area over 20 years ago, and I know the village of Fallin well. The villagers are a proud people, and they were proud of their pit. They had supplied generations of miners to that pit, and I know that they are suffering terribly from the staggering blow that the news of the closure has dealt them. Incidentally, as a consequence of that closure, a £4 million investment will be wiped out. I feel for my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan.

We shall listen with interest to what the Minister has to say.

10.17 pm

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is understandable that the debate, as was anticipated at the outset by the hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. Eadie), has ranged somewhat wide of the terms of the order. Concessionary coal, the code of conduct, Conservative party computers and many other issues have been raised. I hope that the House will forgive me if, on this occasion at least, I address my few remarks to points relating directly to the order. No doubt there will be many opportunities to debate some of the other extremely important points that have been raised.

I begin by adding my warmest congratulations to those already given to the two hon. Members who have made their maiden speeches tonight. The hon. Member for Easington (Mr. Cummings) spoke movingly of his constituency and of his eminent predecessors. By coincidence, as has already been mentioned, I found myself opposing two of them—Manny Shinwell in 1966 and Jack Dormand in 1970. I can now say, without harming either Jack Dormand's career or mine, that he was a very close friend of mine, and I fully agree with what the hon. Gentleman had to say about him.

I think that the hon. Member for Easington said that I was the only Minister not to have visited Easington. I have to tell the hon. Gentleman in all humility that I am probably the only Member of either Front Bench who has ever lived there. Be that as it may, I congratulate the hon. Member on a model maiden speech.

I congratulate also the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Dr. Moonie), who spoke movingly about the Seafield colliery. I know that the House will wish to join him unreservedly in paying tribute to the bravery and dedication of the Seafield miners who in January fought that underground fire.

One of the main themes of the debate has been consultation. The word has been used many times, in particular by the hon. Members for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes), for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner). I recognise the great experience on both sides of the House concerning this industry. Therefore, I have listened carefully to what has been said about consultation. I do not necessarily agree with all that has been said about consultation, but I shall read carefully what has been said about it.

As for consultation on this order, there has been no change in the policy relating to or the substance of the redundant mineworkers payments scheme. It would not have been reasonable, therefore, to engage in a long period of consultation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste) asked for an assurance that nobody would be worse off as a result of the order. I can go further than that. I explained in my opening speech that the recipients of RMPS basic benefit who have also been in receipt of the reduced earnings allowance since 1 October 1986 will receive a refund of the reduced earnings allowance deductions that have been made since that date. Apart from that, there will be no significant change to the payment of basic benefit as a result of the order.

The hon. Members for Orkney and Shetland and for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) referred to Polmaise. There will be no compulsory redundancies at Polmaise. Transfers will be available for those who do not wish to accept voluntary redundancy. The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) said that payments that are due under the RMPS have not been made in certain cases. I was surprised to hear about that, and if he will write to me I shall look carefully into it.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: The hon. Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) made an important point that is a cause of concern to both sides of the House. It relates to payments that should have been made to men who accepted voluntary redundancy before the strike was announced, who became redundant during the strike and who have been unable since then to obtain unemployment benefit. The matter has gone to the social security commissioners. If my hon. Friend could find time to introduce an order to help those people, he would be doing a great service to the constituents of many hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Spicer: That is an interesting point. As the case is with the commissioners, I imagine that it is being looked at very carefully. However, I shall certainly look into the matter.

The hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) said that this is such a technical order that further details, if any, should be placed in the Library. I will certainly consider whether there is any further information that I can sensibly publish. If so, I will write to the hon. Gentleman and put a copy of that letter in the Library. However, I will consider whether there is anything further that can usefully be said of a technical nature.

My hon. Friends the Members for Cannock and Burntwood (Mr. Howarth), for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) and for Newark (Mr. Alexander) made the theme of their speeches the fact that the industry has a great future if it can continue on its present path of producing coal more and more efficiently. I agree with them. I also agree with those who have said that the greatest challenge of all is to take those who work in the industry with us.

Mr. Barron: At the moment, Colombian coal is shipped into the Thames estuary and delivered at 80p a gigajoule. How can the British deep-mine coal industry compete with that? We are competing with very low production costs because children are being used to produce that coal. This House, more than 100 years ago, said that it was illegal to employ children in that way in this country.

Mr. Spicer: The hon. Gentleman, who is extremely knowledgeable on this matter, knows that the vast majority of coal that is currently imported is specialist coal for coking purposes. That is why we want to see the Margam pit developed and coming into production. Coal from that pit would be import-substituting. That is why we want that pit to be open and working efficiently. That meets the point raised by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

Mr. Barron: The Minister has not answered my question.

Mr. Spicer: I have the perfect answer. British coal of the right type must be produced so efficiently that we do not need to import coal in the way described by the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Batiste: Does my hon Friend agree that the greatest incentive for importing coal is industrial action in the coalfields, which makes customers for coal concerned about the security of their supplies?

Mr. Spicer: My hon. Friend has made an extremely important point which I hope will be heard outside this Chamber.

I have had only a short time to look at this industry. However, the more that I look at it, the more I think that it has a great future.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Redundant Mineworkers and Concessionary Coal (Payments Schemes) (Amendment) Order 1987, which was laid before this House on 6th July, be approved.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, ETC.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

EDUCATION

That the draft Education (Assisted Places) (Amendment) Regulations 1987, which were laid before this House on 25th June, be approved.

VALUE ADDED TAX

That the Value Added Tax (Construction of Buildings) (No. 2) Order 1987 (S.I., 1987, No. 1072), a copy of which was laid before this House on 24th June, be approved.—[Mr. Neubert.]

Question agreed to.

University Funding

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neubert.]

10.27 pm

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I am very glad to have the opportunity at last to debate the issue of the funding of universities. This matter has caused me considerable concern. It has also caused many hon. Members concern and was a major issue in the general election in Scotland. It probably cost one Conservative Member his seat and nearly cost a then Government Minister his seat also, a fact that he has acknowledged.

Dealing with the body responsible for the universities — the University Grants Committee — is rather like grappling with warm blancmange. Nevertheless, the more we get involved with the funding of universities the clearer it becomes that the funding provided by the Government for any real constructive future for the universities is woefully inadequate. The universities are not merely being pressurised to change direction in ways about which they are unconvinced — as the Government would have us believe; they are effectively being asked whether they want to cut off their hands or their feet. Whatever decision they take, they will be crippled.

Matters get worse. When the universities appeal to Minsters or when I appeal on their behalf—and I hope that tonight will be the exception that tests this rule—for clarification whether the Government are aware that decisions are leading to wholesale destruction of areas of value and achievement, devastation of morale and quite definite brain drain, the standard response is that these matters are delegated to the University Grants Committee to which it appears that there is no appeal.

There are some general matters of importance that I wish to raise before I turn to examples from the Scottish universities, for which I have most concern and which, in my view, seem to demonstrate the inadequacy and inconsistency of the present system of funding universities. First, I shall quote the Prime Minister, or, as she was at the time of the letter to a prospective constituent, the parliamentary candidate for Finchley. She wrote:

> "One of the main tasks of the universities in London, as elsewhere, is to carry out research. It is therefore important to ensure that university staff do not bear too great a load of teaching. Recognising this, the Government have taken action to ensure that the contraction in the numbers of academics has been matched by a comparable contraction in student numbers."

I suppose that that is clear and that we should be grateful for that, but that is not something that is appreciated widely outside the House. If it were, I think that it would be challenged.

I am concerned about the Government's determination to put a measurable price tag on everything. In the context of university education, that means that we are looking for the cheapest degrees rather than the best, even though British universities by any independent standard are already extremely cost effective. It means also that pure research will be sacrificed in favour of applied research by contract. The consequent underfunding of research will drive away the brightest and the best, not because they are badly paid but because they cannot get the support and the facilities that they need and that other countries are likely to offer them. That is already the experience. The overseas staff that we are getting in exchange, without denigrating the value that they contribute, are not of the same level of achievement or record.

There is widespread concern at the latest suggestion that universities should be divided into three tiers, with only the top 10 being designated as full-blown research centres. If the suggestion is implemented, it will be a devastating blow to many fine, well-established centres of learning and research. It will be bitterly resented in Scotland, which had four established universities when England had only two. I ask the Minister to tell us whether the proposal is supported by his Department. Or will he state clearly that, whatever changes may be made, Britain needs at leat approximatley its present number of universities, and that to be universities they must offer a mixture of research, undergraduate and postgraduate learning?

Will the Minister explain also why Government policy is to see the number of university students declining over the next few years and into the next decade instead of increasing as the lower birth rate offers the opportunity to a larger proportion of the population to secure access to a university education? When we read the glossy publication that masquerades as a White Paper, it is difficult to get at the facts. There are many pretty charts, but the figures that are needed to make a fair analysis are not spelt out clearly. Perhaps that is because the Government are not proud of them.

The system of finance that is applied by the UGC is having an effect in the sense that it is diverting energy, effort, time and academic brain power to the drafting and redrafting of academic plans, which most of those involved know savage the best of our university system and lead to the worst kind of academic infighting. Hon. Members who have been involved in university politics know that they are capable of reaching depths that we only play at in this institution. The worry is that that diverts the attention of the dons, the students and the public from the fundamental philistinism of the Government's attack on university education, which is substantially going by default.

I do not think that anyone denies that universities need to change, and nor is it denied that outside bodies need to apply pressure to bring about that change. I have been critical of my local university of Aberdeen for its failure to respond in a sufficiently ambitious way to the oil industry.

However, the proposal to replace the inadequate UGC, which has been dominated too much by academics, with a new body that will be dominated by business men leaves many open but important questions. The fundamental point to which the Minister should address himself is that universities have to be more than short-term responders to commercial pressures. Scottish universities are suffering much more from the system of funding and from a committee that does not seem to understand the Scottish tradition and system and the pivotal role that education and the universities play in the life of Scotland.

Examples from my experience reinforce the arguments that I have been making. I do not normally quote my direct connections, but in this case they are relevant and may even amount to a declaration of interest. I am a graduate of both St. Andrew's university and Strathclyde university. I am the elected rector of the University of Dundee, and co-chairman of the university defence committee for Aberdeen, along with three parliamentary colleagues representing the National, Conservative and Labour parties.

Dundee is a small university which gained its independence from St. Andrew's just 20 years ago. It has fought hard and successfully to build up a reputation and attract students. It has done well and gained a well-earned reputation. I spoke to the university finance officer today. With the threatened removal of the safety net, the university faces nothing less than insolvency in about two to three years time. To avoid that, it would have to make devastating cuts, which would restrict its ability to attract students and leave it open to further cuts.

Already, the proposal to move the modern languages department to St. Andrew's — it was to be Exeter, so that is an improvement — has caused an understandable outcry. How can a university which can justifiably say that it is responding positively to the UGC's constraints, in expanding its already successful business department, do that in a modern European Community when it does not have the facility to teach modern languages such as German and French? It is an absurd situation. I know that the response is that there will be some residual teaching outside the modern languages department, but the university will lose the staff that built up that reputation for teaching French and German. That will be damaging to the future of the university.

The Minister will not be surprised to hear me come closer to home. The situation in Aberdeen is becoming a cause célèbre. The Minister may say that he is not here to reply on behalf of a specific university, but what I shall say about Aberdeen is a criticism of the whole system of funding universities. I have had first-hand and detailed experience of this, and I do not like what I see.

What is happening at Aberdeen is an abuse of the system. As many people will know, the principal of the university, Professor George McNicol, produced what he described as a radical plan to end the four-year honours degree course in favour of what I would describe as a crammer approach for a 40-week year, three-year course. Many of us would agree that such an approach may benefit some students in some subjects, but it will undoubtedly damage and undermine others, many of whom would not be able to take that intensity of study. They would not get the full benefit of the new course, which would change the character of the honours degree course and have implications for schools.

The Government have asked universities and others to listen and respond to the market. Market research in this case has shown that, far from attracting more students to the University, the new course would put off many who would seek to go elsewhere where they could get a more traditional degree. The chairman of the UGC, Sir Peter Swinnerton-Dyer, said early on that he would fund the plan, in spite of the subsequent representations. The principal, having seen his plan pasted by almost everyone within the university, described it as being "in intensive care" and said that he would not the one to resuscitate it. But Sir Peter, in collusion with the principal, is trying to be the one who does. It is no less than a conspiracy, because every alternative plan that has been put forward is being rejected out of hand without any consideration — by return of post so far — by the chairman of the UGC. It is clear that he is trying to put pressure on the university to accept something which the university has discussed in detail and has decided is very damaging to its interests. It is a devastatingly destructive plan, and the university is right to resist it.

It goes further than that, because the collusion has been watched closely by other Scottish universities, which know perfectly well that this is not just an argument over one academic plan. It is a matter of picking one university and leaning on it so heavily that it will capitulate. If that happens, the dam will have been breached for the crammer degree to have been imposed on the other seven Scottish universities. It will not be acceptable for the Minister to say tonight that this is a matter entirely for the UGC. I think that it is a matter of deep concern and a matter for all those concerned with Scottish universities. I have no doubt that similar practices are being applied in different directions to English universities, but of that I have no direct experience.

There is little understanding of the Scottish system or the Scottish tradition or the implications of such changes. There is a total refusal to recognise Aberdeen"s role, which I remind the Minister has been carried out for 500 years, as the university for the north of Scotland — an area covering about one fifth of Britain. They fail to recognise that students have come to expect a fair range of subject choices within their regional university. They know that they cannot get everything; they know that there should be change; but they do not believe that if we lose research and too many of the options, the university will offer enough attractions to continue as the regional university. Worse, it will be even harder for the university to attract students from further south. It is, after all, the northernmost university in Britain. All of these matters could seriously undermine its viability in the future. The system of university finance is not changing our universities; it is potentially destroying them.

Can the Minister give me an assurance that Aberdeen university will celebrate its quincentennial in seven years' time as a full-status university carrying out research and offering postgraduate and undergraduate courses fully comparable to the best available anywhere in Scotland? If he cannot or will not do that, my case is made; and I do not believe that saying that it is a matter for the UGC is good enough. When every other country is expanding its universities, the vandals in his Department are trying to contract and destroy our universities. That is unacceptable.

I conclude by quoting from a partisan article that forcefully expresses my point written by Michael Dummett in The Tablet. The point that he makes summarises what many people feel about what is being done. If the Minister does not believe that that is the case, or believes that it is unfair, his Department must do a great deal to change people's view. He says:

"The three relevant Thatcherite dogmas are: people do things only in response to financial incentives; human beings are commodities like other commodities; what matters is not quality but cost-effectiveness."

Crammer degrees are not what the Scottish system wants, and cut-price degrees are no substitute for the best degrees available. The course that the UGC is adopting is taking us downhill in every sense of the word. Change is welcome; destruction is not acceptable.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Jackson): I congratulate the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) on his luck in the draw, and on the cogency and commitment with which he put his case. I also pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside (Mr. Buchanan-Smith), who is unable to be here tonight but who telephoned me today to discuss the important issues that are the subject of this debate.

I begin with a few remarks on the broad theme of the hon. Gentleman's debate, which concerns the general question of the funding of universities. In the light of the hon. Gentleman's remarks—and his quotation from my good friend, Professor Michael Dummett — about Philistinism, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear that one of the books that I have re-read in preparation for my present job is Matthew Arnold's "Culture and Anarchy". Arnold would have seen the question raised by the hon. Gentleman as a mere matter of machinery. But in this he would have been wrong. Indeed, it is striking that Arnold failed altogether to understand the bearing of machinery on values. But in my first speech from the Dispatch Box on educational matters I should like to make a profession of Arnoldian faith; I hope that no one standing in this place will ever lose sight of the wider and higher purposes which all the machinery and all the apparatus of the universities are intended, if not designed, to serve.

Before I plunge straight into these questions of machinery I shall recite a few facts — that should never be lost to sight in the welter of polemic and special-pleading that tends to surround these matters.

Between 1979 and 1985 the number of students in higher education increased by 160,000. The share of the 18 to 21 age group that graduates in Britain is one of the highest in the Western world and the highest in the European Community. And in answer to a direct question from the hon. Member for Gordon let me remind him of the Government's clear commitment to a further increase of 50,000 in the numbers of them in higher education by 1990.

University funding has increased by more than 10 per cent. in 1987-88. The very substantial increases in public expenditure that were announced last November were accompanied by letters from the UGC and the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals outlining a forward-looking and ambitious programme of action for maintaining and improving academic standards and strengthening management. The first fruits of that programme are beginning to appear. By this autumn we shall have, for example, comparative information about university costs in the form of a range of performance indicators. The universities are to be congratulated on the progress that they have already made in this and other areas. As they know, the additional funds that we have undertaken to provide will remain conditional upon continued progress.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Is the Minister aware that in the three years 1986-87 to 1989-90 there has been a 10·6 per cent. increase in terms of the average to English universities from UGC distribution grant? However, in terms of the average to Scottish universities there has been an increase of 6·1 per cent. Surely those figures support the argument of the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) that the UGC simply does not understand the Scottish university system.

Mr. Jackson: The hon. Gentleman is being impatient. Later in my speech I shall be dealing with the question of the allocation of resources between universities, especially with regard to the Scottish universities.

I should like to highlight two points relating to the broad theme of this debate. First, management. It is now over two years since the Jarratt committee reported. It concluded that throughout the university system there was scope for improvements in management to ensure that full value could be obtained from the large sums of public money that are expended. It also reommended that there was scope for improvements to make the university system more flexible and responsive; above all, I would say, to realise more effectively the ideas and values for which it stands. The Jarratt committee made important recommendations about the need for management structures that would clearly define the levels of decision making and responsibility. There is encouraging evidence that many universities have taken the Jarratt recommendations to heart and introduced important and far-reaching reforms. I look forward to receiving shortly the UGC's report and commentary on what has been achieved.

Secondly, there is the matter of teaching quality. I recognise that judgments in that area are both controversial and technically complex. However, we cannot get away from the central importance of the quality of teaching for the success of higher education. Our universities must hold fast, some would say recover, their teaching vocation. As Newman reminds us, that vocation is at the heart of the idea of a university. The committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals has undertaken to produce two pieces of work — a report on university practices in maintaining and monitoring academic standards, and guidelines on the appraisal of the performance of academic and academically-related staff. Those reports will be of key importance.

I have made it clear that, over the past year, the Government have shown their commitment to make increased resources available to the universities. I have also emphasised the areas in which we are looking for progress. Let me now consider the distribution of resources between individual universities.

It is, of course, central to our philosophy of academic self-government that this is a matter in which Government should not be too directly involved — hence, the importance of the UGC. In 1986-87 the UGC introduced new machinery for resource allocation. This has two distinctive features. It distributes the teaching component of grant on the basis of a standard cost per student per subject; and it introduces into the allocation of that part of the grant attributable to research a new element of explicit selectivity, based on universities' success in attracting outside income for research and on judgments about quality. The Government welcome the UGC's new approach. It has a somewhat egalitarian cast, but it is more rational and objective, and it rewards success—which is how it should be in these matters.

The Government believe that in particular the UGC was right to introduce measures to provide more support for high-quality research. Much academic discourse turns on the judgment of quality. I cannot see why it should ever have been thought that such an approach was inappropriate. Public funding for research is not a matter of entitlement; it has to be merited.

Of course, there is debate about particular ratings—it would be surprising if that were not so. But the UGC has begun well and it is, of course, clear that no rating is cast in stone for all time. There will be continuing review, which will have to take account of shifts in the quality of research performance, both improvement and, dare I say, deterioration.

Selectivity in research will inevitably and rightly lead to increased concentration on areas of strength. It means giving extra support to high-quality work and taking a hard look at what is below par. In institutions with a vocation for excellence none of this should be controversial. The UGC is encouraging the rationalisation of small departments. Its grounds for doing so are maximum academic effectiveness as well as the best use of resources. It has the Government's full support. Aspirations to universality, perhaps never very realistic, may have to be abated. But, without becoming too narrowly focused, universities which concentrate on building on their strengths will be healthier in the long run.

The position in Scotland is the special concern of the hon. Member for Gordon and my right hon. Friend the Member for Kincardine and Deeside. I do not think that I need say that the UGC's funding formula is blind to geography. Standard criteria are applied to all universities on a national basis. At the same time, the special and valued characteristics of university provision in Scotland have not gone unrecognised. The UGC's grants fully reflect the fact that most honours degree courses in Scotland last for four years. Consequently, the universities north of the border receive roughly 30 per cent. more funding per honours graduate than do their English and Welsh counterparts. Meanwhile, however, the impact of the UGC's new and more rational approach to funding inevitably differs in individual cases, depending on the institution's previous level of funding and on the quality of its research efforts. On that basis, in 1987-88 three of the eight Scottish universities received above average increase of basic recurrent grant.

The hon. Member for Gordon referred specifically to Aberdeen university. Its initial allocation of basic recurrent grant in 1987-88 was no more than 0·7 per cent. higher than the comparable figure for the previous year. That was a consequence of the application in this case of the UGC's general policy of supporting research strength and external research income. At Aberdeen, these were both some way below the national average. That is not to say that there is no high-quality research at Aberdeen. On the contrary, the UGC assessed research in three subject areas of that university as being of above average quality in United Kingdom terms, and geography and French were considered to be outstanding by international standards. But those judgments, I am afraid, were counterbalanced by below average ratings in 10 other subject groupings.

The university is in discussion with the UGC about the careful planning which is needed for a transition to a new funding level, and I must obviously not comment on the delicate negotiations which are going on. I wish merely to stress that there is no question of any discrimination against Aberdeen or of any conspiracy — such as the hon. Member for Gordon has fancifully alleged — and that, with regard to the future of the four-year degree course, the UGC has deliberately stated that it has no view either way upon the academic aspects of this matter.

Returning to the future of the university funding system, the Government have announced their intention to legislate to reform the UGC along the lines recommended by the Croham committee. This will give a firm legal foundation for the universities' funding and it will clarify responsibilities for the large sums of public money that they receive. The new university funding council will be smaller than the present UGC and will have a stronger non-academic element. I noted what the hon. Member for Gordon had to say about that.

With regard to the general position of Scotland within the new arrangements, the Government consider that the university system should be planned on a United Kingdom-wide basis, and I believe that that is the view of most Scottish academics.

Mr. Salmond: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jackson: I am coming to the end of my time.

We accept that there is a need to improve the planning of higher education in Scotland generally. The intended Scottish committee of the Universities Funding Council will provide an appropriate means of achieving that. Precisely how that committee operates will be a matter for the new council. The Government see their primary task as being that of advising the UFC on the needs of the Scottish universities in relation to their particular circumstances — including, I would expect, their special history, their special ethos, to which the hon. Gentleman referred and, of course, their geographical distribution.

To conclude, I do not think that it is necessary to stress that the Government attach great importance to our universities. They are institutions that embody and transmit values that are central to our civilisation, and they are critical centres for the development and creation of new values. In addition, they continue to make a vital contribution to the nation's economic development. The thrust of all our policies can be simply summed up; it is to strengthen the ability of Britain's universities to fulfil their historic vocations with increasing rigour, drive and effectiveness.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at four minutes to Eleven o'clock.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Patrick John Elwood

9.36 am

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I present to the House a petition in the name of Patrick John Elwood for a transfer to Dartmoor prison for the final six months of his sentence.

To lie upon the Table.

Inner Cities (Policing)

9.37 am

Mr. Churchill (Davyhulme): I beg to move,

That this House congratulates Her Majesty's Government on increasing by almost 50 per cent. in real terms the resources available to the Police and on strengthening Police manpower by more than 11,000 since 1979, but notes with concern the far greater burden of reported crime, including crimes of violence and armed robbery, carried by individual Police officers in metropolitan areas as compared to the shire counties; and calls upon the Home Secretary to review further the needs of inner city Police forces for additional manpower and resources.

In the Gracious Speech, the Government made it clear that in the life of this Parliament their plans to bring new life and new hope to inner cities would be central to their strategy and that inner cities would be given a new priority. As one who for 17 years has had the honour to represent a Greater Manchester constituency, I welcome that new priority. The regeneration of housing, business and jobs in the decaying and festering parts of our cities is urgent and overdue, but all efforts will be in vain unless those who live and work in the cities can walk the streets in safety and can feel secure in their homes. It is for that reason that, on learning that I had drawn first place in the ballot, I chose this subject for debate.

I am delighted to see the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) taking up his duties as shadow Home Secretary for the first time. I congratulate him on his new position. I venture to hope that, as someone who represents an inner-city area, I shall even enjoy some support from him today.

In metropolitan areas generally and in inner-city areas in particular, we face an alarmingly relentless upward surge in crime, combined with a critical shortage of police manpower and resources to deal with it. Our policy is to request the Government to undertake an urgent re-examination of resources. The police need help. I trust that my plea will reach the Home Secretary and that he will address the problem as a matter of urgency. Only if we get a firm grip on crime and violence in the inner cities can the Government hope their strategy to succeed.

Whatever the grants and other inducements to people to move into the inner cities to set up businesses and to open shops, they will not remain in an environment if they are frightened and feel threatened. That is why policing the inner cities is an essential prerequisite to the urban regeneration to which the Government are committed. It is absurd to imagine that people will invest in shops and businesses if they are regularly vandalised and if as a result insurance premiums are way beyond the rates that they can afford.

There are some recent instances of shopkeepers in inner Manchester having to sleep in their shops permanently because they are so alarmed by the number of times that their shops have been broken into during a single year. The people who work in those shops are entitled to feel that they can go about without risk of being mugged, raped or subjected to other violent assault.

The Home Office and successive Home Secretaries have repeatedly laid heavy emphasis on the importance of the efficient use of police resources and manpower within individual police force areas. That is important, and I do not dissent from it in any way, but is it not even more vital to ensure that those resources are used to maximum effect on a national scale? There is clear evidence of maldeployment of resources in the fight against crime. Unless that is addressed decisively, the situation will get out of hand in the inner cities where crime rates are soaring and detection rates declining.

When I decided to propose this motion, I had a very strong suspicion that the metropolitan areas in general had significantly higher crime rates and commensurately fewer resources than the shire counties. I am appalled at the extent to which the surmise is borne out by the statistics and other research provided by our admirable Commons Library. I should like to thank in particular Robert Clements and Mary Baber in the home affairs department.

According to a working paper prepared by the Home Secretary entitled "Criminal Justice 1986",

"The number of offences recorded by the police in England and Wales has risen from half a million in the 1950s, a million by the mid-60s, 2 million in the mid-70s and over 3¼ million in 1985."

In other words, crime increased by 100 per cent. between 1955 and 1965, by a further 100 per cent. between 1965 and 1975 and by a further 75 per cent. in the last decade. This is a truly phenomenal rate of increase and is most alarming to our constituents throughout the land. It can only be a matter of great concern to us as legislators.

Generally, crime is not spread evenly throughout the nation—far from it. There is a stark distinction between the rural shire counties, where the incidence of crime is well below the national average, and the metropolitan areas, especially the inner cities, where the crime rate is well above the national average.

If one takes notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales in 1985 and makes a comparison between the metropolitan areas and shire counties, a disturbing picuture emerges. The crime rate in the metropolitan areas was 61 per cent. higher for theft and handling stolen goods, 67 per cent. higher for homicide and attempted murder and 96 per cent. higher for rape. At the same time, there were more than twice as many burglaries, two and a half times as many offences involving firearms and no fewer than seven and a half times as many robberies in the metropolitan areas than in the shire counties.

The "British Crime Survey" second report states:

"Across the country some 4 per cent. of homes were burgled or were targets of attempted burglary in 1983. But the risks varied markedly. . . . Almost two-thirds of households fall in 'low risk' areas with rates for burglaries and attempts ranging from 1 per cent. in agricultural areas—one quarter the average—to 3 per cent. in areas of modern family housing . . . Multi racial areas and the poorest council estates show risks which are roughly three times above the average. Multiple victimisation was especially frequent in these high risk areas, with homes being burgled twice or more over the year; the burglary rate is thus higher than the percentage of victims: including attempts, the figures was as high as 19 incidents per hundred homes in the poorest council estates."

That is terrifying.

Mr. Tony Favell (Stockport): My hon. Friend might be interested to know that I recently took up the issue with the chief superintendent for Stockport. My hon. Friend might know Adswood, the worst council estate in the area. I asked about the incidence of crime at Adswood and whether much of the crime was perpetrated by people living on the estate. He informed me that 90 per cent. of all crimes in the worst area of Stockport were perpetrated by neighbours. Is that not an appalling statistic?

Mr. Churchill: I agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that that situation is reflected in Trafford.

The report continues:

"Risks of burglary (and indeed other crime) were higher in the metropolitan areas, suggesting that there are particular features of large cities—deprivation being one—which heightens the risks of crime."

One does not need a degree in sociology to appreciate that.

I seek to illustrate the general proposition which I have advanced by reference to the police force in the Greater Manchester area. Excluding London, Greater Manchester recorded 10·5 per cent. of notifiable offences in 1986, but it has only 7·5 per cent. of the police manpower. If police force establishments were related to crime—there is a strong case for believing that they should be—9,805 officers would be needed in the Greater Manchester force. That is an increase of 41 per cent. over the present establishment of 6,943.

Greater Manchester police force is the largest provincial force in the country. In 1986 it recorded 321,458 notifiable offences. I am sad to relate that Greater Manchester has the highest crime rate in the country. It is double that of areas such as Lancashire, Cumbria and Dorset, and almost three times the rate in Suffolk, Surrey and Dyfed Powys in Wales.

The force is divided into three crime areas, each of which is equivalent to a large county force. The western crime area covers Trafford, Salford, Bolton, Wigan and Bury and it incurred more notifiable crime than in 37 of the 43 police authorities in England and Wales.

The central crime area which covers the city of Manchester and the eastern crime area covering Ashton, Stockport, Rochdale and Oldham each incurs more crime than 35 provincial forces. The Salford division alone records more notifiable offences than 11 whole police forces, including the whole of Surrey. A notable comparison is that Surrey's establishment is 1,639 officers compared with the Salford division which has only 666 officers, although they have to deal with more crime.

In the 12 years between 1975 and 1986, crime within the Greater Manchester area increased by more than 111 per cent. with violence increasing by 76·4 per cent., house burglary by 234 per cent., robbery by 272 per cent. and criminal damage by 500 per cent. That means that each and every officer in the Greater Manchester force had on average to investigate 22 crimes in 1975 and 47 crimes in 1986. While crime has increased by 111 per cent. during that 12-year period, the establishment of police has increased by only 4·75 per cent. In other words, crime in Greater Manchester over the past 12 years has been outstripping the growth in resources by a factor of 20.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): How does the hon. Gentleman respond to the view expressed by a number of senior police officers—Sir Kenneth Newman certainly being one that I agree with—that increasing the number of police officers has little effect on the crime rate because policing is responsive? Should he not be looking at something other than the number of police officers if he is serious about reducing the crime rate?

Mr. Churchill: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. I am not suggesting that increasing the police force is the sole requirement, but we have got to such a critical state that we are even having to stack 999 calls because there is not the manpower to respond immediately. This is a horrifying state of affairs. I trust that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department will sit up and pay attention to this serious state of affairs. The Home Secretary has a responsibility for assessing the manpower of the Metropolitan police force in London. Compared to the Metropolitan police in London, the Greater Manchester force has to cope with 65 per cent. more crimes per officer. Our force has to deal with 47 crimes per officer whereas the Metropolitan force has to deal with only 28·5 crimes per officer. How does the Home Secretary justify this disparity of 65 per cent. in the workload between the Metropolitan force in London and the Manchester force?

It is clear that protecting the Royal Family, Ministers, and the diplomatic community places a heavy burden on the Metropolitan police, as do their own international and national obligations. However, if there were to be the same ratio of police to crime in Manchester, we would need an increase of more than 4,000 officers in the GMP, bringing it up to 11,286.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): It is interesting to hear the hon. Gentleman compare the situation in Greater Manchester with that in Greater London. Would he welcome the abolition of the police authority in Greater Manchester and the transfer of its powers to the Home Secretary, which is the situation that we have to endure in London? In making the comparison between Greater Manchester and London in terms of the incidence of street attacks on members of racial minorities, I advise him that in London, even with the police manpower as he has so correctly described, Asians are 50 times more likely to suffer from racial harassment or street attacks than whites, and Afro-Caribbeans are 35 times more likely to suffer from racial harassment or street attacks than whites. Those are Home Office figures. Does the hon. Gentleman have any comment?

Mr. Churchill: Every Member of the House would deplore that state of affairs and the racial harassment that undoubtedly occurs in the inner-city areas. The overwhelming majority of the community are wholly opposed to that sort of behaviour. My constituents and I would warmly welcome the same sort of resources in Manchester that the Home Secretary provides for the Metropolitan police force in London, but, that said, we are content to regulate our own affairs in Manchester. However, we cannot do it without the resources.

To give an indication of the level of overstretch that confronts us at present, I would merely cite the case of the town of Oldham within the Greater Manchester police area. At any one time, there is a maximum of five beat officers available in Oldham to patrol 1,000 miles of pavement in 54 square miles of town with a population of 221,000, 87,100 houses, 157 schools, 11,500 businesses, 2,200 shops, 392 public houses, 12 parks, 12 youth centres and two football clubs. Is this a realistic level of policing? If he agrees with me that it is not, I hope that he will press within the Home Office for an urgent review.

Mr. James Anderton, our chief constable, does a superb job in the city of Manchester. In his most recent report for the year 1986, he referred to the chronic shortage of police manpower. He said that there is "a chronic shortage of manpower."

It is "severely aggravated by unprecedented levels of crime"; and it is

"galling for police to have to operate a highly selective policy of law enforcement and public protection . . . they struggle to respond to well over a million specific calls for police assistance, including nearly 300,000 reports of crime."

The situation is now so critical that 999 calls have to be stacked.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Are not those figures a typical Anderton-style pronouncement? The allocation of five officers to patrol 1,000 miles of pavement surely is the responsibility of the chief constable of that very large force. When the Minister replies, perhaps he can outline what investigations there have been into the optimum number of beat police per five pavement miles over a week? Surely that is the criterion that the hon. Member should go for.

Mr. Churchill: I have every sympathy for the predicament in which our chief constable and I believe other chief constables find themselves with overstretched resources. My constituents all say that they want to see more bobbies on the beat. That is understandable. I fully accept that view. Policemen on the beat are least able to make an urgent response to a 999 call. There has to be a balance. It is more important that there should be a ready force available to move in swiftly whenever there is a reported incident or crime. An officer on foot or on a bicycle in most cases is not able to respond to reports of crime in the same way, given the vast areas that we are talking about, although I fully accept that they have a certain deterrent value and that we would all like to see more of them. However, that is not the be-all and end-all of policing in the inner cities. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree.

The responsibility for this rests on three bodies: first, on Parliament for imposing new legislation without regard to the manpower implications that it has for police forces; secondly, on local government, which frequently in the inner-city areas is obstructive and even hostile to the police rather than supportive; and, thirdly, on the Home Office, on whose deaf ears our pleas for additional resources have fallen. The Government have given a high priority to policing. They have increased police resources by nearly 50 per cent. and police manpower by over 11,000. All credit to them for that. However, they should now devote more attention to the policing of the inner cities.

The chief constable referred in his report to the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. He said:

"The requirements of the legislation have necessitated a programme of extensive structural alterations to most designated police stations . . . The average length of time taken to process prisoners has increased significantly, and the corollary is that officers engaged with prisoners are spending less time on operational duties."

The chief superintendent in the Trafford division reports that the "Police and Criminal Evidence Act has resulted in a noticeable decrease in the overall number of persons arrested in the division. These figures were not wholly unexpected in view of the extra demand made upon police time and resources by this legislation."

Indeed, that was backed up by the excellent report of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary for 1986 which was published only two days ago.

There has been a significant erosion of police officer hours in the Greater Manchester area by the restriction of overtime. Between 1974-75 and 1986-87 the working week of detectives in the Greater Manchester police has dropped from 56 hours to 44 hours. That is a reduction of 21 per cent., or equivalent to losing 340 detectives. That is happening at a time when crime has more than doubled. In 1975, the Greater Manchester police had a detection rate of 50·5 per cent. Between 1975 and 1986 reported crime increased to over 300,000 and the overall detection rate fell by over 23 per cent.

Mr. Favell: My hon. Friend was talking about the time wasted by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. Would he care to comment on or consider the time wasted taking prisoners to and from court when they are being remanded in custody? Yesterday my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said that there had been an increase of 1,000 in the number of prisoners remanded in custody over the past 12 months. That puts additional strain not only on the prison establishment, but upon the police establishment, because prisoners have to be produced in court and they have to be taken backwards and forwards. That results in a loss of time for our constables. Is it not time that we introduced the Scottish system throughout the country and not just in the three pilot areas?

Mr. Churchill: I agree 100 per cent. with my hon. Friend. I feel that those duties would be handled more appropriately by civilians rather than police.

The effect of increasing the allocation of annual leave by three days some three or four years ago was to reduce the manpower available within Greater Manchester by the equivalent of 400 or 500 officers. Chief constables were not consulted about that decision. Because of the escalating crime rate, there have been more injuries to members of the police force. The chief constable said:

"The number of days lost through injury on duty has doubled since 1981, and in 1986 no fewer than 670 officers were physically assaulted . . . The total loss of effective duty time through sickness and injury suffered by police officers in 1986 was equivalent to a reduction of 548 officers in the strength of the force."

Manchester city council has been especially unhelpful to the police in their task. The far Left fanatics have been relentless in their hostility to the police, who they see as a class enemy and antagonistic to society. The agenda of the council's police monitoring committee for Monday of this week is illustrative. It deals with police weapons, which it opposes, the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, which it opposes, Chief Constable Anderton's report of which it is critical, and the incident at Manchester university involving the Home Secretary. The committee's attitude to all those matters has been insidious, objectionable, offensive, negative and down-right anti-police.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North) rose——

Mr. Churchill: The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity to make his own speech. I must get on.

The publication produced by Manchester city council police monitoring committee called "Police watch" is especially objectionable. It regularly attacks the police in their jobs and clearly there are certain people in high places in the city of Manchester—I venture there is the same in other inner city areas—who find it more fun to watch the police than the criminals. In the area that covers my constituency, the Trafford division, we watch criminals. We have blazed the trail for the country in terms of neighbourhood watch. We now have 2,000 schemes in the Trafford division alone. Of course, those on Manchester city council who involve themselves in these matters have resisted the spread of the neighbourhood watch schemes. They see them as spying on people. It is far from that. They said that they would never work in the inner-city areas with ethnic minorities, and so on. The ethnic minorities and people in the inner city areas welcome the schemes with open arms. They are the ones who have been terrorised by the wave of criminal violence and vandalism. The response has been enormous. In those areas of the Trafford division where the neighbourhood watch scheme has been working for one year or more there has been a 42 per cent. reduction in the number of house burglaries.

I should like to refer to the importance of building good relations between the police and the local community in inner-city areas. Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary deplores the action of those who seek to drive a wedge between the police and the community they are there to protect. I have little doubt that he had the city of Manchester in mind when he said:

"in some of the very inner city areas where the spirit of co-operation between responsible agencies is most needed, the police have met with attempts, some of them politically motivated, to undermine these efforts and drive a wedge between police and community. It is vital that this should not be allowed to happen."

I should like to make a brief reference to the wonderful work being done by the Greater Manchester police. I am indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Bury St. Edmunds (Sir E. Griffiths), who told me of the wonderful enthusiasm with which members of the Greater Manchester police supported fund-raising efforts to send British competitors to the world special Olympics for the disabled. Of all the police forces in the country, none did more than Manchester police. They carried torches, literally, throughout their force area and raised £6,000—more than one fifth of the total. It was a triumph for their dedication and caring attitude. Therefore, we in Manchester all the more resent the anti-police attitude and the hyper-critical attitude adopted by Manchester city council.

Faced with the relentless rise in crime and critical shortages of police and CID manpower to cover this inner-city and metropolitan area, the chief constable of Greater Manchester has only this month renewed his appeal to the Home Office for more resources. This is now a matter of the greatest urgency. We need about 40 per cent. more police officers. We do not care how it is achieved, but there has to be a drastic rethink of the way in which the balance is apportioned between the shire counties, which have a relatively low level of crime, and the inner-city areas, which are fighting a losing battle. Urban deprivation and the special problems identified in policing such areas must be recognised at national level and accurate targeting of resources made a primary objective.

10.9 am

Mr. Ted Garrett (Wallsend): I congratulate the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) on raising this issue. I am pleased that, for a Friday, there is a fair attendance in the House. It shows that it is right and proper that we should have time for a debate on the police. At the outset I should state that I have an interest, in that I have relatives who have served, or are serving, in various constabularies throughout the country. In my opinion, the police have been subject to unfair criticism, not only in London and Manchester, but in other areas of the United Kingdom, which has an insidious effect on morale.

I give two lectures per year for the Police Federation, and lecture for the Durham police, as part of a senior officers' training course. I am always impressed by the dedication of the men who participate in those courses and by the fact that they avoid cynicism. Because of the pressures that are put on the police it would be easy for them to develop a cynical and indifferent attitude or an "us and them" complex.

We still have a citizen police force in this country. It is not a paramilitary force, although sometimes I think that it is getting close to that. We are all responsible for that civilian police force, although the degree of responsibility may vary. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) about the control of the police in the city of London, the former Greater London council area, where the position is deplorable. If the present Home Secretary does not grasp that nettle, a future Home Secretary will.

I should like to spend some time discussing the crimes that are being committed. Yes, there is violence and sexual assault, but nobody has yet told me the number of police man hours that are spent investigating the scale of fraud that takes place. We have no idea about that. We are sometimes told the number of man hours that are used to investigate a major murder, but the number of man hours that are used on large-scale fraud investigations has never been revealed to the public. I hope that the Minister will consider that and conduct an investigation into, and issue a publication on, that aspect of crime, because it is one of the most insidious of crimes.

When I was a young lad, I remember that if someone was convicted of fraud, whether a local fraud that would be modest by today's standards, or a major fraud, that person's career would be over. Such a person would be separated from the rest of society. However, our society now looks with admiration on some of the fraudsters for their skill and daring. In the past few days a newspaper has praised the skill and initiative of the persons who broke into some safes and who, with their skill, gathered a large income of between £20 million and £30 million. Today, we look with admiration on such frauds and robberies. We must change our attitudes.

It is no accident that the United Kingdom is regarded as the dirtiest country in Europe. It is because we accept petty crime as inevitable. In the 1950s, the then hon. Member for Hexham, Sir Rupert Speir, introduced a private Member's Bill on the subject of litter. That happened 30 years ago, and we never hear of or see prosecutions for litter offences now. We must ask ourselves why so much litter is dropped and why there is so much graffiti and vandalism. It happens because of the attitudes that we ourselves adopt.

The class of society from which one comes is irrelevant. Attitudes in the home and parental attitudes are always a major factor in the increase in petty crime. We all turn our eyes from it. Every one of us has seen some petty crime in our time, but we never say to the young offender, "That is a damned silly thing to do," because we are afraid to do so. It takes courage to tell a person on the Underground, who has his feet on the seat opposite, to get his bloody feet off that seat. It takes courage, because one might be knifed or beaten up. Many youngsters these days feel that it is macho to knife somebody or to beat him up.

When such young offenders are arrested, to whom do the parents come about that "wrongful" arrest? They come to their Member of Parliament and say that he or she should take up the issue of their children being wrongfully arrested or wrongfully having to appear before the courts. That suggests that the parents themselves do not have the courage to tackle their children about the offences that they commit. Therefore, we must begin a period of re-education.

In the various ways that are open to us, we must adopt the approach of assisting, not antagonising, the police. Sometimes the police misbehave. I understand that my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) will seek to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to make a statement about the Holloway case. The mother of one of the police who was innocent and who was framed has approached me about that case because she is a Newcastle woman whose son serves in the Metropolitan police. All that I shall say about those crimes and that conviction is that the police officers involved did something terrible in indicting fellow officers who were completely innocent. When we think of the misery that was inflicted on those fellow officers, the anxieties of their wives and mothers and the suspensions that they have had to face, in my judgment that aspect of the crime has not been punished severely enough. However, my hon. Friend will deal with that at greater length.

I shall conclude by being parochial, and I apologise for that. The area of Tyne and Wear in Northumberland is served by the Northumberland police. Like the police force in Manchester, that force is first-class and is stretched beyond the limits. In our modern society, we created what was thought of as one of the first-class metropolitan transport systems in Europe. We put every crime detection device of which we could think into the Tyne and Wear rapid transport system. However, facts are facts — passengers are being threatened and assaulted and, in spite of the protective measures, damage is occurring. So, in our modern society, we must seek resources to employ police to look after a transport system of which the citizens should be proud. We, the taxpayers, not only in the House, but outside, are having to pay because young people are not accepting their responsibilities as young citizens or as future older citizens.

I ask the Minister to consider the Northumberland police's request for more resources to provide more police. If that wish is granted, I assure the Minister that those police officers will be doing a first-class and useful job. I am aware that when the request is granted police will not appear on the streets overnight. It takes almost three years to produce what one might call a competent policeman. Nevertheless, if there is the will to find the resources and to start a massive programme to re-educate the public about the costs of policing and the ways in which such costs could be saved, this debate will have served a useful purpose.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. A large number of hon. Members are seeking to participate in the debate. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) for setting an example in brevity.

10.19 am

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): As this is my maiden speech, I am pleased to pay tribute to my predecessor, Sir John Osborn. I am sure that that tribute will be echoed throughout the House. The stewardship of the constituency was in his hands for over 25 years and during that period he was one of the most respected and valued Members of the House. His work on behalf of his constituents was renowned, and as one of them I can vouch for his efforts. As a Sheffield city councillor, which I remain, I was aware of how Sir John was closely involved in the affairs of the city and of the county of South Yorkshire. Many tributes to his work and efforts have been expressed to me during my period here by Members of all parties.

I differ from my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), and the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), in that I contend that they are trying to treat the spots of measles to cure our problems. During my period as leader of the opposition on South Yorkshire county council from the county's creation to its abolition—I hasten to assure the House that that is a record of which I am not proud—I worked closely with the South Yorkshire police. During that period of 12 years many changes took place in the support of the council and the public for the police.

Policing inner-city areas is not an easy task. As we have already heard, no two cities are the same. The problems in policing have been created by some of the great ideas that we had years ago, such as pedestrianisation, high-rise flats and estate design. Indeed, some decks and even bus stations are not dedicated highways, so are out of bounds to police patrolling.

A further retrograde step took place during the miners' strike, when authorities supported the miners by deed and action. The South Yorkshire county council was partially responsible for police funding and had its members as members of the South Yorkshire police authority. Some of the county council's actions, while not exactly denying funding or support to the chief constable, made the cash harder to obtain. The council furthermore decided that the chief constable should be answerable to it. In the language now fashionable, the council "decided" that the police and the chief constable should be "answerable" to it, and in the language of councilspeak, the police were to be "accountable" or "under democratic control". Other councils now echo those words, and from the seeds that were sown police monitoring panels have sprung up. The sole aim of the council is to obtain democratic control of the police.

Sheffield city council, as one would expect, has a police panel, a monitoring group and a magazine. In issue No. 1 the then chair of the police panel replied to the question, "Will the new police panel affect policing in Sheffield" with:

"Certainly the aim is to improve police accountability in the city."

[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Opposition Members say, "Hear, hear" and that is the difference between us. They see the chief constable as answerable to them. I thought that it was courteous during a maiden speech to be left slightly alone. Hon. Gentlemen will have a chance to take me on any time any day.

That same chair of the police panel was one of the leading councillors who invited those commemorating Bloody Sunday to hold their march in Sheffield. The day the march was held violent skirmishes took place between the marchers and a rival outfit, and some of my constituents could not go about the centre of Sheffield because of the eruption. Naturally, the jam in the sandwich was the police, who stepped in to protect innocent bystanders. Thanks to the Public Order Act 1986, such violence on the streets and the protection of vulnerable people is now possible.

Policing inner-city areas is not solely the responsibility of the police; it is everyone's responsibility. I am old enough to remember when policing local areas, such as Hillsborough—the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) the Opposition spokesman on police authorities comes from the same area and Hillsborough is his favourite shrine—which were not described as inner-city areas then, was done by a local bobby, a minister of religion, the head teacher, parents or guardians and local residents. They all kept an eye on their area and woebetide the law breakers.

With the loosening of family ties, the decline of the spirit of the community, the relaxation of discipline, the distinction between right and wrong becoming blurred and with respect for oneself and others not being taught or applied, lawlessness has increased in today's British society. Discipline is no longer a priority and efforts to rekindle values are often ridiculed. It is against that background that the rebirth of pride in our community has started.

Much has been done to police inner-city areas. More police manpower is available, more civilian staff have released trained officers from administrative work, more money has been used to fund the police centrally, more police from ethnic minorities have been recruited, and more police now patrol on foot. Despite what my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme said, in South Yorkshire we have what is known as response cars, and response cars respond. More emphasis is being placed on prevention and the handling of disorders and there is more effort to involve the communities. All those Government measures form part of a policy firmly based on the concept of community policing to ensure that the police are more effective. Even more effort is proposed to ensure that what we require is what we get.

The Government are worried about the widespread use of offensive weapons and action will be taken on the sale and possession of items which have no legitimate use and can be used to injure and maim. Action will be taken on lenient sentences, as proposed in the Criminal Justice Bill, and more action is proposed on crime prevention.

Earlier, I referred to the design of housing estates. The design of estates in the 1960s and 1970s has much to answer for. One right hon. Gentleman was in charge of the housing of one major inner city at that time. Those estates have created some of the problems of inner-city areas, including policing problems. In a debate it is easy to blame each and every ill of inner-city areas on unemployment, but in the 1930s, when unemployment was proportionately higher and was virtually unrelieved by benefits, crime figures were lower.

Earlier, I also referred to political interference in policing. In yesterday's Yorkshire Post Stanley Barrett, Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary and a former chief constable in South Yorkshire, gave a warning in his annual report for 1986. One of the things that I was taught in South Yorkshire was always to get in first, otherwise someone else would. My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme mentioned some parts, but not all, of the report. Mr. Barrett stated:

"The comparatively low levels of disturbance were due to officers of all ranks seeking to build greater co-operation and good relations with the community . . . It is all the more sad to relate that, in some of the very inner city areas where the spirit of co-operation between responsible agencies is most needed, the police have met with attempts, some of them politically motivated, to undermine these efforts and drive a wedge between police and community. It is vital that this should not be allowed to happen."

That reinforces my point.

I do not accept my hon. Friend's argument that to throw money at the police, however well intentioned, or to increase manpower, is the way forward. We must ensure that the proper equipment is provided. The hon. Member for Wallsend spoke about graffiti and litter. They add to the dereliction of an area and must be tidied up. We must instil a sense of pride in those who use and visit our cities and in the people who live in them.

The regeneration of our inner-city areas, including those in Sheffield, is required for them again to thrive and to become the commercial centres that they once were. Co-operation by all in the community and from every possible avenue and agency is essential to bring back respect, pride and industry to our inner-city areas and so to assist with the policing of those areas.

10.29 am

Mrs. Rosie Barnes (Greenwich): First, I compliment the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) on his competent maiden speech. I agree with him that we must tackle not only the symptoms of crime but the causes.

This annual debate takes place against the background of a report from the Metropolitan police commissioner, which follows the pattern of many previous annual reports. It talks about rising levels of crime and falling levels of detection. We are constantly being told that rising crime is not the fault of the Government, who rightly say that crime levels have risen consistently for many years. However, that is a far cry from what they said in 1979 when they promised the country law and order and claimed that their policies would stop rising crime as other policies could not. They should now have some humility, because they have failed in that task.

It is worrying that not only is the crime rate rising persistently but the fear of crime is increasing almost disproportionately. Many old people and younger women are beginning to feel that they cannot lead normal lives. They are afraid to go out after dark, and in some of the worst areas they are even afraid to go out during the day. Mothers are afraid to let their children go out to the local park to play for a few hours even on fine sunny days. We must consider not just crime and detection but the effect that fear of crime has on people's lives.

In recent weeks there has been much debate about whether officers on the beat are effective in detecting and reducing crime. I am open to persuasion on that. However, the officer on the beat is invaluable in alleviating the fear of crime. Old people feel safe to walk down the street when they see that familiar presence and women feel confident in allowing their children to go to the park, knowing that the policeman on the beat will be in the vicinity and will look in periodically. We must tackle not just crime and detection but the fear of crime, which is almost paralysing people's lives in some parts of the inner cities.

I take issue with the comments made earlier about the causes of crime. Opposition Members relate increased crime to unemployment, poverty and social deprivation. Our young people are without jobs, sometimes for a year or more, and it cannot be said to often that the devil makes work for idle hands. Conservative Members say that in the depression in the 1930s crime was not rampant although poverty was rife.

That is not a direct comparison.

In the 1930s everyone was hard hit by the depression. Even those in jobs fell on hard times. There was not the huge divide that there is now between the haves and the have-nots. Television screens were not advertising glossy cars or aftershave by showing young people at discotheques buying fancy drinks and having a whale of a time. That is rubbing it in for those young unemployed people who cannot afford to go out and live that sort of life. Times have changed since the 1930s and the distinction between the haves and the have-nots is very marked—nowhere more so than in our inner cities. In my constituency of Greenwich I have poor areas right next to affluent areas and the youngsters in one part of the constituency see the lives of those in the others. A father who has been out of work and cannot afford basic necessities for his children easily resorts to petty crime; he pinches from areas where he thinks that very little will be missed. We should be clear that we are talking about a great increase in petty theft from homes and cars. I do not condone it. I would simply say that the parallel that the Government draw with the 1930s does not hold good and that we must consider the underlying causes of crime as well as crime itself.

I view with no sympathy local authorities which have undermined the authority of the police or the respect in which the police are held. I have worked closely with the police in Greenwich and I have found them to be dedicated, professional and caring. But I have felt that their position has been undermined by constant onslaughts on their integrity and their motives. Some local authorities have police support groups and police monitoring groups and Labour councillors in Greenwich did all that they could to inhibit the development of neighbourhood watch schemes. Such activities have created a barrier between the local authorities and the police and their effects have reverberated throughout the community. Some people do not know whether they should trust the police or not.

The majority of people in Greenwich and throughout the country want a responsible, competent and professional police force. They want to see more policemen on the beat and to know that law and order is being upheld. However, this is not a one-sided issue. The alliance has always stood firmly by the need for an independent police complaints procedure. It is very important that complaints are investigated fairly and are seen to be investigated fairly. I agree with Sir Kenneth Newman that an independent police complaints procedure

"has clear attractions in terms of obvious even-handedness and saving of the police force's own valuable resources."

We should urgently and seriously consider such a procedure.

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): Is not the hon. Lady aware that we have an independent police complaints authority? Has not she read its report? Does she not appreciate people's increasing confidence in its activities? Is she suggesting that that authority is not succeeding in its task?

Mrs. Barnes: I made no such allegation. I merely said that the investigation of complaints against the police should be completely independent of the police. It is unacceptable for one police force to investigate the activities of a neighbouring police force. The investigations need to be independent of the police.

Opposition Members attach great importance to community policing. I have already talked about the need for more policemen on the beat. Increased community policing will restore confidence in the police and improve relationships between the police and the local community. In that respect, housing for the police is critical — especially in London, but in other inner city areas, too. Increasingly, the police who serve Greenwich live miles away in the suburbs and in a different environment and come in each day to police the area. We need provision for adequate housing for the police in the community that they serve. It would break down the barriers between the police and the local community. Hon. Members on both sides of the House have talked about how policing used to be—when local dignitaries were involved in and kept an eye on the police. There was very much a community attitude on how the police should function, and those policemen were of the community and of the people. They did not come in from elsewhere.

This is linked to the inner-city regeneration programme which we hope that the Government will introduce. If the inner cities are made the desirable places to live that they should and could be, policemen will not feel the need to live elsewhere and to education their children outside the local education authority concerned. If we tackle the inner-city problem, policemen will be happy to live in the communities in which they work.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): The hon. Lady seems to ignore the fact that the Metropolitan police have always been unable to recruit all their men from the neighbourhoods. That is why some have had to come in from outside. If they could have recruited them locally, perhaps they would have done so.

Mrs. Barnes: There is some merit in the hon. Gentleman's point. I have spoken at length to the local police authority on the matter, and I understand that one problem is not just attracting the police in the first place but keeping them in the inner cities as their careers progress. As they get older and their families grow up, there is a great temptation to move to police authorities where the problems are not so severe, life is at a more comfortable pace and housing is cheaper.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington) rose——

Mrs. Barnes: I will have to carry on, or I will never get to the end of my speech.

The alliance has suggested some specific provisions to alleviate some of the problems, and I draw them to the attention of the Home Secretary. Our manifesto discussed what we called crime crisis areas, which should be defined by the police community liaison committees and the police authorities working with chief constables. Any chief constable could pinpoint the crisis areas with which he must deal. Several measures could be enacted to improve matters in those areas. Local police stations which have been closed should be reopened, or police posts could be made available where one or two policemen would always be stationed. As with many other aspects of life, police stations have become more centralised and the smaller local stations have closed. That is a mistake. People do not know where their police stations are. Stations are sometimes a long way from people's homes and people think that they can go there only to report a serious matter. They cannot pop in to discuss problems which could be nipped in the bud.

Many practical and fairly simple measures, including the provision of entryphones and security locks and better street lighting, could make life much easier for those who live in crime areas. Every local authority should be obliged to set up a crime prevention unit to advise people on the security of their homes and their general safety. Many Labour authorities could fund these by diverting money from their anti-police monitoring units. Money is available to fund police monitoring. Authorities should put that money into prevention, where it will have a positive purpose.

Another suggestion was to place a legal responsibility on British Telecom to maintain telephones in better working order than they are now. I hope that work is being done in this area. In areas of severe crime, where people are poor and do not have their own telephones, it is extremely important that they can get to a telephone when they need it and not, as happens now, go to the nearest four telephones and find them all out of order.

Hon. Members have also mentioned violent crime. In south-east London there has been a growing use of weapons, many of which are sold in martial arts shops. I have a list of them here, and I have never heard of some of these weapons. They include battle knives, knuckledusters, spike shoe straps and catapults. They are widely available. They have macho connotations and youngsters can pick up these weapons very easily. The temptation to use them then presents itself. Recently in south-east London there were two incidents of armed robbers being killed. They were examples of the serious intent to go out as armed robbers, but at the lower level those weapons are widely available. We must try to curb the use and sale of such weapons.

In one area, there is a direct correlation between unemployment and crime. It has been shown clearly that dependence on drugs or alcohol is far more prevalent among the unemployed, and the link between drug dependencey or alcoholism and crime is undisputed. We must consider the underlying causes and then the subsequent events. We are in a catch 22 situation: unless we tackle the underlying causes, our attempts to tackle the symptoms will be irrelevant.

I welcome the Government's commitment to inner-city regeneration and I hope that there will be serious changes. But their promises will be hollw without resources behind them. Anyone who spends any time examining the inner cities will know that good will, good intentions and the right words will not do. Housing is appalling and there has been a great deterioration in the fabric of the streets, lighting and pavements. Money must be spent on them. There is no sign as yet that the Government will back their claims on inner-city regeneration with the appropriate funds. Inner-city talk without inner-city money will mean nothing.

Conservative Members would be extremely disappointed if an alliance Member did not mention proportional representation. We are here only because the Home Secretary fulfils the role of police authority for the metropolis. There would be no need for anxiety about handing control of the policing of the metropolis to a properly elected police authority if it was elected by proportional representation, because any fear of extremism would be elminated.

10.48 am

Mr. William Shelton (Streatham): It is with great pleasure that I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick). He is a worthy successor to our old friend Sir John Osborn. I was deeply impressed by the way in which he rebuked Opposition Members for their mumbling and grumbling while he made a speech which was slightly less than maiden in some aspects. He defended himself well by putting the knife into Opposition Members — although in the most delicate way—which bodes well for his future in the House.

I wish to raise two serious constituency problems. I am sure that the Minister will pay attention and that the Home Office will reach a solution for me. For once, these problems have nothing to do with additional resources. They relate to two flaws in the law that are stopping the police carrying out their duty. I should like the law to be changed to remove those flaws.

The first problem is that one of my wards in Streatham is infested with prostitutes. During the election my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary visited Streatham. I was fortunate enough to be able to introduce him to one of the policemen on the beat, who expounded strongly about the problem, and my right hon. Friend said that he would consider it. Indeed, I have written to him about it. I hope that my right hon. Friend will read the today's Hansard. So far this has been an interesting debate and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) on introducing it.

One of the wards of my constituency is infested with prostitutes, and this is extremely disagreeable to the residents. There are many ladies on the streets and some 400 cars were clocked through in a two-hour period—400 cars cruising round and round.

The second problem in my constituency — it has already been mentioned—is the carrying of knives. This practice is becoming a spreading cancer in south London and the Government must act to do something about it. Today, about 35 per cent. of all robberies—the House is aware that a robbery is defined by the police as an attack in the street, a mugging—are carried out by youngsters carrying knives. Some 25 per cent. of such attacks in Streatham are carried out by youngsters. Knives also play a part in rape.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): Is my hon. Friend aware of the growing number of flick-knives that are being imported into the country? Day-trippers or those who are on holiday in France smuggle back such knives and give them to their friends. That poses a serious problem.

Mr. Shelton: My hon. Friend is quite right, and I shall return to that in a moment.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) mentioned knives that are bought in martial arts shops. Perhaps the sale of such knives from those shops should be outlawed, but it is a marginal problem. The other day I was talking to one of the police chief superintendents in my area. He asked me whether I would like to see the knives that the police had taken from people, mainly youngsters, in the past three months. He brought over a huge plastic sack, turned it out on the floor and 30 knives fell out. Only three of those knives were of the type that can be bought in martial arts shops. All the rest, most horrible looking, were kitchen knives. Admittedly some of those knives had been sharpened. Anyone can buy a steak knife, and it would put the fear of God in me and make me run like a madman if I saw it coming at me. If we ban the sale of martial arts knives—probably we should—the youngster will go to the kitchen, open the drawer, take out the steak knife and go off.

Fines imposed on women who ply their trade are in no way a deterrent. The average fine in Streatham is about £30-£35 per arrest and conviction. When a lady makes some £200-£300 a night, she is quite prepared to be arrested every so often and pay £30. That fine is absolutely no use.

Let us consider the measures introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Drake (Miss Fookes), what is now the Sexual Offences Act 1985, which is known as the kerb crawlers' Act. I hate to say this—I discussed the measure with my hon. Friend the Member for Drake last night—but the Act is ineffective. It does not work, because to get the Bill into law my hon. Friend had to allow the word "persistently" to be included. That word "persistently" means, according to the police officers of my constituency, that they cannot secure a conviction because they cannot show that the punter was persistently soliciting. If a kerb-crawler drives round and round, stops to pick up a girl and is then stopped by the police he can say, "I was not persistently soliciting. I just asked this girl to go for a ride with me." We must remove the word "persistently" from the Act. The Minister and the Home Office should consider whether what is occurring in Streatham is happening in other places. If that proves to be the case, when the next Criminal Justice Bill comes along—they seem to come along regularly every year—will the Minister please insert a one or two-line clause to remove the word "persistently" from the Sexual Offences Act and thus make it effective?

Section 1(1)(b) of the 1985 Act states that a man commits an offence if he causes "nuisance to other persons in the neighbourhood."

In Streatham we managed to obtain three convictions by getting about 30 residents to note down car registration numbers. The residents gave affidavits to the police, the motorists were stopped and they were convicted. It was a massive piece of work undertaken by the community. Convictions would be easier to secure if the word "persistently" was removed from the Act. For the sake of my constituents, who are living in the most unpleasant circumstances, I urge that something be done about this problem.

Incidentally, the local police in Streatham are taking legal advice as to whether they can write to people whose car registration numbers have been taken and ask why they were circulating round and round. Perhaps the Minister could look into that. I shall write to the Home Secretary to ask whether it is legal for the police to do that. I am sure that there must be some form of words that the police could use, and, with a bit of luck, the letter would be opened by the man's wife.

The second problem faced by my constituency is a cancer that is spreading across south London. It affects not only Brixton, but Streatham, Clapham and other parts of south London. The problem results from another failure in the law, and unless something is done this cancer will spread.

When the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984—PACE as it is known—was introduced, section 25, quite rightly—I am not arguing about this—put an end to the stop and search law, what is called the sus law. The police were no longer able to stop and search on suspicion. They had to have reasonable grounds for that suspicion. However, the result of PACE has meant far fewer people being stopped and searched. The police officer can no longer stop a person because he is suspicious of that person's actions. He must have factual evidence to show to the magistrate.

If youngsters carry knives, the police now have to show that a person carried a knife with unlawful intent. It is very difficult for the police to do that. These youngsters are street wise. If they are stopped and found to be in possession of a large knife and are asked why they have it, the usual answer is, "I have to fix a light plug and I need the knife to cut off the end of the flex." Youngsters have been told that they can get away with that answer. It is too much to expect the police to take a person to court and show the unlawful intention of a suspect. How can a policeman do that?

The other day the Streatham police got a man for burglary. That man had on him 52 lock knives. My hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) mentioned flick-knives. With a flick-knife, the blade comes out when one presses a button; with a lock knife the knife is locked open. That man had 52 such knives in his possession. The police were unable to prosecute him for having those 52 knives. However, they did get him for the burglary.

The police took the 52 knives away, although they believed that they were probably acting improperly in doing so. I asked why that man had 52 knives in his possession. I was told that such knives are sold or lent to youngsters. Youngsters do a job, throw the knife away and go back to that guy, with his sack of 52, for another one. Something must be done about this. What can we do?

We cannot bring back the sus law. We must return to the position that we had under the Magistrates' Courts Act 1952, which obtains today in cases in which people have been convicted on drugs charges. Their money is taken away from them, unless they can show that they possess it lawfully. In the case of carrying knives, the person who is arrested and taken before a magistrate must be able to show that he was carrying the knife with lawful intent. It should not be for the police to prove that the person is carrying the knife with unlawful intent; the police cannot do that. If a guy has 52 lock knives on him, or an 8in steak knife on him, at 2 o'clock in the morning, he will have to show the magistrate why he had those knives. If he cannot do so, he should be convicted. It should not be for the police to show that he was carring the knife with unlawful intent. There is no way in which the police can do that. They are not mindreaders or hypnotists. We should reverse the burden of proof in cases involving knives.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Why does my hon. Friend think that there will be more convictions, either before magistrates or juries, merely because the burden of proof is shifted?

Mr. Shelton: I recognise that my hon. and learned Friend knows far more about the law than I do. My answer is that a guy may have 52 lock knives on him, but the police cannot prove unlawful intent, because he says that he bought them the other day to take to his shop to sell, and the police cannot even prosecute him. On the other hand, if he had to show why it was perfectly right and proper for him to be doing that at 2 o'clock in the morning—in other words, that he had lawful possession and no evil intent—he would find that rather difficult to do before a magistrate. For example, an 18-year-old is stopped with a steak knife sticking out of his trouser pocket at 2 o'clock in the morning. He says that he is going to repair a flex, and at the time the police must accept that. However, if the burden were the other way round and he told the magistrate that he was going to repair a flex, the magistrate would say that he did not believe him and would find him guilty. Something must be done, and if my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) has a better suggestion I should like to hear it. What I am suggesting would at least be a big step forward.

I see that my hon. Friend the Minister is taking advice from his Department on the points that I have been making. I ask him to examine the problem of prostitution and the use of the word "persistently" in the Sexual Offences Act 1985. I also ask him to look at the whole problem of knives, with a view to changing the law to lay the burden on the knife carrier. If the law is changed for knives—and here I am stretching things a bit—it might also apply to kerb crawlers. I see no reason why, if a man drives 30 times around a certain street at ten o'clock at night, he should not have to show why he was doing that, rather than police having to show that he was intending to solicit and causing a nuisance to neighbours. That might work in that case, too. The balance is wrong, and I want the Home Office to put it right.

11.5 am

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): As a newcomer, may I add a word of congratulation to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), who threatens to take on allcomers. He is at all times very bullish, very Ollie North. We look forward to his future speeches in the House with great anticipation.

As a newcomer to the House like me, the hon. Gentleman, will have been shown on the day that he arrived the pieces of red tape that hang beneath our coat hangers. When I asked what they were for, I was told that they were for our swords—for the weapons of men who, in generations gone by, found it necessary to hang up their weapons before they came in for fear that they might be tempted to use them in this place. We have now reached such a state in many of our inner cities that we will soon have to provide similar pieces of equipment in all places of public resort for young people, so much has this whole knife culture infiltrated our society. So many young people now carry knives as a matter of course. We must consider that seriously in the course of the debate. We must consider knives, the issue of drugs and the prevalence of a drug culture. We must also consider the prevalence of racial harassment. Those three things are a blot on the enforcement and maintenance of safety and security in our inner cities. We in this House and those in the wider community need to come up with some answers.

I cannot see any answer to those problems that does not involve a co-ordinated and — so far as is possible — unified approach by central Government—the legislative process—local government and the communities that they represent, and the police. Only in that way will we begin to be able to tackle the three significant problems that face us in inner city policing. If we tackle one of them but not the others, we are doomed to failure. Merely to call for more law will not in itself be enough. We need more than that.

The Government must take a lead. In recent years there has been welcome legislation enabling us to trace and recoup the ill-gotten gains of the drug barons. It was welcome and important legislation. However, there is and must be a role for central Government in attacking and seeking to come to grips with the culture and the set of social and economic circumstances that underpin the use of drugs and perpetuate the drug problem in all too many of our inner cities.

We need to examine the work that has been done in the United States and in mainland Europe—in Holland in particular—with addicts and with those who are likely to fall prey to drug abuse. We must begin that process in the schools. We must begin to educate people about the dangers and evils of drug abuse. That cannot be done merely by making speeches. It needs careful attention, and, above all, it needs resources, just as we need resources for the communities in sink housing estates and dead end roads, where all too often drug abuse takes place.

We need the resources to tackle such issues and the Government have a role to play in them. They also have a role to play in the problem of racial harassment. We in this House must make it crystal clear—I welcome the response of hon. Members in an earlier intervention on that issue—that racial harassment will not be tolerated. We must recognise that when we use language such as "swamping" and "alien wedge" we give a licence to those who try to perpetuate racial harassment in our communities. We have a special responsibility to guard what we say in these areas and to promote positive images of our multi-cultural society.

Mr. Dicks: Does not the hon. Gentleman agree that some of the ethnic minorities in our inner cities are white people who suffer racial harassment from coloured and black people?

Mr. Boeteng: Sadly, that is a typical intervention by the hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks). He should examine the Home Office statistics about street attacks. They clearly show that Asians in his constituency stand 50 times more chance than whites of being the subject of a street attack, and that black people stand 36 times more chance of being attacked on the street than whites. I condemn racial attacks from wherever they come and the hon. Gentleman ought not to seek to make such a point.

We should look at the responsibility of Government for coping with the problem of knives. The hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) touched on that. I have a certain amount of scepticism about his proposals for legislative change, but I recognise the spirit in which they were made. Clearly something has to be done, but what? I recognise the drafting problems in this area, but I hope that the Government will give urgent attention to dealing with the problem of the supply of knives at source. We must extend the definition of weapons that are regarded as offensive per se.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) said that there was a problem about martial arts supply shops. She is right about that and that problem must be addressed. It is capable of being dealt with by legislation and it must be dealt with urgently.

Those are three areas in which the Government need to act. The other two sides of the triangle are the local authorities and the communities they represesnt, and the police. No one who cares about crime prevention believes that it is healthy or useful for the police, the local authorities and the people that they represent to be apart. We want to see them working effectively in a co-ordinated way. However, we must recognise the blocks and the obstructions that exist.

One of the great difficulties under which we labour in London is not shared by the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who rightly wants to keep hold of his directly elected police authority. We in London want to have a police authority to hold on to. We recognise that such a directly elected police authority will provide a forum through which it will be possible to create effective crime prevention measures.

I watched the face of the hon. Member for Davyhulme and noted his body language during the course of the speech by his hon. Friend the Member for Hallam. The hon. Member for Hallam spoke at great length about the evils of Left-wing councils whose aim is to take over the police. He spoke about the sinister conspiracy that is supposed to exist to undermine policing and the terrible dangers of political policing. The hon. Member for Davyhulme was remarkably quiet during that speech. Was that because he recollected the example set by his right hon. and gallant grandfather? I wonder if he remembered his grandfather's role as Home Secretary. The people in the Welsh valleys have not forgotten it. What he said and did there could hardly by regarded as apolitical.

To pretend that the Home Secretary, in his role as the police authority, is not political, is nonsense. Perhaps the hon. Member for Davyhulme was remembering his right hon. and gallant grandfather's role in the siege of Sidney street. The hon. Gentleman should think about that. When one reflects on that incident in 1911 and looks at Hansard for that period, one sees that the Home Secretary was in the thick of it. He was not at the siege only for the purposes of a photo call. He was there to be part of the action and was involved in the operation. As Mr. Lyttelton said at the time, he was there giving

"some advice with regard to the firing".—[Official Report, 26 June 1911; Vol. 27, c. 248.]

That is the sort of advice that we should like to give in Greater London. We are anxious to see the police doing a little less firing and would like to see fewer incidents involving the likes of Mrs. Cherry Groce. We do not want day-to-day operational control or to tell the police who to shoot or when to shoot, but we would like to have an overview of policy. That is right, and therein lies the difficulty. That is not political interference.

Mr. Tredinnick: If the hon. Gentleman is so anxious to have some influence on the police in London, why has he taken a stance absolutely against the police consultative groups set up under the Scarman arrangements and the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984?

Mr. Boateng: The reverse is true. We want to see effective community participation in policing strategy, but we do not see those consultative groups offering any real hope, of achieving that. Were they to do so, we would embrace them with open arms. They are mere talking shops that do not enable the police and the community to come together in terms of equality. That is another way, and we intend to pursue it because we are anxious to see more effective police operations.

Mr. Stuart Holland (Vauxhall): Does my hon. Friend agree that the hon. Members for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) and for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) overlook the fact that at local borough level there is effective co-operation with the police? In the London borough of Lambeth there has been such co-operation about drug raids, an anti-knives campaign and child abuse. There has also been co-operation in the case about which the hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) spoke of kerb-crawling in Becmead avenue. The leader of Lambeth council has been down to see what is happening there and to support the action taken by the police.

Mr. Boateng: Similar examples could be given about Brent and about boroughs all over London where good positive work is being dome. It is important that we recognise that. We must not get away from the responsibilities of communities in terms of policing. We can and must improve the law in relation to knives and the Government must take initiatives about drug abuse and racial harassment. Communities must identify these things as problems and isolate those who seek to peddle drugs and those who seek to make large sums of money out of the misery that drugs cause. They must deter those who seek to carry knives as a matter of course and who encourage other young people to carry them.

We must do to those who seek to perpetrate racial harassment what must be done. We must say to all such groups, "This is not on in our community." We must tell them that we do not intend to stand by and make excuses for them or to allow them to get away with it. Such people must be told that there is no place for them in our community. If there is not a willingness to isolate these forms of virulent anti-social behaviour, whatever laws are passed and whatever powers are given to the police we will not solve the problems.

One lesson that we have learnt over the past eight or nine years is that simply throwing power at the police does not work. That can be seen from the figures. We have to do more than that, but if we are to get the community behind us and to recognise the importance of supporting operations designed to deal with these problems, the operations themselves must be devised with community support. They must recognise the need for a degree of sensitivity. I am afraid that that is not always shown in the course of devising and implementing such operations. One has only to look at operation Trident in west London. That involves surrounding All Saints road, and it has been going on for several weeks. It has had the effect of alienating portions of the community across the board that cannot be defined by colour or age because of the way that it has been carried out, the numbers who are involved and the strategy that has been adopted. It has led to a situation in which the overwhelming weight and oppressiveness of the police presence has cause resentment and ill feeling at a time when it should be possible to mobilise support and feeling against those drug pushers who have come from outside the community to peddle their wares in All Saints road.

We should be encouraging the responsible elements in the community that exist in the Mango community association so that they feel that they are equal partners in the fight against that insidious form of crime and the development of that street. The street should not be flooded every night with droves of police officers. They have got it wrong, but it need not have been so if they had involved themselves in genuine consultation and had there been a structure in London whereby it would be possible actively to support and garner public support for police operations. That is what an elected police authority should provide.

Even at this late stage we look to the Government to do something about that. If they are not prepared to do it, they should at least follow the advice and recommendations of their Home Office working parties. In 1983 I had the privilege and pleasure of sitting in the Home Office with a wide cross-section of people who were concerned about training. We were a working party of the Home secretary's council on police training. It included the man who is to become Lord Knight, who made a particularly distinguished contribution. He has recently been elevated to the other place, and I am sure that, with his experience of the west midlands, he will make a contribution there.

The working committee made a number of recommendations about police training. What has happened to those recommendations? I fear that they are gathering dust on the shelves of the Home Office. At every stage in a police officer's career, up to the level of superintendant, there should be training in community and race relations. The success or otherwise of an officer in responding to that training should be regarded as an example of his effectiveness. That would involve resources, but it was a good idea. We had a united committee; we did not disagree on any of our conclusions. We want action because, if the Government are not prepared to give way on constitutional issues, they can give way on practical policies on which there is unanimity. By working together within the constitutional framework and with a recognition of our respective roles, there is hope of tackling some of the policing problems in our inner cities. We need to do that, and we need to do it now.

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): I was selected for my constituency on the Ides of March, a fateful day, this year. My relationship with my constituency has been a whirlwind romance. I find myself in this place with an increased Conservative vote, which is in no small measure a tribute to my predecessor, Mark Carlisle, who served his area for some 23 years. I am sure that he will be remembered with respect and affection by hon. Members.

My constituency runs in a broad sweep around from the tiny independent parish of Cuerdley through the new town of Runcorn, which is afflicted with all the inner-city problems that we see around our country, including those of crime, to the semi-rural charms of Appleton and Lymm.

The history of Warrington, South and Warrington has been carved largely by water. It was originally founded by the Romans, because it was the first place that they found to ford the River Mersey. The Manchester ship canal, which is a tremendous tribute to the early entrepreneural spirit of our country, bisects my constituency and Warrington itself.

I did not emphasise water to demonstrate that the present Member suffers from rising damp, nor to demonstrate that my constituents are watery; indeed, they are fired with dynamism at the moment. GM Health Care is constructing a hospital in my constituency. Recently, it wrote to me saying:

"We are developing in Warrington-Runcorn because it is experiencing the most dynamic and commercial growth in the north of England."

That is not puff, but commercial hard-headedness, backed by the welcome figures for unemployment that we announced yesterday.

On 11 June this country had an opportunity to vote on the economic benefits that have been brought by Thatcherism and on the economic policies of the Government. The verdict was plain, but, as the economic benefits become more visiable and apparent, the deeper social problems that are inherent in our country become more evident. These deeper social problems essentially concern the responsibility that we owe to one another as citizens. It falls to this Conservative Government to resolve some of those deeper social problems with the kind of energy, commitment and resolution that the country has come to expect of them.

One of the most prominent examples of those problems is the growth in crime. It was referred to last Friday in a speech at Oxford by my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) as:

"One of the greatest shortcomings of public policy."

As I canvassed at the general election, the verdict on the Government of many of my constituents was that they could do better. As I was canvassing and wearing out shoe leather, two things struck me forcefully. There were an enormous number of dogs in the constituency, with all the attendant risks that that has for one's fingers and footwear. I noticed that in all the areas of my constituency from the inner city to the leafy suburbs, there were those little home watch scheme triangles in the windows. As I was trying to preach a message to my constituents, I realised that in fact they were giving me a message. The message was that they felt besieged in their homes by crime. To a certain extent they felt let down by their Government, and they had begun to deal with the problem by using their own resources.

I have not just crawled out from underneath a gooseberry bush, and I am not so naive as to think that the answer to the problem lies solely in more effective policing or in increasing the power of our criminal justice system, but that is part of the answer. More can and must be done to relieve the police of petty bureaucracy. I am in favour of more emphasis being placed on the civilianisation of our police forces and on the tape recording of evidence. More must and can be done for the police to enable them to concentrate on serious crime, rather than on petty offenders such as the motorist. I sympathise with the ordinary, law-abiding motorist who is tootling along on a clear road at 35 mph, but who finds himself pounced on, fined and frightened by the police. Yet the very next week, when he is mugged in an inner-city street, he cannot find a policeman for love nor money.

More can and must be done to restore the awful majesty of our criminal justice system, which depends essentially upon its deterrent power. That is why I personally support the reintroduction of the ultimate deterrent. It is also why I support the call so common among my constituents for sentences to mean what they say more than they do at present.

Having had the honour of serving on the local review committee of both Holloway and Pentonville prisons for some years, I have reached the mature view that both remission and parole are too freely given. Remission, which takes up to one third off the sentence, is too automatic. A prisoner has to do something pretty dreadful in prison to lose more than a few days of that remission. Parole can and often does provide up to a further one third off the sentence. It is supposed to be a privilege earned by good behaviour in prison, but sadly that is not the case, due to one very powerful argument that is used on local review committees. It is argued that it is far better for the criminal, having served part of his sentence, to go out into the community under supervision for a few months than to go out at the end of the sentence, less remission, without any supervision at all. That is a powerful argument, but it seems crazy that the Parole Board or the judges have no power, because I do believe in the principle of parole, to insist on some period of supervision during the period of remission or even afterwards.

In my view, it is sad that parole is not given on merit, but is given too automatically. The situation finds its greatest absurdity in what are known as the schedule 33 cases, in which members of the local review committee are given skimpy, inadequate notes and cannot possibly form a rounded view about the inmate concerned. As there is always a presumption in favour of parole in these cases, the committee ends up operating virtually as a rubber stamp.

Schedule 33 was devised as a means of emptying our prisons, and it certainly does so. But I strongly object to the application of that kind of attitude to the vast bulk of parole applications. Sadly, we are allowing the size of our prison population to dictate our criminal justice and penal policies. It is a case of the tail wagging the dog, and it should not be so. I had hoped and prayed that we would escape from that problem when we embarked on the greatest prison building programme this century, involving 20 new prisons, and it was with dismay that I heard my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announce yesterday his intention to free a further 3,500 or more prisoners by relaxing the remission provisions still further. I believe that that will dilute the deterrence of our criminal justice system. I ask my right hon. Friend to think again and to use his ingenuity to commission secure accommodation. I welcome the involvement of the private sector in the design and building of prisons, but more could be done. If the private sector were involved in the running of prisons, many of the staffing problems could be overcome.

I warmly welcome the Government's commitment to review the parole system. By a happy coincidence, the chairman of the review body will be my predecessor, the Right Hon. Mark Carlisle. I hope that that review will re-emphasise the proper purposes of parole and recommend against misuse of the parole provisions to make life easy for the prison service. We must return to the original intention that parole should be earned by good behaviour in prison and a good response to the penal regime.

I urge the Government to listen to the man in the street —not the hoary old prejudices of Tonypandy or Sidney street that we heard from the hon. Member for Brent,

[Mr. Chris Butler]

South (Mr. Boateng)—because the ordinary man in the street is imbued with hearty good sense. If our criminal justice system is weakened by failure to present an effective deterrent, the criminal will expand his activities and the respect that we have in this place and respect for our pillars of justice will be undermined, as will the good will of the ordinary citizen on which the power and authority of this place ultimately depend.

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I have already apologised to the Minister for having to leave before the end of the debate. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and the House will accept my apology with similar understanding.

My next, rather more pleasant, task is to congratulate, on behalf of the Opposition, the hon. Members for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) and for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick). Both spoke with a clarity, certainty and confidence which more established Members will envy. It is not a cliché, perhaps too often repeated, when I say that I have no doubt that the House will look forward to hearing from them many times in the future, not least because both avoided the awful respectable convention of being uncontroversial in their maiden speeches. That came as no surprise to me from the hon. Member for Hallam, whom I have known in one way or another for more than 30 years. I believe that for two or three weeks—no more —we were both members of Sheffield city council. A further tenuous connection is that 40 or 45 years ago I used to be taken on days out to the house and gardens that he occupied before moving on perhaps to even more splendid premises.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to say something about the inner cities, although it has deprived me of the possibility of visiting the inner city that I represent as early as I had intended. If the Prime Minister and the Queen's Speech are to be believed, the topic is likely to dominate this Parliament. Today, we are asked specifically to consider the policing of the inner cities and by implication crime in the inner cities, but I must insist that that one aspect of inner-city life cannot be considered in isolation.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who initiated the debate, came close to treating the whole subject of crime in the inner cities as though it could be solved by increasing police numbers and police deployment. Those aspects dominated the hon. Gentleman's speech, but I must tell him that increasing police numbers or altering the deployment or working organisation of the police force will not solve, and may not even reduce, crime in the inner cities. To suggest that it will or might is superficial to the point of irresponsibility.

The crime problem within inner cities cannot be separated from inner-city unemployment, inner-city poverty, inner-city deprivation, and inner-city housing and public service shortages. It cannot be separated from the reduction in public services that has come about in inner cities, because the rate support grant cuts that have been endured by every authority within inner-city boundaries have hit the inner cities hardest. Deprivation breeds despair, and despair breeds crime.

I give a simple example from my own constituency, admitting that it is a dangerous example to give because it is open to interpretation, but it is a contemporary, immediate example. Young men in my constituency will soon be leaving school. They are warned that they are to anticipate three or four years' unemployment. They have been warned—it is a sign of institutionalised despair—by what used to be called career teachers, who have been retrained to perform a new task, namely, preparing their pupils, not for jobs, but for unemployment. This month, they will leave school expecting to be unemployed during the lifetime of this Parliament.

In the circumstances, I do not believe that we should be surprised if young people vandalise coin boxes. I do not condone their doing that. I heartily disapprove of it. When they are caught doing that, they must be prosecuted, sentenced and punished, but I am not surprised that young men who face such a prospect in life behave in exactly that way. That leads me to the certain conviction that inner-city crime will not fall unless inner-city unemployment falls and inner-city homelessness services improve. From my 20-odd years experience in representing an inner city, I have absolutely no doubt about that.

That being said, it is important not to suggest or even to imply, or to let it be thought that we are suggesting or implying, that a majority of inner-city dwellers are anything other than law-abiding citizens. Most inner-city families are victims of crime; they are not criminals. Most inner-city families are as enthusiastic as any hon. Member to see inner-city crime tackled. In my constituency there has been one demonstration concerning the police in the past 23 years. That was a demonstration demanding more police to be visible on the beat, immediately after the Handsworth riot. The demonstrators said that the police were ignoring the needs of that inner city, that they believed that crime and violence were acceptable there, and that the decaying central areas had been written off.

I make it absolutely clear that I believe that the demonstrators were wrong. The West Midlands police have an honourable and admirable record in their attempt to deal with inner-city problems, but I describe the attitude of my constituents because it demonstrates that, even though in that particular they were wrong, there is a generalised view in inner cities—not just in Birmingham, but throughout the country—that such areas have been written off by the Government, have been forgotten, and are areas about which there is no care and for which there is no real wish to provide adequate services.

Inner cities are becoming deeply alienated from the rest of society and are beginning to fear that the rest of society's rules and hopes do not apply to them. Frankly, that is hardly surprising. If I may take a personal example again, life in the Sparkhill ward of the Sparkbrook constituency in Birmingham bears little resemblance or relationship to life in Solihull, only 4 miles further south. It is inevitable that young men and women in particular —the new generation born and bred there—should feel an enormous alienation when they see the difference between the life that is available to them and that which is available in more prosperous suburbs only a few miles away.

Of course, the greatest alienation — certainly the greatest potential alienation — is among the ethnic minorities. The problems of the inner cities will not be solved until the Government or, more likely, their successors, remove the laws and regulations that discriminate against the black and Asian British and contribute to their feeling of alienation from society as a whole. But that matter is for later debates. Today, I merely say that it is essential that all inner-city families are encouraged to believe that society does not treat them all as second-class citizens.

I give two examples of how that feeling is being encouraged. One is the refusal by the gas and electricity authorities to install coin meters. In my experience, nothing causes law-abiding families living in a respectable road more anger and despair than the discovery that they are not entitled to have a coin meter installed because they live in a geographical area that is designated either by British Gas or the local electricity board as unsuitable for such provision. They say that it makes them feel ashamed to live in the area, that they are being treated like criminals and that, very often, it is unnecessary because there is no question of a meter being broken into and robbed.

The second example is the refusal of insurance cover at normal rates.

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): I remind the right hon. Gentleman that in 1986 thefts from coin meters went up by 23 per cent. in Birmingham in the west midlands. Therefore, it is not surprising that the statutory body concerned may be reluctant to install them. There was not only theft but wholesale damage.

Mr. Hattersley: I do not dispute the figures for a moment. I dispute the designation of whole areas as being responsible for such matters. The hon. Gentleman will not want to claim to be one of the more sensitive hon. Members, but if the West Midlands gas board wrote him a note saying that because of where he lived he was not entitled to the provision that was available to other people whom he knew in Birmingham, he would regard it as deeply offensive, and so do many of my constituents. The hon. Gentleman should not be surprised. He should not be surprised, either, that provision such as weighted insurance policies in areas in which it is not necessary for them to be weighted encourages individuals against whom the discrimination applies to believe that society as a whole applies different rules to them than to the rest of the community. They are bound to be offended and alienated by that.

I now refer to the police in particular, for it is that matter that we are debating, and it is on the subject of alienation and the police that I wish to spend most of my time. Certainly, I want to see more police in inner cities. Certainly I want to see more police on the beat, and visible, committed to and part of the inner cities that they police, and devoted to its interests and involved in its success. That is happening in Birmingham in general, and I hope that it can happen in other parts of the city also.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme talked about the attitude of local Labour authorities to the police and the troubles that they are causing. One of the examples that he gave was the resentment of some authorities and their opposition to the Prevention of Terrorism Act 1974. Nothing has so disturbed the relationship between police and public in my constituency as the arrival of police officers from outside the city, their interviews, entries into houses in connection with the Prevention of Terrorism Act, their arrest of a local psychiatrist under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, their detention of that psychiatrist for some weeks under the Prevention of Terrorism Act, and her eventual prosecution and acquittal. The Prevention of Terrorism Act and its application within my constituency did more to disrupt the relationship between police and public than anything that has happened in the past five years. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to treat such matters seriously, he should examine the realities rather than the slogans that he was encouraged to use during the general election campaign.

I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman's central thesis. We need more policemen on the beat in central areas. They should police those areas in ways that are sensitive in two particulars. First, the police must be seen to be even-handed between each group in the community. We pretend that what we know to be true is untrue if we do not accept that there is a real problem in some areas concerning the relationship between the police and young blacks—young West Indians and young men of Asian origin.

The fact that those young men—black British and Asian British—feel that the police discriminate against them is indisputable. The duty of the police and of the leaders of the communities in which such young men live is to remove that feeling of alienation. In many cases the facts of discrimination are indisputable. We have an absolute obligation to create the impression—and the reality—that all young people, standing on any street corner in any city, are treated with the same degree of police understanding, tolerance and operational techniques.

Secondly, to my certain knowledge the population are alienated by the police officer who turns up at the scene of a burglary, or some minor offence, or an assault, and says, "There's a lot of this about around here. I doubt whether we can solve the problem. We will take a statement, but it may not be possible to investigate much because this is the sort of area where such crimes occur." That is another example of the people in the inner cities feeling that they have been written off, and it is another example of what must be avoided if people are to work with the police. They will if they are offered that opportunity by individual policemen who are associated with, committed to and interested in the future of the area.

Nothing so disturbs the relationship between police and public in the inner cities as the new, perhaps young, police officer who is rushed in from outside in an emergency and who does not know the area or the area's problems. If I said that in my constituency, it would be regarded as a statement of the obvious. All the councillors who represent the wards in Sparkbrook would say, "Of course we know that it is important for the police to work in partnership. Of course we know that it is important for individual policemen to be associated with the area. Of course we know how problems will arise if an outside force is suddenly asked to do some special and difficult job."

It is because the councillors in the area understand the problems and take them for granted that I want to see an elected police authority which can pass on that information, which is so obvious to me and others who know the inner cities, to the police authority itself.

I do not want an elected police authority to be involved in the day-to-day operation of the police force. I do not want the Home Secretary's representative guiding individual incidents. My hon. Friend the Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) described Mr. Winston Churchill when he was Home Secretary with characteristic charity when he said that he did not turn up at Sidney street to have his photograph taken. But that is exactly what he did. He did turn up at Sidney street and have his photograph taken—and very successful he was, too.

[Mr. Hattersley]

That is not how a proper Home Secretary should behave. A proper Home Secretary behaves in a way that allows a police force to form a partnership with the people of the area. That must involve the overall policy determination being at least influenced by the representatives of the people in that area.

I do not deny that sometimes a small minority of local authorities are foolish in their attitude to the police. I do not propose to pretend anything different when future incidents arise, but the fact that a tiny minority of authorities have taken decisions with which I deeply disapprove is not an argument that justifies the whole police service being outside anything like democratic control. An element of democratic control is essential for a partnership between the police and the public.

My final words are on the subject of partnership, in which I believe deeply. If we are to end crime in the inner cities, as well as ending despair by reducing poverty and ending alientation by reducing unemployment, we have to convince the people that the police are on their side and that they should work with the police. That is easier to do in some areas than in others, and that task has to be shared by Members on both sides of the House. I am perfectly prepared to say to those authorities that want to drive a wedge between police and public that they are wrong to do so. I hope that Government Members will reciprocate that dangerous broad-mindedness by saying that there are occasions when the behaviour of the police is something about which we have to take legitimate exception and which has to be improved and corrected.

One of the tragedies of the so-called law and order debate is that it has been projected that one party does nothing but criticise the police, and that the other party believes that the police are perfect in every particular. If we are to get it right, we have to steer a course between those two things. That course involves the police being in part responsible to an elected authority and behaving in a way that convinces the public that they are working with them and on their side.

It is that sort of proposition to which I hope to dedicate some of my time during the next four or five years. It is with apologies that I leave the debate early so that I can advocate that, not just in the House, but in the small area of central Birmingham that it is my privilege to represent.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): Mr. Deputy Speaker, I thank you for giving me the opportunity of making my maiden speech in the House. It is customary to refer to one's predecessor on such occasions and I am delighted to do so.

My constituency has a distinguished and colourful political tradition that can be traced back through Sir Tatton Brinton to Sir Gerald Nabarro and even further back to Stanley Baldwin. Mr. Esmond Bulmer, my immediate predecessor, was a worthy successor of that tradition. For nearly 14 years in the constituency he was assiduous, shrewd and well respected. In the House his grasp of business and industrial relations matters, his kindness, his generosity of spirit and his courtesy were of a high order. I am proud to succeed him.

While Wyre Forest is not an inner city, it is a microcosm of England. Besides 75 square miles of fertile countryside we boast a medieval town of Bewdley, as well as Stourport and Kidderminster, which are the centre of the nation's carpet-making industry. It is heartening that after a period of retrenchment not only can the Carpet Industry Trade Association magazine now talk of a renewed confidence within the industry but that engineering companies associated traditionally with the motor industry are now investing in the area, exporting and creating new jobs. Only last week I visited a firm employing 180 people making car trim for the motor industry which, besides doubling its work force over the past eight years, plans to double its work force again over the next two. As a result, unemployment in my constituency is falling and is less than the national average.

Against that background, it is possibly unsurprising that the rate of crime in the area is half the national average and that last year serious crime fell. That is no cause for complacency. Everybody in the nation, from wherever they come, has an interest in today's debate. That is because the rule of law in any society is indivisible. To allow lawlessness and violence in our major cities is to risk the fabric of that society everywhere.

I still serve on the Birmingham city council. Part of my ward is in Balsall Health where over the past five years I have had the opportunity to see at first hand the problems of policing of the inner city. I would like to make three points about that. First, good policing never loses sight of the fact that, despite stories about the crime rate, despite newspaper stories about violence and despite even rioting, as has just been said by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the vast majority of citizens in our inner cities are peaceful, law-abiding and considerate. We owe it to those people to ensure that their areas are policed, irrespective of social racial or emotional considerations or even the fear of civil disturbance, in a consistent, fair, even-handed and effective way. Nothing undermines that moral majority more than events such as two that have been witnessed in the ward over the past three weeks.

In the first event, 50 youths were openly dealing in drugs in daylight with only two police to intervene. When those police did intervene, one of them was stabbed in the face. Secondly, there was a shoot-out between competing groups of prostitutes' pimps which, sadly, was virtually unattended.

In the light of such events I strongly support the Government's actions on drug sentencing and the confiscation of the proceeds of drugs and what they are proposing to do to increase sentences for firearms, the use of which is sadly the norm in security van robberies in the west midlands. I urge that consideration be given to the individual licensing of shotguns, as is the case for firearms, and, where appropriate, as my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) said, to further increases in police officer numbers in the inner cities. Contrary to what was said by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, that is something that the people of Balsall Heath, whom I represent on Birmingham council, would very much welcome.

Peace in our inner cities is made more fragile by racial tension. There is no doubt that great strides have been taken and that enormous resources have been pumped in to police training, recruitment and multi-cultural activities of all sorts over the past few years in order to increase the understanding and confidence between different communities that live in our inner cities.

There is no doubt that there is a new and virulent anti-racism abroad which proceeds from the premise that all white people are inevitably racist and that they must be purged of that by compulsory anti-racist training and positive discrimination. That attitude is divisive and is likely to heighten racial tensions and differences in the inner cities rather than reduce them. Not only is it condescending to black people but it isolates and balkanises the inner cities and makes their problems more deep-rooted.

One should not be controversial in a maiden speech and I shall confine myself to saying that it is sad to see the reaction of some London borough councils and councils in other areas to the Metropolitan police's anti-racial harassment campaign. Their attitude has not been helpful, nor has the attitude of people who are in charge of the race relations committee in Sheffield. When asked recently—I have a copy of the "Police Monitor" in Sheffield with me—whether the present chief constable was ideal, they replied, "Oh no, you've got to remember that he's in charge of a racist institution." Such comments and actions are not helpful.

It is helpful to support ethnic recruitment into the police force, which has doubled in the west midlands in the past two years. It is helpful to support police and community links, which bolster the position of moderate black people in the inner cities, and to encourage centres of excellence, whether they be technological, academic or sporting. They improve the self-confidence of black people in the inner cities and provide the role model for constructive behaviour.

It has been said that the best policing is not done merely by the police but with and by the people of the inner cities themselves. Crime prevention is not and should not be a middle class preserve. The more we enable people to own their own homes, the more we enable people to manage their own estates, and the more we enable people to be consulted on the refurbishment and design of the areas in which they live, the more will be their investment in their neighbourhood and the more will be their incentive and opportunity to ensure that the standards in those neighbourhoods are maintained.

In Birmingham we have already seen the formation of 700 neighbourhood watch schemes, which last year resulted in a 12 per cent. reduction in domestic burglaries. In the estates in which it is more difficult to set up neighbourhood watch schemes, Estate Action and the community programme, with their system of burglar alarm improvements and the provision of concierges for tower blocks—that is most important—have had a tremendous success, which I am sure will continue. There is a good case for extending tax and property tax reliefs for those inner-city dwellers who invest in burglar alarm protection for their homes.

Finally, there is one area on which group policing and all the initiatives that we have in the inner cities depend. It was mentioned earlier by the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett), and it is the attitude, self-discipline and responsibility of our young people. It is a sobering and frightening fact that the age at which the maximum number of offences is committed is 14 for girls and 15 for boys. All too often children have not received the type of guidance and lead on moral standards which they should and which should be a vital part of the hidden curriculum in our schools. I hope, and expect that the new Education Bill will lay down not only criteria for academic achievements for children during their school life, but clear standards and best practice for their moral and social education to encourage responsible behaviour and all that that entails. For, ultimately, the peace and order of our country, let alone the inner cities, depend on the attitudes, aspirations and sense of self-discipline of our young people.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): It is a pleasure to begin by congratulating the hon. Member for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs) on his maiden speech. He was perhaps not as uncontroversial as some maiden speakers, and I must confess that I cannot agree with his remarks about racism and the need continually to combat it in inner-city areas. However, he spoke with eloquence and confidence, and I look forward to hearing further from him.

I congratulate also the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) on choosing this topic for debate. It is an extremely important issue. The rise in crime, and above all the rise in the fear of crime, in our inner-city areas is not unrelated to unemployment, deprivation and the lack of adequate facilities, especially for young people in those areas. Indeed, that is one of the most important issues currently facing many of our constituents. The hon. Gentleman has done well to highlight that by his choice of subject.

For my constituents and constituency, the hon. Member has picked a peculiarly appropriate day for this debate. Yesterday afternoon, at the Old Bailey, five police officers were convicted of a variety of offences relating to an incident that occurred in my constituency. I want to spend some time on this incident and the case that followed because there are some important lessons to be learnt from it. When the Minister replies, I hope that he will respond to some of the specific points that I shall raise.

As most hon. Members know, the event took place in August 1983 when five young lads were walking home from a local fair along George's road, which is just off the Holloway road. It was a warm summer's evening and a vanload of police officers drew up alongside them. Several officers bundled themselves out of the van and brutally beat up the five young lads. They were entirely innocent youngsters and had done absolutely nothing to provoke the incident. They suffered broken bones, were badly bruised and were in considerable pain. Indeed, one still has an aggravated speech impediment resulting from the incident. It was an outrageous affair and one which all hon. Members will naturally regard as wholly unacceptable in a civilised society.

I am pleased that after four years justice has at long last been done and been seen to be done and that yesterday the judge at the Old Bailey sent a clear message to the public and police alike that when a relatively small number of police officers who engage in this sort of activity overstep the mark, they will be brought to account.

The primary lesson that must be learnt from the incident, however, is the need to review the methods and procedures of the Police Complaints Authority. A week or so after the incident I submitted to the then Police Complaints Board a complaint on behalf of some of the youngsters who had been assaulted. After the two and a half years of investigation, first by the Police Complaints Board and then by the Police Complaints Authority, the authority ended up producing a report in January 1986 which stated that the incident had happened and it was disgraceful but that it could not identify the individual officers concerned. Two investigations in two and a half years were unable to identify either the van or the officers involved.

I ask the House whether the public can really have genuine confidence in a system of investigating complaints against the police when the Police Complaints Authority —the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) is technically correct in saying that it is independent— must rely on serving police officers to carry out the legwork of investigations. That is the key to the problem. So long as serving police officers investigate and interrogate the police, I do not believe that the public can have complete confidence in the independence of the procedure.

Mr. Wheeler: The hon. Gentleman makes an important and fair point which must be addressed. Does he agree, however, that the significance of this case is that it was the very same police officers who sought justice and obtained it by granting immunity to a police informant which allowed the prosecution to reach a conclusion? The hon. Gentleman appears to suggest an alternative, but where will we find these paragons of integrity who have the skills to enable them to bring these cases to a conclusion? That is the problem.

Mr. Smith: I was about to deal with the hon. Gentleman's first point. His second point is made continually. The argument is that only the police are capable of possessing interrogating skills. A large number of customs officers, Department of Trade and Industry and Inland Revenue officials and ombudsmen's staff have investigative and interrogative skills and use them to good effect. One does not need to be a police officer to interrogate or investigate. It is perfectly possible for an independent police complaints authority to have independent staff, answerable to it and to no one else, to carry out investigative work.

While that is not the case, the public will wish to ask questions. They will want to know how vigorous was the questioning during the two-and-a-half year inquiry period and how much allowance was made for the "clubability" of police culture, whereby police officers quite naturally stick together, and stick their story together, through thick and thin. They will want to know whether it is ultimately right for the police to police themselves. I do not believe that it is, and the Police Federation agrees with me. It wants an entirely independent police complaints authority. I believe that it would be in the interests both of the public and of the police to ensure a greater degree of independence.

Mr. Lawrence: Does not what happened in this case prove the importance of the police's working with the public and particularly with the media? The outcome of the trial resulted from the police working within the system with the help of ordinary members of the public and with the help of the media. Does not that vindicate the system rather than suggest that we should change it?

Mr. Smith: It does not vindicate the system at all. Had the system simply been left to operate as it normally operates, the Police Complaints Authority would have reported in January 1986, saying, "Yes. The incident happened; apologies all round. We have carpeted the 30 officers in the three vans that we think were in the area that evening, but there is nothing that we can do." It took three weeks of public outcry and concern to force the matter further into the open. The matter would not have been reopened without that public outcry, the campaign conducted by many people in the media and, I might add, a lot of pressure from me.

The second major lesson that needs to be learnt from this whole sorry affair is that we need to review police disciplinary rules. At the moment, to find a breach of discipline by a serving police officer the test of proof beyond reasonable doubt has to be applied—precisely the test that operates in a court of law. No matter who is up before a judge or jury, that test must be preserved in a court of law. However, in every other profession, for matters of discipline — not matters of criminal prosecution — the test is not proof beyond reasonable doubt; it is a balance of probabilities. Why is it that for the police, and the police alone, the stiffer test is needed? Why is it more difficult to take disciplinary proceedings against the police, when the police are in a position of far greater authority and trust in relation to the public than the members of any other profession? We need to re-examine the operation of the police disciplinary rules and the strength of the test needed to ensure that discipline can be exacted where necessary. There must be a balance between the natural and legitimate rights of serving police officers and the interests of the public to make sure that discipline exists. At present, that balance is not right and we must try to change it.

The third major lesson that I wish to draw is the need for proper control, supervision and record-keeping of the activities of district support unit vans. The van which carried the five police officers who were convicted yesterday was a district support unit van. I have been unable to establish who was in control of its operations that night. Was it the police station whence it came, or was it the police station and authority covering the patch in which it was operating, which was a completely different station? Who was in operational control of the activities of that van that night? Even more important, what records were kept by the occupants and driver of that van of where it went, what they did and what incidents it attended that evening? Very few records appear to be kept at present, and as long as no records are kept and there is no clear chain of control and command we will always be worried about what some of the occupants of the vans are up to.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I place on record the thanks and congratulations of many people in Islington for my hon. Friend's assiduous work in pursuing this dreadful incident, which happened in 1983, and in helping to ensure the conviction of those five police officers. Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that many people now believe that the special support unit van which carried those police officers was under the control of no one? There has been no evidence from Scotland Yard that it intends to do anything to rectify the command structure to ensure that such units come under much closer control.

Mr. Smith: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks and for the point he makes, because it highlights the difficulty of establishing how such vans should operate and what structure we need to ensure that they operate within a properly disciplined and managed hierarchy.

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): My hon. Friend mentioned a lack of records, but radio reports this morning give the impression that those officers had been on duty continuously for 36 hours, so some records must exist. Will my hon. Friend comment on the fact that they had been on continuous service for 36 hours? One assumes that they accrued some overtime payment. What justification was there for it, and what purpose did it achieve?

Mr. Smith: My hon. Friend has anticipated my next point.

The fourth lesson that I draw from the affair is that it must be unacceptable to place police officers in a position where they are working a 36-hour shift with a break of only four hours. They are bound to be tired and irritable having been cooped up in the back of a van on a warm summer night. It does not excuse for a moment what happened, but it may make us understand a bit more why it occurred. It is not a sensible use of scarce personnel and resources to have policemen on duty for that length of time. Why, when there was no immediate crisis—they were not rushing to an incident that needed an immediate response—were police officers being made to operate in such inhuman and unsafe circumstances?

The compensation which was awarded to three of the youngsters, which was agreed between the Metropolitan police and them not long after the incident occurred, was inadequate.

I hope that, in the light of what happened, the convictions yesterday and the public concern about the case, the Metropolitan police will see fit to be somewhat more generous than they have been to the youngsters. I ask no more than that they consider that request. Apparently, one young man has not yet reached a settlement. I hope that when he reaches a settlement with the Metropolitan police—I suspect that it will be on more generous terms than the others have already received — the relative generosity of settlement will be reflected in an ex gratia decision to make similar compensation available to the others who suffered in the incident. I do not want to labour the point, but I hope that the message will get through to Scotland Yard. I believe that something should happen along the lines I have suggested.

I fear that the role of the Home Secretary in this affair has not been glorious. I give a degree of credit to Sir Kenneth Newman who decided, off his own bat, in February last year to reopen the inquiry and to make offers of immunity which eventually brought five individuals to justice. Throughout three weeks of public concern, the Home Secretary consistently refused to reopen the inquiry despite the repeated requests of myself and others. According to the Home Secretary, the matter was closed and there was nothing further to be done. We now know how wrong he was. We now know that when the inquiry was reopened individuals were identified and eventually the matter was brought to a head.

This incident raises questions about the role of the Home Secretary as the police authority for London. As long as the Home Secretary takes decisions in an atmosphere that is remote from Scotland Yard and even more remote from the concerns and needs of Londoners, I do not believe that there is any proper, democratic accountability. I certainly echo the calls of my right hon. and hon. Friends this morning for greater democratic accountability of the police as a whole and of the Metropolitan police in particular.

Of course, the Government will produce the old canard of so-called political control of police operational duties by nasty, Left-wing extremists. That is absolute nonsense. That is not what we want. We want the people of London to have a democratic say in the overall way in which London is policed. I would accept rather more readily some of the criticisms that Conservative Members level at some Labour-controlled authorities if they also considered the work that some Labour-controlled authorities undertake in close co-operation with the police.

My authority, Islington, is a precise example of such co-operation. For several years Islington has worked in close co-operation with the local police. It has a well-established police consultative committee. A lot of work is carried out, in a multi-agency manner, regarding the difficulties experienced in particular estates and neighbourhoods. There is a good, constructive relationship between the police and that authority. The authority is not uncritical nor adulatory. There are times when I believe that some Conservative Members believe that the police can do no wrong. What we need is a critical, but constructive working partnership among the local people, local councils and local police forces to ensure that proper crime prevention measures are taken and proper, good quality policing is practised in our inner city areas. That is the way forward.

I hope that out of the tragedy of this incident, which happened just off the Holloway road four years ago, the subsequent long, terrible saga and the trauma which five young men and their families had to go through, some lessons will come. I hope that something is learnt from those lessons not only by the Opposition, but by the Government. The lessons must be learnt if improvements are to be made and if we are to ensure that this sort of incident never happens again.

12.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I know that many of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members want to take part in the debate. I know, too, that there are other debates, and it might be for the convenience of all if the next debate was called, so I shall try to confine my remarks to no more than 20 minutes. I hope that hon. Members will forgive me if I do not deal with all the points that they have raised in as much detail as I should like.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) for having introduced the motion. This has been a stimulating and useful debate, and my hon. Friend clearly described the problems that his constituents encounter, and the problems that are encountered in inner-city areas. The fact that he has initiated the debate enables us all to focus on what is undoubtedly a major problem, and we are grateful to him for that.

I hope to deal with the great majority of the points that have been raised. Before I do so, however, I want briefly to sketch the Government's broad approach to the problem of crime. This Government have dedicated more resources, energy and imagination than any other Government ever did to ensuring that we have a properly resourced law and order programme. Our policy breaks down into three parts: first, to ensure that the police have adequate resources; secondly, to ensure that the courts have adequate powers with which to deal with offenders; and, thirdly, to involve the public in a coherent crime prevention campaign.

My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme gave considerable credit to the Government for the provision of police resources. I shall give a few basic figures. In 1987-88 we shall be spending about 45 per cent. more in real terms on the police service than was spent in 1978-79. There are now about 11,000 more police officers than in May 1979, and about 6,000 more civilian staff. That is a process of gradually building up the establishments that will continue, and my hon. Friend will recall that in May 1986 my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced his commitment to a rolling programme of increasing police establishments. For example, the London Metropolitan force will have its police establishments increased by 300 a year over a period of four years, and, outside London, the forces will increase by 500 a year over the same period. At the same time, we are giving high priority to a process of increasing civilianisation.

Mr. Soley: The Minister is boasting of a Government who are spending more money than ever before on policing. That Government are boasting of more police officers than ever before, yet the crime rate has gone through the roof, the crime clear-up rate has gone through the floor and there are fewer police on the beat than ever before in recent times. What on earth are the Government so proud of?

Mr. Hogg: I do not understand the force of that intervention. Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that we should not be concentrating on increasing the number of policemen? If not, his intervention has no value. I do not believe that we can solve the problem merely by increasing the number of police officers. However, that is an important element in our programme, and that is why I am doing it. I hope that the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) is not suggesting that we should not increase police establishments. If that is his suggestion, I hope that he will be candid about it in the speech that I feel sure he is anxious to make.

That is the first aspect of the policy upon which I wish to expand. The second aspect is that we are determined to ensure that the processes of the law are adequate to detect, to try, to convict and to deal with offenders. For those purposes, over the period of the last two Parliaments we have made a substantial number of changes in the criminal law. We have introduced a new range of offences; for example, in the Public Order Act 1986. We have introduced new mechanisms for the detection of crime; for example, the serious fraud office. In a number of important areas we have increased the maximum sentence that can be imposed. As I think the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) said, we have introduced a power to confiscate the assets of drug traffickers. That programme is designed to ensure that society has the law that it requires in order to keep the peace and punish the wrongdoer. We shall continue that process of increasing the powers available to society.

My final point on this aspect of crime prevention was raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) and for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs). They emphasised the very great importance of crime prevention, and they were right to do so. The campaign against the criminal cannot be left to the formal institutions of society. Society as a whole needs to be involved, partly because that is the nature of any campaign, and partly because crime itself is very largely opportunistic. Therefore, the Government have put forward — I think for the first time — a broadly-based and coherent programme of crime prevention. That programme included the neighbourhood watch schemes, the crime prevention panels, advertising, the use of the community programme and, of course, the funds in our inner-city programmes.

We have brought forward for the first time a coherent and co-ordinated crime prevention programme. Over the lifetime of two Parliaments the Government have, first, increased the resources available to the police; secondly, enhanced the powers of society to fight the criminal; and, thirdly, put together a wholly coherent and co-ordinated crime prevention programme.

I should like to turn from the generality to the particular and address the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme. Understandly, he is concerned about the policing needs of Greater Manchester, and he put the case for Greater Manchester in the eloquent way that I would expect of him. It would be helpful for me to emphasise a few points and a few facts.

First, I shall give some basic figures. On 31 May, there were 6,873 officers in the Greater Manchester area. That was an increase of 433 since May 1979, and I am pleased to see that the deficiency in establishment is reducing. In 1986-87 there was an average of about 178 vacancies on the force. I am pleased to see that that is now dropping, and I understand that by March 1988 it is hoped that the force will be up to establishment. Moreover, in addition to police strengths, there has been a substantial increase in the number of civilians in the force. On 31 May, the civilian strength was 1,837, an increase of 428 on May 1979. That is very important, because through the process of civilianising a force we free more policemen for operational duties. In the Manchester force at the moment the level of civilian strength at 18·5 per cent. is lower than the average of the civilian strengh measured in England and Wales generally. There is room for more civilianisation in the Greater Manchester force. I know that the chief constable is currently pursuing such a policy and I hope that he will continue to do so.

As to funding for the Greater Manchester force, I know that my hon. Friend will welcome the fact that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has set the expenditure level for the force at a point that will allow spending to be increased by 13 per cent. over budgeted expenditure for 1986-87. That will enable the force to undergo a period of positive growth.

My hon. Friend will no doubt say that that is not enough. I understand why he will argue in that way, but I hope that he will bear in mind some of the following points. I do not accept that the Greater Manchester force is undermanned to the extent that my hon. Friend suggested. He suggested that the force would have to be increased by 40 per cent., or about 3,000 men. I know of no compelling evidence to that effect. The police to population ratio in the seven metropolitan areas is better than the average police to population ratio of all the forces in England and Wales. Within the seven metropolitan forces, the Greater Manchester police force has the third most favourable police to population ratio.

I do not believe that the answer to crime is to recuit more highly paid police officers, although there is a need for more officers. That is not the sole answer, nor can it be so, if only because the cost of the operation would be so great. Each officer costs about £25,500 and, to get one additional officer on the street, force establishments must be increased by about five men. It follows from that that if one believes that one can tackle the problem of crime by substantially increasing the number of beat officers, one is thinking in terms not of hundreds, but of many thousands, and that is not a policy that I can put to the House.

What we must do is increase force establishments in a steady, evolutionary and progressive way and meet identified needs where they can be established, rather than say, "I shall commit a Government or Parliament to a manpower programme that is measured in thousands." There is no positive correlation between the number of police officers and the detection of crime. In the Metropolitan force there is a favourable police to population ratio, when measured against other forces, yet it has a low clear-up rate. The force in Northumbria is an example that points in the other direction, because it has a favourable clear-up rate, but its police to population ratio is not favourable in comparison with others.

Mr. Garrett: I hope that the hon. Gentleman has not forgotten the plea that I made about the need to bring the Northumbria police force up to strength. If the hon. Gentleman reads my statement, he will probably agree that there is a good case for a few more officers.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman put his case very eloquently and I shall take the points that he made into account. However, we must assess whether there is a proven and identifiable need within the hon. Gentleman's police force area.

Mr. Garrett: I hope that the hon. Gentleman has not forgotten about it.

Mr. Hogg: I never forget the hon. Gentleman; he is an unforgettable hon. Gentleman.

My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme said that we should transfer resources from the shire counties to the inner cities. In part, we have done so.

Since May 1979 we have increased establishment posts overall in England and Wales by 5,000, of which 1,226 have gone to the Metropolitan force and more than 1,000 to the remaining six joint metropolitan forces. But I cannot tell my hon. Friends who represent the shire forces that their needs are less important. The needs of the shire forces, though different, are often as great and compelling as those of the inner-city forces. My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme well knows the anxiety about the level of the Sussex force. He will recall the debate organised and attended by his hon. Friends before the general election, during which the Home Office came under much criticism for failure to increase that force. Members representing the Thames Valley area will be seeing me next week, when they will no doubt say that the Home Office has been unduly neglectful of their interests. That is happening in virtually every area. One cannot say that the shire forces should be neglected in favour of my hon. Friend's area.

Mr. Churchill: I do not suggest that they should be neglected but that they should not be over-provided for while the inner city areas are under-provided for. With respect, my hon. Friend lays too much stress on the police to population ratio, when the police to crime ratio in my view is more important. In that respect, we are very badly provided for in terms of resources and manpower. As I have said, every police officer in Greater Manchester has to deal with 65 per cent. more crimes than his counterpart in the City of London.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes his point clearly, but Members representing the shire forces will not accept that those forces are over-provided for.

My hon. Friend and the House generally should treat crime figures with some caution. Recorded crime is not the same as the actual incidence of crime. The report by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis, published a few days ago, contains an interesting passage on page 1, in which the commissioner makes the following telling statement:

"there was an actual rise of 20 per cent. in domestic burglary over the period 1972 to 1983 while the number of recorded offences rose by over 100 per cent."

One must clearly be extremely cautious about drawing too many general conclusions from the figures for recorded crime.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Wallsend (Mr. Garrett) for saying that we must assist the police. He then put in a promotion for his own force, which I entirely understand. The hon. Gentleman was wholly right in what he said, but he will forgive me for suggesting that he might seek to convince the many Labour Members and Labour local authorities who take a different view. I have in mind Manchester city council, Lambeth borough council, Haringey borough council——

Mr. Garrett: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman will forgive me if I do not give way.

Mr. Garrett: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The Minister cannot implicate the people of Tyne and Wear and the north-east in any misdemeanours that may take place in London or Manchester. We are far from that level.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman personally says that it is important to assist the police, and I agree with him, but too many people in his party take a different view. I hope that he will seek to persuade them otherwise.

I congratulate my hon. Friend for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patrick) on an eloquent and distinguished speech which was marked by a degree of conciseness which the House would wish Ministers to emulate. He made a notable tribute to our friend and former colleague, and he will come to have the same respect in this place as his predecessor had. I agreed with my hon. Friend when he stressed the need to involve society as a whole in the policing of our country. He was right to emphasise the need to achieve proper design in the construction of estates. There is no doubt that one can design out crime, and one should do so in the early stages of any building scheme.

The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mrs. Barnes) made a contribution which, like most Liberal party contributions to the matter, was singularly immemorable.

[Mr. Hogg]

However, she made one or two points that I shall seek to wreck—[Interruption.] I shall seek to answer them. I do not accept the criticism about the Police Complaints Authority. It is an independent authority — as its investigation will show — which brings an independent judgment to bear on complaints about the police service. It would not be sensible or wise to provide it with an investigation branch outside the existing police service.

The matter of knives was raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton) and by the hon. Member for Brent, South. I agree that it is a major problem. I hope that the Government will be able to come forward in the near future with positive proposals to deal with the sale of certain offensive weapons and also, I hope, though I give no commitment, with the carrying of them.

The hon. Member for Brent, South spoke about racial harassment. I entirely agree with what he said. Racial harassment is a serious offence, in that it undermines social cohesion and is wrong in principle.

Mr. Corbyn rose——

Mr. Hogg: I shall not give way any more. I wish to conclude my remarks.

Mr. Corbyn: It will be helpful.

Mr. Hogg: It is kind of the hon. Gentleman to wish to help me. I shall bear in mind, when next he rises, that he is likely to be helpful, but I shall not give way on this occasion.

I entirely agree with the point made by the hon. Member for Brent, South about the need to combat racial harassment, and the Metropolitan constabulary is alert to that. It would be quite foolish to pretend that all officers within the police force are free of prejudice. Since I have held my office, I have noticed that, of all the formal institutions of society, the police have done more to put their house in order than any other that I can readily think of. Sufficient credit is not given to them for that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) also made an eloquent speech. The House will be grateful to him for the tribute that he paid to our old friend and colleague, his predecessor Mark Calisle, who commanded respect and had great influence in the House. My hon. Friend is likely to inherit and earn that legacy. We were pleased to hear him speak today. I agree with his view of the necessity to ensure that criminal punishments contain an element of punishment, retribution and deterrence. That is right. The criminal law is about punishment, deterrence, and exacting retribution. That is proper. I was sorry to hear that we cannot agree with him on the matter of increased remission, though he will bear in mind that the maximum period of remission is two months.

The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) made the kind of eloquent speech that one expects of him. Of course, he returned to the subject after four years, so one would not expect him to be wholly played into it. I agree with what he said about the need to be evenhanded in one's approach to policing in the community, especially in the context of ethnic minorities. The police are conscious of that and are seeking to ensure that the breaches and misconduct that have occurred in the past are eliminated.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest on his contribution. He was right to congratulate Esmond Bulmer on being such a successful Member. It is clear that the new hon. Member for Wyre Forest will achieve a similar status. I was glad that my hon. Friend supported our policy on confiscating assets from drug traffickers. I understand his comments on shotguns, and I agree that there should be a place of security requirement, but I do not think that it would be right to extend the section 1 licensing system to shotgun control.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) made an important speech, not least because he dealt almost exclusively with the case which troubles us all, and which was reported in today's newspapers. I do not think that what happened points to a failure by the Police Complaints Authority. The cover-up concerns officers who were either involved in what happened or knew of it. There is no criticism of the officers involved in the investigation of the offence.

I do not think that criticism can be attached to the Police Complaints Authority, which I regard as an efficient and independent investigatory body. It would not be right to dilute the standard of proof currently required. In police discipline cases, serious consequences can flow, such as dismissal from the force, substantial fines and besmirchment of character. In such circumstances, I prefer the present standards of proof to be maintained. I do not deny that lessons can be learnt. We shall seek to learn them.

I am ashamed to say that I have overrun by six minutes the time that I had set myself. I can hear that some of my hon. Friends think that I should shut up and sit down. I propose to do both, but in the process of sitting down I want once again to thank my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme for choosing this subject for debate. We have had a stimulating morning and many points have been made that the Government will wish to address.

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I congratulate those hon. Members who have made their maiden speeches today. They have continued the new tradition of being controversial in their first speeches. That is good, because it means that an hon. Member gets everything off his chest and does not have to be so extreme in future. I look forward to new hon. Members adopting a more balanced approach to our problems.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill), who has a distinguished record in winning the ballot. I am impressed by the self-flagellation of the Conservative party over its law and order policy. Such has been the failure of the Conservatives' law and order policy that they are in the "What's gone wrong?" phase and constantly looking at the problems afresh. I welcome that, because Conservatives made many simplistic and stupid statements in the late 1970s and throughout the 1980s, believing that they could do something about law and order by becoming tough, throwing police officers at the problem, or using the police force as the Prime Minister's private army. The police force should not be used in that way. Law and order in Britain is a disgrace under this Government.

This morning, we have heard comments about some Labour councillors who have said or done certain things. No one should say that the exercise of free speech undermines the law. It does not. I shall tell the House what undermines the law sometimes. It is when people, particularly in places such as this, break the law. I will not accept from the Conservative party criticism of the type that it has made from time to time, because that party, in recent times, has set a particularly bad example in breaches of the law.

I am not in the business, and never have been, of rubbing people's faces in the dirt when they have committed an offence. The problem is that if the Conservative party accuses someone who is exercising the right of free speech of undermining the rule of law, it has to be sure that its own house is in order. The tragedy is that it has not been. I will accept from Conservative Members or from anyone else that some members of the Labour party have sometimes said things that were stupid, wrong or whatever, but they have a right to do that, even though I may think it is stupid and wrong. What none of us should encourage is breaches of the law, and that is where the Conservative party cannot hold a candle to the Labour party or any other party. If we do not understand that, we will reduce the debate to the level of hurling insults against individuals who have either spoken in a way that is unwise or behaved in a way that has brought them into direct and real conflict with the criminal law. That is what does the damage and that is what we must not allow to continue.

Mr. Patnick: I accept that I am a new boy. If I understand the hon. Gentleman correctly, he is saying that the party is to blame, not the individual. I said that it is individual councils and individual people who are to blame. If that is put on a reciprocal basis, I accept it, but for the hon. Gentleman to damn the whole party without illustrating that at all, I find is not worthy of those who sit on the Opposition Benches.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman's point is right; but he has got it the wrong way round. I am saying that it is wrong to damn parties for the actions of individuals. That is precisely what his party has been trying to do. I urge him, not for the first time, to stop doing that. If the Conservative party will stop doing that, I will stop damning it for the actions of individuals because I have no desire—it is not in my background or training—to rub in the dirt the noses of individuals who have come into conflict with the law because of acts which have got them into trouble with the courts. The Conservative party must face that responsibility.

I want to make one or two passing points before I go on to the main issue of policing in the inner cities. The problem for the Conservative party, as the Minister stated beautifully in his speech, is that it knows that its current policy on law and order has failed disastrously. The Home Secretary and the Minister want to do something about it. However, at the same time, they want to placate those in the Conservative party who are calling for tougher measures. So we get the utter absurdity of a Home Secretary introducing a Criminal Justice Bill that will allow political pressure to be put on the Attorney-General to make lenient sentences longer. However, when that is done, the Home Secretary will let them out early. That is what he did yesterday—he gave remissions to several thousand offenders. He did not consider the conditional release scheme that I have been urging on the Government for some time, which would at least provide some sanctions if there were breaches of the law again. None of that was done.

The Minister made a speech in which he indicated that he knew that it was a profound mistake to throw police officers and money at the problem in the belief that that would solve it. At the same time, he is hoist on the petard of going around year after year saying that we must have more policemen, that they are the thin blue line and all those phrases that are somehow supposed to solve the problem. That is one of the things that demoralised the police.

The Government told the police that they were the answer to crime. Of course, they were not, and they could not be. Sir Kenneth Newman and many other senior police officers recognise that they cannot be. The police force started from the position of believing that it was going to be used by the Government to deal with the crime wave, but suddenly it found the exact opposite—the crime rates going up, the clear-up rate falling and fewer police officers on the beat. Suddenly the police had to say to themselves, "We are not the answer." The Government, who were telling them that they were the answer, were saying, "You have to account for your money a bit better; we don't like the way that you are doing your job; you have to look at it differently."

The hon. Member for Davyhulme made the valid point that perhaps we should be looking at the number of police in relation to the number of crimes. However, even that is not good enough, The Government have failed to look at the way in which their general policies have created a crime wave in this country worse than under any other Government, Labour or Tory, and worse than any other comparable European country. There are policies, such as the board-and-lodging allowance which push young people into homelessness. The Home Office knows that homelessness is linked with drug addiction, alcohol abuse and crime, but no thought is given to crime prevention. Above all, there are cuts in the provision for crime prevention and in the victim support schemes that do so much to deal with the real problem of crime rather than simply responding to crime, which is a large part of the job of the police.

There is a large deterrent and prevention aspect of policing, but policing is largely about responding to events. There is a simple message here. Twenty years ago there was one police officer to every 603 citizens. There is now one police officer to every 394 citizens. We can go on down that road until we reach the situation where half the population are police officers and half are not, but the crime rate will still be going through the roof. We will not solve the problem unless we address crime prevention and victim support and stop cutting back on the services that prevent crime, which are provided largely, but not entirely, by local authorities. I do not want to speak about that any more today; I want to concentrate on a couple of specific issues related to policing.

The first issue which touches on prevention, is the use of weapons. People in my constituency raise, with me the use of knives. I was encouraged by what the Minister said, because it sounds as if he is moving in the direction in which I urged his predecessor to move some years ago. We need a committee or a group in the Home Office which is constantly reviewing the availability of weapons in society and making the recommendations and changes in the law that are necessary. It is a fast-moving area.

Stanley knives have only recently become a problem in cases involving the slashing of people. The problem is that one cannot stop the use of Stanley knives at the point of sale. I am in favour of stopping the Rambo knives and so on at the point of sale, and I have recommended that. I have also recommended clamping down on some of the magazines that promote such things. However, we cannot stop the sale of Stanley knives. Therefore, we should ensure, for a period of time, that they are sold only in containers that are difficult to open and that they have to be transported in the container. The makers are willing to do that.

There are other areas in which one can deal with the problem and I urge the Minister to look at them. It may be that a young person will carry a knife quite innocently. I used to walk around London with a knife when I was young. It was normal and part of our culture. It was perfectly legal to wear a sheath knife on one's belt. The problem is that at times one needs to be able to take that weapon off a person. Therefore, rather than make it easier to convict a person for carrying an offensive weapon, we need to make it easier for the police to confiscate the weapon and, if necessary, have some system whereby perhaps a parent or the person involved goes to a senior officer to claim the weapon back as long as there is no dispute about the use of it. The person may simply have been carrying the knife from one house to another.

We cannot legislate for these matters simply by saying that we will take away the intention to do some evil with a knife. If we do that, we put innocent people at risk; and the Minister, who is a lawyer, will appreciate that. I strongly suggest that we look at more sophisticated ways of crime prevention.

The hon. Member for Streatham (Mr. Shelton), who spoke about prostitution, is no longer in the Chamber. Southampton, a Labour-controlled council, has introduced one of the best methods of dealing with prostitution. Rather than explain it in detail now and take up the time of hon. Members, I recommend that people go and see what the Labour council has done to deal with one of the most difficult red light areas of the country. It is far better than simply having more laws in order to book drivers for driving around and picking up prostitutes.

The main aspect of policing to which we should be addressing ourselves, but are not, is training. It is grossly unfair to a young person, often in his or her late teens or early twenties, to be put in uniform on the streets of one of our inner cities with only the basic 20 weeks' training plus a couple of years' probation while doing the job. The probationary period varies greatly in quality. It could mean that there is virtually no supervision or that there is quite a lot of good supervision. In London, 80 per cent. of the police force comes from outside, so officers have little knowledge of the area that they are to police. We must extend and improve the training period.

A problem in the Islington case was that of a macho-closed culture. The way round that is to ensure that the training is carried out not only in police colleges, or in the colleges and universities where other courses such as social awareness skills are taught at the moment, but by placements in community groups of one type or another. That would mean that the experience of police officers would be more rounded and generally based in the community than at present. It would also mean, and above all, that we would not create an elitist force which works well when it functions at its best, but which, when something goes wrong, can be used easily as a cover-up.

The Minister could quickly do something else for police officers as a result of today's debate. He could make sure that there is a system under which a police officer, who feels that a serious wrong has been committed, can go to someone, possibly outside the police force, to lodge his concern. We know that a problem for the police force during the past 20 years has been not that there are one or two bad apples in the barrel — we know that all professions have a bad apple in the barrel—but that the other apples did not do anything about it. One reason is that it is difficult to go to a senior officer and say that a certain man is breaking the law in some way because one then may become at risk. I do not mind whether we provide that system through the independent Police Complaints Authority, which my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) so ably described, or through Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Constabulary. However, we need some such system.

We need also to create a career structure for the community police officer. If we believe that the beat policeman is important in reassuring the community, we should give him a career structure. At the moment the average length of time that is spent in that job is three years. If we wish to encourage an officer to do that job for longer, we must provide a career structure by either financial or career incentives. I understand that in one European country promotion is given but one is allowed to stay on the beat. For example, inspectors work on the beat. That would be one way of dealing with the problem, but I have suggested others on other occasions.

Police accountability has not been dealt with properly in the past. It is not only about the way in which the police do their job, although that is important. The crucial fact is that we cannot achieve good crime prevention unless the police, the community and the local authority work together. As the crime rate has increased in our inner-city areas some groups, especially the elderly and the isolated, have screamed for more protection. That is understandable, because they feel most threatened. However, the police have then gone in in ways that might have been inappropriate or even heavy-handed, resulting in precisely the problem that we witnessed the other day in Islington. If we are to deal with that problem, we need a perfectly normal local authority input — such as is provided for the social services, education or housing — for police accountability.

There will always be a duty to enforce the law. However, there should be a system such as I described when I was a Front-Bench spokesman, because although there is always the right to have the law enforced and to have minimum standards enforced by the Home Secretary, there should be stringent police inspectorate. All those things, if linked with a good crime prevention and victim support scheme, could begin to give us way back out of the dreadful wave of crime, the collapse in the prison system, and the riots that have occurred under this so-called law and order Government. There must be a way back. Indeed there is a way back, and we should take it.

1.14 pm

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I am disappointed that the Minister decided to speak when he did. I am sure that he had a good reason for it, but to comment on some speeches and not leave himself the opportunity to comment on all of them is slightly insulting to hon. Members who have waited since 9.30 am to make speeches. I should have thought that at least he would listen, and comment on our speeches.

Opposition Members have spoken about the policemen who were sentenced yesterday. No Conservative Member would condemn them for that and certainly we are glad to see that justice was done, but it would have come over better if Opposition Members had also criticised what happened at Broadwater Farm when PC Blakelock was not merely beaten up, but stabbed dozens of times. The hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) actually said at the time that it was a good job and the police got a bloody good hiding. At that time Opposition Members did not condemn that incident. But I can tell the House that the police force in London recognises what is happening and knows where its friends are and, more important, where its enemies are.

I shall touch on three matters which cause problems in inner-city areas. The first is demonstrations. Week in, week out people take to the streets of our capital city and other major cities. We see long streams of marchers who make a political point but nothing else. Hundreds of policemen must be taken from crime prevention and detection to police those demonstrations.

Mr. Allen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dicks: No. I do not intend to give way; I do not have time.

The morale of the police on those demonstrations is appalling. Normally it is those on the Left who want to waste ratepayers' and taxpayers' money because of this so-called democratic right. They do not recognise and do not want to recognise the right of ordinary people to go about their normal business. The sooner the Government consider the right to demonstrate, the better. I suggest that we make those who want to demonstrate responsible for paying for the demonstration.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Dicks: With every right there is an obligation. Demonstrators want their right but do not want to meet their obligation.

Mr. Allen: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dicks: I do not intend to give way at all.

I am worried about the police monitoring groups. The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) was the chairman of the police committee of the Greater London council—one of the most obnoxious police monitoring groups that London has ever seen. Not a day went by without him condemning the police or their activities. He was the most careful police watcher and was most careful to turn a blind eye to what criminals were getting up to.

These monitoring groups look to protect ethnic minorities against the indigenous population. Whether hon. Gentlemen like it or not, that is the truth. That is how the normal everyday British person sees it. These dreadful police monitoring groups undermine the morale of the police. The police are constantly having to answer mainly false claims by them. That undermines police morale, takes up valuable time and takes them off the streets where they belong.

The most important aspect of our inner cities that we must face is what I call ethnic area policing. Opposition Members say that we must have an even-handed approach. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), who I am sure has gone off to the Gay Hussar or somewhere else, said that it was vital that we had ethnic area policing and that it must be even-handed. I could not agree more. But then I wonder why on television this week policemen who police Brixton said that they could not make an arrest or take action because it was a West Indian area and there might be some confusion or even a riot. The police said on television that they must be more careful policing those areas than others.

My next subject is the Notting Hill carnival. If I wanted a carnival in my constituency which blocked the streets for three or four days and caused mayhem, and at which there were drugs and where petty offences occurred, my police authority would tell me that I could not have it. But because we have a group of West Indians who live in that community they can block up the streets of Notting Hill for three or four days or as long as they like. The police on duty have been told by their senior officers to turn a blind eye to petty thieving and drug taking because otherwise problems may be caused.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Dicks: Constables were told, "If the girls want to dance, take your hat off and dance with them." In Hayes and Harlington that would not be allowed.

I, too, want even-handed policing. That means that if a crime is committed at Broadwater Farm, in St. Pauls in Bristol or in Brixton or anywhere else the police deal with it as a crime and treat the people involved as criminals, whether they are black, yellow, pink or blue. The vast majority of British people are sick and tired of listening to the begging and pleading for special consideration to be given to the ethnic minorities. Crime has to be prevented, and the sooner we have even-handed policing, the better. We must get down to this problem. We must examine the race laws and the intervention of the Commission for Racial Equality, which causes more trouble in race relations every day than most people cause in a lifetime.

Mr. Allen: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sorry, but as a new boy I must ask you whether it is in order for an hon. Member to attack other institutions in our society in this way. The hon. Gentleman may not care to discuss these points, and I do not blame him, but is he in order?

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): This is a very wide-ranging motion.

Mr. Dicks: For as long as I can remember, and for many years before, it has been a tradition in this House that an hon. Member has a right to say anything he likes within the rules of decency and the customs of the House. I have criticised the CRE both inside and outside the House and I shall continue to do so. For the reasons that I have suggested, the morale of the police in our inner cities is very low. They are sick and tired of having to waste their time walking up and down the streets of our cities and having their status undermined by so-called police monitoring groups—bags of Lefties who want to do nothing else in life but hammer the police. The police are sick and tired of having to behave in a different way in Brixton from the way in which they behave in Hayes and Harlington. Those considerations have to be taken on board, and the sooner we do something to protect ordinary people, whether black or white, the better.

1.23 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): That was one of the most scurrilous and racist speeches that it has been my misfortune to listen to for a very long time. The hon. Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) should look to himself and to his own past. Many Indian people in London remember his disgraceful record as chair of housing of his borough council. They remember how he threw homeless people into taxis and sent them to the steps of the Foreign Office to show his contempt for homeless people and for people of different ethnic origins. His speech was a disgrace to himself and to this House——

Mr. Allen: And to his party.

Mr. Corbyn: Yes, to his party, too, although plenty of people in his party probably agree with him.

In the hon. Gentleman's speech I detected the seeds of something far more sinister than the nasty prejudices for which he is well known. His speech seemed to contain the seeds of a movement to ban free speech and the freedom to demonstrate one's political opinions in the capital. It suggested a discriminatory policy of preventing people of different cultures from taking part in cultural activities in our capital city. His party should examine carefully the speeches that he makes and the attitudes that he wants to bring to this Chamber. I am glad to see that he has now left the Chamber.

This debate is about policing the inner cities and the subject must be considered in the context of the lives of people in inner-city areas. The area that I represent is very much an inner-city area. It is poor and we have well over 20 per cent. registered unemployment. The poverty is enormous. About one third of the electors in my constituency depend on pensions or state benefits. We have a very high crime rate, and the clear-up rate is comparable to that in the rest of the metropolitan area. We have problems of attacks on the person, sexual and racial assaults, but also crimes against property — theft, burglary and damage to property. Insurance rates are very high. Indeed, in some parts of my constituency people who have had several break-ins find it almost impossible to get insurance for their goods and property. High crime rates affect the poorest people in the poorest parts of the country and that is why we are particularly concerned about them.

I read with interest the report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. We must examine these matters carefully in the context of the clear-up rate of offences recorded by the Metropolitan police. According to Home Office figures, in 1986, there were 20,000 recorded cases of violence against the person; only 9,950 were cleared up. By the standards of the Metropolitan police, that is a fairly high clear-up rate. The police recorded 3,800 offences of sexual assault; 1,933 were cleared up. They recorded 16,000 offences of robbery, of which 1,900 were cleared up. There were 157,000 cases of burglary, only 16,000 of which were cleared up. These are staggering figures. For theft and handling of stolen goods, 413,000 cases were recorded and only 61,000 were cleared up. The clear-up rate is extremely low by any standards.

The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis frequently appears on television saying that he needs more manpower. I wish that he would not use that term, because we want to see more women constables as well as male constables in the police. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) said, increased manpower is not the solution to the problem. Merely increasing manpower, as the Metropolitan police have done consistently, has not increased the clear-up rate or reduced the rate of crime—apart from some marginal changes year-on-year. People may be surprised to know that the force establishment of 27,515 is an increase on the figure of 10 years ago, and in most years the force has been very near to total establishment. The police seem to wish to increase their establishment instead of considering more carefully the causes of crime in London.

I wish to draw attention to some areas where the police have a clear influence and where their advice and recommendations have had an effect. The number of violent crimes in London is related to the availability of knives and other weapons and to the issuing of firearms and shotgun certificates. There is a growing trend of people wanting to open firearms shops. We have discussed the matter with the Home Office, and delegations have met the Minister concerned to express their anxiety.

Someone who wishes to open a gun shop in an inner urban area of London cannot possibly say that the guns will have a legitimate sporting use anywhere in the area. Nowhere in my borough would it be remotely safe to use a gun for any purpose, because it is too densely populated. Indeed, there are only 180 acres of open space in a borough with a population of 186,000. It cannot be safe to sell guns there, and the same applies to neighbouring boroughs. Yet the number of firearms certificates held in the Greater London area increased from 8,957 in 1985 to 9,084 in 1986. The number of current certificates for shotguns increased from 37,147 to 41,814. There has been a slight decline in the numberr of registered firearms dealers from 288 to 287, but I suspect that that has more to do with the reduction in the number of arms fairs during the year than with a reduction in the number of dealers who are selling arms. Any examination of the cause of crime in London must consider the availability of guns, shotguns and weapons such as knives that can be used in offensive attacks.

I realise that there are great difficulties in controlling the sale of knives. Indeed, in some cases it is almost impossible to define the law in such a way as to prevent the sale of a particular type of knife. However, far more work and thought should be given to this matter, otherwise we shall see an outbreak of violent crime, using knives and the like, in the inner urban areas, which will make life difficult for the residents of those areas. The victims of such violence will suffer horrendously.

The police force in London was established in the early part of the 19th century. Since then, there has been little democratic control over that police force. Indeed, the only opportunity available to the elected representatives of the people of London to make any comments about the role of the police force in London is the annual debate on the policing of the metropolis. I understand that that debate will not take place until the autumn. That is not a satisfactory situation by any stretch of the imagination.

The Metropolitan police force is not a small body spending a small amount of money. It has a total expenditure of nearly £1 billion—£925 million in the current financial year. Of that total, £530 million comes from the Government and about £228 million from the ratepayers of London.

Hon. Members representing London strongly criticised the suggestion that there should be super policing arrangements—large police divisions in London. In the debates of the past two years, we made the specific criticism that we thought the inner-city areas of London would be treated as areas of frontier policing. The main head offices of the new divisional commanders would be set outside those inner-city areas. All those command posts of the divisional police forces, with one exception, have been established well away from the inner urban areas. The police headquarters for my constituency are situated in Chigwell, in Essex. From a social point of view that area could not be more different from the area of Finsbury park.

I strongly believe that we should change the structure of the Metropolitan police so that it is more localised. Above all, we should make the police force in London far more accountable.

The Greater London Council was destroyed by this Government because they did not like the proposals that the GLC put forward and the way it attempted to work on behalf of Londoners nor the elected representatives of the GLC. Every elected council that has elected Labour councillors in the majority and has sought to carry out the policies that were advocated, openly and freely, in democratic elections, have been rate-capped and had their powers severely curtailed. In London, more so than in any other part of the country, we have seen the centralisation of power. Power has been taken away from the people of London and put in the hands of the Government. In that context, it is even more important to consider the democratic accountability of the police force.

We should also consider the legislation that has gone through the House in the past five years and significantly increased the powers of the police—for example, the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and the Public Order Act 1986. Those Acts, together with the Government's refusal to allow a Bill that sought to make racial harassment and racial crime a criminal offence, have illustrated that the balance of power has been taken from the people of London and given to the Government. That is one of the main reasons why I argue strongly for an elected police authority for London.

What response has the Home Office given to the London Strategic Policy Unit policy document by the police monitoring and research group on police accountability? I know that the Minister has already spoken, but I am sure that he could write to me about this. The policy document said:

"The Police Committee of the strategic authority would have the following powers and duties: to appoint and dismiss the Commissioner of Police . . . to give directions 'for the more efficient administration of the police', to give directions concerning the establishment of the Metropolitan Police, to approve police orders and regulations made by the Commissioner, to appoint the Receiver of Police and civilian heads of departments, to give directions to the Receiver of Police concerning police fund receipts . . . and a duty to keep itself informed as to the working of the police complaints system"— as per the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

The borough police committees, which would be for a more local area, would be involved in approving the appointment of borough commanders, approving orders and regulations on matters related solely to the borough, and being consulted by and advising the police committee of the strategic authority on policy matters of a London-wide nature. They would also require the borough commander to provide information and reports on any issue related to local policing, and be consulted on the Metropolitan police budget; they would oversee the general nature of complaints made in the borough and make arrangements for obtaining the views of the community concerning policing within that area, under part of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

The Government's continual attacks on labour-controlled local authorities that have tried to set up an elected police authority come ill from a Government who are so hell-bent on centralising everything around themselves. The issue of centralisation of power is important and serious. The Government's cheap attacks on labour-controlled authorities do them no good. My own borough, for example, has worked extremely hard to reduce the crime rate in its area. It has worked hard on security in council estates, on the design of council estates, on giving advice on crime prevention and on how to follow up on crime. There is no way in which our borough council, or any other, supports crime; quite the opposite. It is the poorest people in the poorest parts of the inner-urban areas who suffer the most from that sort of crime. The policing direction of London is not helping the worst-off people of London. There seems to be an obsession within the police force with high-technology policing; incredible amounts of money are being spent on the police air arm, for example, and on high-technology radio equipment, and far less emphasis is placed on the day-to-day concerns of ordinary people and the crimes from which they suffer.

When the Minister thinks about all this afterwards, I hope that he will have a thought not only for the role of policing in the inner-urban areas but for the relationship between the police and the local community. If the police want the support and co-operation of the local community, is it really necessary for thousands of stop-and-search operations to be carried out, as they are all around London—the type of policing that is being conducted in All Saints street now, and that takes place regularly in parts of Haringey and Islington? Regular stop-and-search operations are carried out there, with all the intimidation implicit in them. That is not a recipe for solving crime or for good community relations. The best contribution to good relations between the police and the community would be a democratically accountable police force in London, with the people being able to elect their own police authority.

I ask the Minister to respond to another document produced by the London Strategic Policy Unit, which gives an account of the policing of the Wapping print dispute during the time of the strike—or, rather, the lock-out of people from the News International plant in east London.

Mr. Tredinnick: The hon. Gentleman was right the first time.

Mr. Corbyn: The document concerns the police methods of operation that were used there. I was at the Wapping plant on many occasions during that year-long dispute and I witnessed the sort of violence that went on. I witnessed times when the police were lined up in ranks, as in a medieval battle. If the hon. Member for Bosworth (Mr. Tredinnick) finds that amusing, perhaps he has come to the wrong place. The front line of police consisted of officers with riot shields. They would separate, and snatch squads would rush from behind the line through the gap that had formed, into the crowd, and start picking people out. They would then separate out to the right and left and a new gap would open up, through which police officers would charge with truncheons flailing. People were seriously hurt and injured in those disputes on many occasions. All of that was filmed by police cameras high on the surrounding buildings and thousands of police were involved. That print plant was partly paid for by the people of London. Rupert Murdoch is not paying rates because the plant is in an enterprise zone. Workers were being thrown out of their jobs and the cowboy tactics of Rupert Murdoch were protected by the Metropolitan police who were present in huge numbers and perpetrated appalling violence during that dispute.

The Minister knows perfectly well the number of occasions during which representatives of the print unions met the police to discuss policing methods. On occasion they reached agreement about communications, but it became obvious to any of us at the Wapping plant on any of the Saturday evenings, or, indeed, on any of the other evenings, that many of the police officers were out of the control of their commanders. They were doing what they wanted to do and using the most appalling and indiscriminate violence against people who were there peacefully to protest about the loss of jobs and the destruction of the industrial economy of Britain.

The people of London expect better than yah boo sucks politics from a Minister who does not represent a London constituency and from a police authority for London that does not have a London Member. They expect some accountability from that police force. The people in the poorer inner-urban areas of London suffer most from high rates of crime and they need and expect a democratically accountable police force. There has been an unaccountable and undemocratic police force since 1829, and it is time for that to stop.

Mr. David Gilroy Bevan (Birmingham, Yardley): I should like to add my voice in praise of the maiden speeches of my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) and for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs). They made excellent contributions, especially my hon. Friend the Member for Wyre Forest. I had the honour to serve for the same ward for which my hon. Friend currently serves in Birmingham, Moseley. He still makes a tremendous effort and expends a great deal of energy trying to solve inner-city education problems.

I am delighted that my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) called this debate. I was staggered and surprised by some of the speeches by Opposition Members, especially the speech by the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng), who seemed to want to do nothing other than cast aspersions on the grandfather of my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme. My hon. Friend's grandfather had nothing else in mind but to back law and order in the Sidney street siege. My hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme also backs law and order. Other Opposition contributions showed a marked dislike of the police.

The speech by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) evokes the response that of course we condemn the actions of a rogue police commando. Everybody condemns such things, because they are extremely regrettable. However, we are pleased that in the British system such things happen very infrequently. As the commissioner for administration said on the radio this morning, it is difficult to know where else to look in convening a court of inquiry than to the training and resources of the police who are specifically dedicated to these purposes.

In highlighting the policing requirements of inner cities, one has to note the differences between different areas not even as far apart as Northumberland and London. They are not even as far apart as Sparkbrook and Solihull, as the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said. They can be close enough to be in the same police division. In Birmingham, Yardley the E division has three sub-divisions with totally different problems, though all have inner-city problems. One sub-division has large estates, both council and private, and fairly low unemployment. In the second sub-division there is older property, higher unemployment and more dereliction. In the third division, in the constituency of the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, there is an almost unique problem, because the majority of the population are immigrants. That produces a different type and intensity of crime. There is nothing racist in my remarks.

We have had to try to adapt and deploy a police force whose levels of manpower have remained static to an ever-increasing crime rate. The last available statistics are from 1986, but there is another league table with which crimes can be associated, the table of notifiable offences. In the metropolitan district — these are the latest comparable statistics frm 1985 — there were 732,559 notifiable offences. In Greater Manchester and Davyhulme there were 289,948 notifiable offences and in the west midlands there were 243,712. Those notifiable offences bear evidence to the fact that crime in the Manchester and west midlands areas compares favourably with the demand that is thrown up in the Metropolitan division of London. Regrettably, the police facilities and amenities are not the same. In 1981-82 they increased by 12 per cent., by 8 per cent. in 1983-84 and by 10 per cent. in 1985-86. In 1986 more than 250,000 offences were committed in the west midlands. The detection rate rose to more than 30 per cent., which is not a bad achievement, bearing in mind the available facilities.

Crimes that increased in my area were headed by dwelling house burglaries, which rose by 15 per cent. Theft from vehicles, which is a new form known as auto-crime, rose by 25 per cent.; criminal damage rose by 12 per cent.; aggravated burglary rose by 27 per cent.; and wounding rose by 5 per cent. The figures for wounding by knife are not given separately in the statistics. I hope that the Minister's earlier response does not demonstrate that our contributions will be considered at a subsequent date. The figures for wounding by knife cannot be evaluated. But surely there must be a case for a statutory punishment for a crime of this nature when it is on the increase. It commends itself to such treatment.

Other types of crime in the west midlands dropped during that period. Theft decreased by 19 per cent. Murder decreased slightly. Some 40 murders were committed during that period. In my division there were six murders, one of which regrettably has remained unsolved, as did an earlier murder.

The complexity, dimension and type of crime vary, as must the police response, from area to area.

The kind of crime manifestly evinced in the centre of Birmingham today involves predominantly juveniles going into the city centre to enjoy the "fun pubs" and nightclubs. At what is colloquially known a "throwing-out time" a type of violence is produced which demands a new form of police presence and back-up. That may have been the kind of operational unit involved in Islington. There is a clear case for at least 1,000 more operational uniformed police to be made available in the west midlands. Indeed, a year or two ago a case was made for some 7,200, but that figure has never been approached.

There are new types of crime such as that highlighted recently on west midlands radio. That case concerned the import from America of what I submit is a new type of firearm, although it may not be classified as such. The "stun gun" is apparently capable of delivering shocks of some 40,000 volts and paralysing people for at least 15 minutes. This weapon, imported by a northern Welsh gun shop, luckily remains undistributed, having been impounded in the Customs shed. I trust that that weapon will be classified appropriately and banned permanently. Weapons of that kind can only lead to further muggings, violence, rape and criminal abuse. I hope that they will be sent back to the country of origin. In the meantime, I suggest to the Home Secretary that he should consider carefully into which category such weapons are placed and thus the way in which the law will deal with them.

In relation to the different levels of crime, I draw attention to a statement made the day before yesterday and reported in the Birmingham Evening Mail. It comes from an individual who was one of the principal officers responsible for the introduction of unit beat policing in Handsworth. That officer said

"the gap between police and the Black community appears to have widened."

That statement was made in his capacity as the area liaison panel chairman on the community relations council. In my view, it was a most frightening and unwise statement. He continued:

"A community policeman is much less likely to have bricks thrown at him if he regularly visits the youth clubs in his area. If he is in riot gear, however, he is a prime target for a brick."

The morning after the Handsworth riots I was present when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary visited the area. My right hon. Friend was not in riot gear, but he was assailed by bricks.

The officer who made the statement that I have quoted had been primarily responsible prior to the riots for seeing that the prosecution of crime went ahead, but he dealt with it in such a soft manner that Handsworth almost became a no-go area in terms of the detection and punishment of crime. Regrettably, that allowed the mammoth increase in drug trafficking to continue. In 1986, trafficking in the west midlands increased by 50 per cent. for heroin, 100 per cent. for amphetamines and 900 per cent. for cannabis. In one arrest that year 2 kg of heroin were found, worth £1 million. The day before yesterday in my constituency £75,000 worth of cocaine was turned up by the police. There were five arrests.

There must be no no-go areas or differentiation in the policing applied to immigration or other areas. That would be counter-productive and would give rise to matters such as the rioting that took place in the past. We must impress upon people the necessity for making the punishment fit the crime. Therefore, I plead not only for the extra police who are needed in the west midlands, in uniform branches, in cadet training, in special constabulary, and in extra community watch schemes, excellent though the first 24 were in 1956 before their extension. I further plead for photograph identity cards that will protect the innocent and that only the guilty would have reason to fear. It could become a powerful weapon that the forces of law and order can use in the prevention and detection of crime in the inner cities.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): This important debate, if it has proved anything, has proved that the Conservative party has forfeited the title "the party of law and order", if only because of the tremendous statistical contribution in the more serious part of the speech of the hon. Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill). The 1979-83 Government had the worst crime record of any Government since the war. Being an enlightened population, the British people gave the offenders yet another term in office to see whether the Government could do any better. Unfortunately, their record in 1983-87 was worse than it was in 1979-83. I hope that from 1987 onwards such recidivism will diminish and that the Government will bring about a society in which people can walk freely in any part of our cities, and our inner cities in particular.

Unfortunately, the record does not bear close examination. From 1979 onwards, inner-city riots began to develop as a feature of our society. Offences of all kinds were up by 41 per cent. and violent crime increased on average by 42 per cent. a year. There was a 52 per cent. increase in burglaries, and that was overtaken by a 73 per cent. increase in the incidence of vandalism and criminal damage. Unfortunately, that trend is broken by only one downward statistic, and that is the clear-up rate. Two out of every three crimes are never cleared up, and the offenders get away scot-free.

I was interested to hear the contribution of the hon. Member for Birmingham, Yardley (Mr. Bevan). He referred to new crimes, such as the possession of stun guns, and so on. One new crime that is occurring in ever greater numbers under the Government is insider dealing in the City of London. The no-go area of financial crime is slowly being broken down. Even the Government now recognise insider dealing as a criminal offence.

The hon. Member for Davyhulme did an exceptional job as prosecuting counsel against his own Government and their record. His belief that is a contradiction of his earlier contribution. Those words were a direct quotation from the 1983 Conservative party manifesto. Conservative Members should consider those words and the statistics for crime carefully before making any pronouncements in the Chamber.

There is a fundamental flaw in the Conservative party's philosophy on law and order — it is narrow and concentrates on only one aspect of law and order. It is not so much about fighting and preventing crime as about what is to be done about alleged criminals and how long they must serve. The Conservative plan is to send more people to prison. The Home Secretary's statistics show that 58 per cent. of convicted criminals who are sentenced to three months imprisonment or more are back inside prison within two years. They show that 69 per cent. of young offenders taken into custody become recidivists and go back to prison.

[Mr. Graham Allen]

The Conservative philosophy is narrow. It relies essentially on the emotional feelings that we all have towards those who commit crime. The popularism with which Conservatives treat the issue might be beneficial electorally, but I am afraid that it does nothing, as we have seen, to reduce the crime statistics. It might make Conservative Members feel better, but it brings no comfort to the victims of crime and no succour to future victims of an ever-rising crime wave.

Conservatives treat the symptoms and present their view of law and order without tackling the causes that generate the illness. Specific Tory policies will make many types of crime more likely and weaken the community in its fight against crime.

Let us imagine how a perverse mind might devise a society in which crime would breed. To create that society we would abolish those things which support our community and which immunise and inoculate vast numbers of people against the temptations of crime. We might take away £20 billion in rate support grant, housing subsidy and other grants to local communities. That would stir the pot and encourage crime.

If we wanted to stoke up the crime wave, we would cut housing investment for local communities perhaps by two thirds in eight or nine years. We would throw in the slashing of public transport and reduce spending on health, education, pensons, child benefit and social security. That would give us the prime cocktail that would encourage crime. That is the Government's record. That is what Tory Members have supported night after night in the Lobbies since 1979. They have produced, not the economic climate which Conservatives so often mention, but the social climate in which crime can take root and flourish.

Local authorities are another example. They are denied sufficient resources adequately to light streets and ensure that dark corners on housing estates are illuminated. Housing cuts mean that individuals are forced to live in a place where they do not want to live and where the environment is not conducive to a better way of life.

On the Crabtree estate in my constituency it looks as though some mad experiment has taken place to design an environment to promote crime. That the majority of the people on that estate are law abiding, although they are the victims of crime—as the poor are so often in our society — is a great tribute to them. Cuts in spending and ceilings imposed on local authorities, notably the city council in Nottingham, means fewer caretakers, port-keepers and attendants to look after those public places where the incidence of graffiti and vandalism can grow. It means longer periods before graffiti and vandalised phone booths can be remedied. It means tht the whole tone of an area degenerates.

That is the reality of the policies of the Conservative Government — they affect the environment in which crime can breed. When public transport is reduced, that, too, contributes to increasing crime. It means more people waiting around at isolated bus stops and stations, where they are targets for harassment and crime. Women in particular suffer when public transport is reduced. For those fortunate enough, it also means that more people use their own transport. That means more cars left unattended in dark places at night, and, again in Nottingham, a vast increase in the rise of autotheft and autocrime.

It is not an apocryphal tale. We all say of either our own generation or of a previous generation that when we were young we could leave the doors to our houses open. In tough and hard areas of Nottingham, such as the Hyson Green area, where my family came from, that was always the case. In Stepney, where I was a councillor and chairman of the police committee, people say exactly the same, that they could walk out of the door and leave it open. They could do that because there was community spirit, because people looked after each other, because people were not isolated and because they made their community from the environment. Unfortunately, everything that the Conservative party has done has reduced that community spirit, increased individualism and isolation and thereby created a breeding ground for crime.

Those in our society without a secure and established place may see little reason to work with the rest of the community against crime. We must give them hope and a desire to be a part of and to work with the rest of the community. Nowhere is that more pressing than in crimes against children, which is one of the more horrendous crimes in the inner city. Each year 50 to 60 children die at the hands of their parents. Hundreds of children are physically injured by people close to them. One child in every 10 is sexually assaulted and three out of four assaults on children are committed by someone who knows the child.

I am speaking generally quite deliberately, because it is deplorable that certain Members in the House over the past few weeks have used the issue to enhance their personal publicity, if not their reputations. The present level of violence against children is a threat not only to the present generation but to future generations. Child abusers often tend to be people who suffered child abuse. People who are violent towards their families often come from violent families.

Just as the Conservative party has lost its title of the party of law and order, so it has lost the title of the party of the family. Policies for the family need more than just moral outrage when particular incidents occur. Policies for the family should bolster jobs, give adequate housing and be effective in meeting people's needs, be they for benefits for social security or public services that reduce the stress in family situations that contributes to crime and child abuse.

Practical policies for the family to end crimes against children are far more important than cashing in on the consequences of those crimes for party political purposes. Those policies should include giving all children aged three or four the chance of nursery education. It may be that the Conservative party would prefer another halfpenny or penny off income tax, but there is a different way in which the Government can exercise their responsibility.

They should ensure that children under the age of three have better access to good quality child care and provide parents with more financial support through increased child benefit and one-parent benefit. There should be greater practical help for parents in caring for their children from the community and the Health Service, including safe play facilities. There should be measures to ensure, perhaps expensively, but essentially for the well-being of our society, that children can be taught how to protect themselves from physical attack and sexual abuse.

by including child assault prevention techniques in the school curriculum. We should encourage telephone hotlines for abused children.

Crimes against children are the most heartrending crimes in the inner city and elsewhere and we must take action to ensure that the incidence of them is reduced. We should encourage discussion between local education authorities, teachers and the police about the appropriate relationship between the police and schools, with the aim of developing young people's understanding of the law, respect for the rights and duties of individuals and trust for the police. The police must earn that trust through their policies and practices to both children and the community. That, in my view, is where there is a clear distinction between a police service and a police force. We should ensure that the police work more closely with social workers in cases of child abuse and ensure that they are given special training in interviewing child victims.

A permanent advisory committee drawn from all agencies responsible for children should be set up to advise on further measure so improve the safety and welfare of children. We can all benefit by looking at the Scottish model, the children's panel, especially in individual child abuse cases. That panel is responsible for bringing together the professionals and making a proper assessment.

Without such policies, covering not just crime against children, but crimes across the board, the Government will continue to create the breeding ground for crime. They will not be directly responsible for individual criminals, but they will create the background and climate in which crime will flourish. Conservative Members cannot hide from their responsibility. Crime has its roots in our society. When confrontation is deliberately provoked, bitterness is stirred up and envy is aroused, and when more and more people are frustrated, living without hope and made to feel that society has rejected them, crimes of every sort are more likely to be permitted. We must give those people hope for the future. We must give people the opportunity and will to work with the community, not against it.

Under the Tory Government there is little ground for hope. Their answer to lawlessness is to give extra powers to the police and to change public order law. However, new police powers and new laws on public order offer no hope to those in the inner cities, black and white, with no prospect of a job, no opportunity for training and no chance of a decent home.

The aim of the Labour party is to bring the community together to achieve a free and orderly society where the need for order is accompanied by tolerance of the right to express dissent within the law. That involves the police working with local people to reduce crime and to help its victims. It means ensuring that people protect the lives and property of all other people and that the police uphold our liberty and are more integrated within the framework of democracy and the life of the community. Our aim is to make all of us partners against crime.

2.14 pm

Mr. John Wheeler (Westminster, North): In the closing moments of this debate, I am glad to have the opportunity to say a few words about this subject. However, before I do so, I offer my congratulations to my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler) and for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), who made superb maiden speeches and contributed some telling and worthwhile points. I should like to thank and congratulate also my hon. Friend the Member for Davyhulme (Mr. Churchill) for choosing this subject and enabling us to have this debate. I hope, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that, when I sit down, my hon. Friend will catch your eye so that he may make some closing remarks.

We have heard much from Opposition Members about their wish to see what they call a democratically-elected police authority in the Metropolitan police area. I have rarely heard more arrant nonsense about that subject than this morning. One would not have thought that there had been a general election only a month ago or that the Conservative party holds 58 of the parliamentary constituencies in London, with a mere 23 Socialist seats, many of which are marginals and will no doubt fall to us in the early 1990s. I remind the House that the Metropolitan police area extends beyond the area of the 32 London boroughs and includes nine outer districts, so that there are no fewer than 67 Conservative Members of Parliament representing constituencies that fall within the Metropolitan police area. To suggest that it would be possible to create what Opposition Members call an elected authority for such a large area is irrelevant and unnecessary. Indeed, my 66 right hon. and hon. Friends who represent those constituencies have no wish for that and are perfectly satisfied with the special arrangements that exist for the police authority in the Metropolitan police area and with our relationship with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary.

We have discussed police resources. I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Grantham (Mr. Hogg), speaking for the Government, has made it clear that resources will be made available to the police when there is a valid and sensible reason for them. However, he also made it clear that the random and uniform patrolling by police officers will not have any influence on the reduction of the great mass of crime. He is absolutely right—it will not. As we know, at least 96 per cent. of recorded crime is against property; for example, motor vehicle or auto crime is committed against private property. Such crimes must be prevented by a crime prevention strategy. I endorse and support entirely my hon. Friend's comments about the Government's plans and intentions for that.

Both Labour and Conservative local authorities are increasingly beginning to prevent property crime. My own authority, the city of Westminster, ever innovative, has spent substantial sums of money—nearly £1·5 million during recent years—on fencing for its council estates, on security packages to improve lighting, on entry phones, on warden-call systems to protect the elderly and on the abolition of walkways. One of the most important keys to preventing this mass of opportunistic property crime is to allow people to occupy property which they control and over which they have influence. I am glad that local authorities throughout the country are beginning to do that.

I should like to speak briefly about armed robberies and guns. We shall not prevent armed robberies by having a firearms amnesty. That is attractive, and will bring people's unwanted firearms out of their homes. Although that may be a good thing, it will certainly not reduce the incidence of armed robberies. That involves detection officers in the boring, painstaking task of spending a great deal of time in pubs and clubs, collecting intelligence and information and putting it together to enable arrests to be made when these terrible crimes are about to be committed. There is no alternative to that.

I do not believe that we can have any influence over the control of armed robberies by introducing an extensive licensing system for shotguns. No armed criminal would find that a threat or a difficulty to overcome. It would take the time of the police in establishing yet another bureaucracy which is unwanted.

That leads me to make a quick point about the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. That Act was important to define the powers and responsibilities of the police and to ensure a balance of accountability. We have heard in the debate how some hon. Members wish to see the police made accountable. The Act achieves that balance and it can be irksome to the police in their work. Nevertheless, accountability requires some form of structure and control.

I would be much more comforted if the Opposition would abandon entirely their attack on the police which we see going on in many places. The Manchester area has "Police Watch". We saw what happened during the Wapping dispute and the miners' strike. At least nine of the Left-wing London boroughs continue to fund, through ratepayers' pockets, "Policing London". The latest edition for July and August has just come out and is yet another stream of attacks on the police as an institution. That does nothing to create or encourage a climate of opinion among the public towards crime prevention which is what we all want and what the most reasoned voices on both side seek to achieve.

The fear of crime is a concern and is partly met by uniformed police officers patrolling. To that extent, we all welcome the presence of the police on the beat. I hope that the police will be more selective in the use of their resources. We could suggest to the police that they should abandon using extensive police resources over many hundreds of hours to prosecute elderly ladies in Notting Hill who provide remarkable services for gentlemen who visit their property. I do not understand who the victim of that crime was. Apart from entertaining the nation at their breakfast tables in the morning as they read their daily newspapers, I fail to see what advantage there is to the public. I would prefer to see those police resources rededicated to street patrols and the investigation of armed robberies as I have described.

Sometimes the police fail to make the best use of their resources. We want to be constructively critical about the use of police time and resources and I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will bear that point in mind when he next meets the Commissioner and his senior officers.

I know that other hon. Members wish to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. We are at the end of a debate which has been useful and we have all profited from it.

2.23 pm

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I am grateful for the opportunity of catching your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, at the end of this debate because I spent three years at Oxford university researching the problems of policing ethnic minorities in Britain and of their relations with the police. I am watching the clock the whole time and I shall be brief.

Opposition Members, especially the hon. Members for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), have blamed the Government for the increase in crime. That is incorrect. We would have had that crime increase anyway. I have consulted figures in the Library and calculated the growth rate in recorded crime in 14 major industrial countries. The figures show that the number of offences—usually serious offences—recorded in the national statistics for England, Wales and Scotland lies somewhere in the middle. The growth in crime since 1980 is in the middle of that range and the growth of crime in the 1970s is recorded as being very much the same.

For example, the annual average percentage increase in crime from 1970 to 1980 was 4·9. The growth rate was much higher in other industrialised countries. In Canada it was 6·3 per cent., in France 7·5 per cent., in southern Ireland 9 per cent., and in the Netherlands 10·3 per cent. It makes no sense at all to blame the Government for the increase in crime.

Although there has been a general increase in crime in the United Kingdom, under the Conservative Government crimes of violence have increased more slowly than under the Labour Government. Between 1979 and 1986 crimes against the person increased by 32 per cent., but during the previous Labour Administration they increased by 49 per cent. That suggests that the Government's extensive measures have had an effect in contrast to the policies and inaction of previous Labour Governments. In particular, I refer to the introduction of panda cars for the police under Roy Jenkins in the 1960s which caused tremendous problems. Secondly, the previous Labour Government ran down the police force so that we were 7,000 men short when we came to power, and that, too, caused enormous problems. The introduction of panda cars made the police much more remote from the people they serve. My wife has had an ex-panda car—a Morris Minor—for 15 years and it is a wonderful car. All that we have ever had to do is to take the blue flashing light off the top! I only wish that the policing system at that time had been as good as the car.

I had intended to speak on the subject of police consultative procedures and accountability, but unfortunately time does not permit it. However, the Opposition's claim that the police are not accountable is absolute nonsense.

In conclusion, I must say, with some regret, that to me the Opposition seem to want to put the handcuffs on the police and not on the criminal.

2.29 pm

Mr. Churchill: We have heard three excellent maiden speeches. I warmly congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick), for Wyre Forest (Mr. Coombs), and for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler), whom I welcome as my immediate political neighbour on the banks of the Manchester ship canal. My hon. Friends have made a valuable contribution to our debate and the House will look forward to hearing from them in the years ahead.

I thank my hon. Friends for supporting me today and I thank Opposition Members for taking part in this lively and, I venture to say, worthwhile debate on a very important topic. I am especially grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for his reply and for undertaking carefully to consider the points that I have made. I ask him to explore with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary the basis on which the authorised police manpower strengths are arrived at for the various police forces. It is not sufficient to rely on the relationship between the number of police, on the one hand, and the size of population, on the other. We should move towards a closer relationship between police strengths and the numbers of crimes committed.

The Government must tackle crime in the inner cities with new vigour and determination. I do not suggest that more police manpower is the only solution to crime in the inner cities, but it must be a key element in the regeneration of the fabric of society in the decaying inner cities, where we are trying—this is warmly applauded in the country—to bring new life to housing, enterprise and employment——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, notwithstanding the practice of the House as to the intervals between stages of Bills brought in upon Ways and Means Resolutions, more than one stage of the Finance Bill may be taken at any sitting of the House.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

DARTFORD-THURROCK CROSSING BILL

Ordered,

That Mr. Adam Ingram be discharged from the Select Committee on the Dartford-Thurrock Crossing Bill and that Mr. George Galloway be added to the Committee.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

Legal Profession

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Peter Lloyd.]

2.30 pm

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): I am grateful for this opportunity to do something that barrister Members of Parliament seldom do in this place, and that is to speak up in defence of an honourable professional system that is often attacked, unfairly, as an outdated and inefficient way of delivering legal services to those who need them. I can do that because the House today is not full of the usual jeering jesters who derive from Jack Cade's rebellion in the middle ages the belief that all lawyers should be hanged—and certainly that none of them should be elected to Parliament. When those very colleagues need our help, it is remarkable how quickly their tune changes.

Coolly and calmly and, I hope, intelligently and briefly, I shall state the case for maintaining the separation of the barrister and solicitor branches of the legal profession. I trust that I shall secure in reply the clear commitment of the Government to the maintenance of that separated system.

The demand by solicitors for their right of audience to be extended from magistrates courts, county courts, tribunals and matrimonial hearings in chambers in the High Court, to the Crown court, the open High Court, the Chancery court and the Courts of Appeal has nothing necessarily to do with the call for a fused legal profession and is too often confused with that call. Whatever the rights and wrongs of the case for extending the right of audience, it is difficult to think of any serious defect in the operation of our legal system which would be cured by the fusion of the barrister's profession with that of the solicitor's.

First, let us consider the accusation of high legal costs. A barrister is like a taxi driver. Like the taxi driver on the cab rank, the barrister who stays in his chambers waiting to be booked for a case by a solicitor, can be booked for service by whichever solicitor wants him whenever he is available. The analogy illustrates why the Bar usually provides a cheaper service than do solicitors. Unless one is a commercial traveller, it is usually cheaper to take a taxi than to run a car full-time. As with a taxi, one pays for a barrister only when one needs him, and one pays for a service which usually has much lower overheads. For, like the taxi driver, the experienced barrister knows the quickest, most efficient and, therefore cheapest route to his destination.

If one went into any Bar law library, one would see young men with first-class honours degrees preparing legal arguments for a fraction of the price that they would charge if they were junior partners in a firm of solicitors. So even where solicitors do have the right of audience, they usually brief a barrister to do the work. Perhaps the most startling achnowledgment of the comparative cheapness of the Bar can be seen in the fees being offered for court work by the new Crown Prosecution Service in London. Solicitors were to receive £250 a day for magistrates' court work. The Bar asked for £150 and, I believe, received £95 for exactly the same work. I would be grateful if my right hon. and learned friend the Attorney-General could give me any update on those figures. One has to conclude that the allegation that fusion would be cheaper is ill-founded.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I was interested in the analogy that the hon. and learned Gentleman made between a barrister and a taxi driver. What will happen to those who can only afford public transport, notably the vast majority of people who find barristers' and solicitors' fees expensive and who depend upon legal aid and advice centres?

Mr. Lawrence: If such people depend upon legal aid, they can go to solicitors or barristers on legal aid. They can also go to advice centres, and the Government have been most active in helping to establish advice centres in those areas of the country where they are needed. I shall come back to this matter if the hon. Gentleman is worried about it.

The second accusation that is often made concerning the existing system is that of legal delay. There are always barristers waiting on the taxi cab rank. Let us suppose that they left that cab rank to become part of a firm of solicitors. Would solicitors, whose trial lawyers were up to their necks in work, seek the advice of an advocacy specialist in a rival firm? Of course not. Given those circumstances, a case would not be dealt with any quicker. What would happen is that the solicitor would apply to postpone the court hearings and if it was granted, there would be more delay. Although delays occur at the moment with busy barristers, it happens rarely because applications to the court for a postponement to suit the barrister are frequently refused. If such an application by a solicitor was refused, it would mean that the solicitor who began the case would no more be able to follow that case through to the end than the barrister can now. The accusation that the present system does not always ensure that someone gets the advocate that he wants or started with would not be cured by the fusion of the professions.

As regards the trial, it is usually quicker and therefore cheaper to use the specialists waiting on the cab rank. The barrister working daily in the criminal courts is trained and experienced by constant practice in the law of evidence and the presentation of cases. The barrister, compared with the solicitor who may be an occasional advocate, inevitably becomes more efficient and wastes less time. The civil barrister becomes a faster and more efficient drafter of pleadings and negotiator of settlements. As the law becomes more complex and specialist, the value of the experienced barrister will grow.

The barrister also builds up a reputation with judges before whom he often appears. They trust him without the need to waste judicial time finding out whether he knows what he is doing. We can therefore afford to operate a system where our judges, starting in ignorance of the details of the case, are led through its intricacies by counsel in oral hearings. Such hearings continue without interruption until the judge's prompt and extemporary judgments are delivered.

Such trust springs not only from reputation, but from the detatchment and objectivity of counsel. That virtue of the system might well be lost where a solicitor becomes personally involved with the client. That would naturally tend to happen if a solicitor was concerned with the client's wills, divorces, conveyances or contracts over many years.

The United States has a fused system and judges there tell me that they cannot rely so often upon the skill of their advocates. As a result, evidence in those courts is more often documentary. Hearings are more protracted and interrupted for days at time while judges go over the arguments again. Judgments are more often reserved. One of the features of our system that is greatly admired by American lawyers is its speed, which is one direct result of the separation of the legal professions. No less an authority than Chief Justice Warren Berger highlighted the faults of the fused United States system and unashamedly preferred the British way.

Let us next consider the availability and quality of legal services, which will, perhaps, have some bearing on the point made by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). Almost two thirds of solicitors' firms have only one or two principals. On the cab rank analogy, any solicitor's firm, however small or far out in the country it may be, can brief the best advocate in the land. If Marshall Hall had been a partner in a firm of solicitors, how many other solicitors would have had access to him? The answer is none. Worse still, would not solicitors who were inexperienced in a particular branch of the law try to handle matters entirely themselves, rather than run the risk of losing a client? With a fused profession, how long would it be before the best firms of solicitors would be attracting the best counsel to join them? Large firms would inevitably grow larger and smaller firms would disappear because they could not compete. Those larger firms would tend to concentrate in the more prosperous parts of towns and cities and the run-down, inner-city areas, the small towns and villages—the places where advice centres are also so necessary — would lose their small, local solicitors. Solicitors are already growing considerably fewer in number in those parts, with the loss of the conveyancing work that resulted from a decision that the House inadvisedly took a short time ago. Therefore, legal advice would become far less personal and friendly; and it would become more expensive, as it would involve travelling to towns and cities to get anywhere near a solicitor. Fewer people would feel like seeking it. The inevitable result would be less access to the legal services than there is now.

Of course, mergers occur now and firms grow larger, but with fusion that would happen more often. The larger the firms, the less competition there would be, the higher the legal costs would be and the less well would the public be served by their lawyers. It is precisely because fusion would not bring about a service that would be cheaper, speedier, more available or of better quality—whatever the myth may be — that the public interest is better served by the separation of the two legal professions.

The Royal Commission on the provision of legal services and the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Abse v. Smith confirmed that conclusion. It is an open secret that some members of the Royal Commission started their work less sympathetic to the idea of the existing separated system than they were when they finished.

Of course, fusion works in some countries. It might work well enough in the United States, the remarks of Chief Justice Berger notwithstanding, or in Germany, France or Italy, but the whole systems of those countries are different. What suits the fabric of one country's legal system will not necessarily suit that of others. Even so, the elements of our system that are most admired by lawyers from those countries who visit Britain and observe how we proceed are the cheapness, speed, availability and the quality of the services that we provide.

I hope that no one will think that this conclusion is complacent. There is, as I have said, much that is wrong with our legal system. It is often too slow; legal advice is too seldom sought; too many guilty people are acquitted; and our court buildings are often a disgrace. Of course, steps must be taken by the Government and the legal profession to deal with those problems.

My case has been, I hope, shortly deployed. It has been that whatever steps ought effectively to be taken to improve the system, fusion of the solicitors' and barristers' branches is simply not one of them. I hope that I have convincingly made out that case and that the Government remain convinced of the case. I hope that my right hon. and learned Friend who graces the post of Attorney-General will confirm that the Government have no intention of interfering with the balance of a system that has served, and will continue to serve, the nation well.

2.45 pm

The Attorney-General (Sir Patrick Mayhew): I congratulate my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on securing an Adjournment debate on this extremely important subject. The structure of the legal profession must be such as to secure the efficient provision of high quality legal services for the public. The due administration of justice, and, therefore, in a democracy the preservation of freedom, depends upon a strong and independent legal profession.

Both branches of the profession are now working together on a committee which they have established jointly and which consists of six barristers, six solicitors and six lay persons, chaired by Lady Marre, to consider the future of the profession and to produce ideas for its development. The Government await with interest the report of the Marre committee. Meanwhile, I am glad to have this opportunity to outline on behalf of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor the Government's own perception of the professional framework that is necessary.

My hon. and learned Friend concentrated on the issue of freedom and referred to the recurring argument that the public interest would be better served if the two branches of the profession were to be amalgamated. There would then no longer be a division of function and of organisation between barristers and solicitors. He summarised the arguments that are principally advanced for fusion and subjected them to a stringently critical analysis. His conclusion that the public interest would be ill-served by fusion is in line, as he said, with the conclusion of the Royal Commission on legal services expressed in its report in 1979 which the Government accepted.

That commission, which was chaired by Sir Henry Benson, now Lord Benson, comprised a majority of lay members. That is important. It was established in 1977 to inquire into the provision of legal services in England, Wales and Northern Ireland. It also had to consider whether any changes were desirable in the public interest in the structure or organisation of the legal profession. The commission duly undertook the most comprehensive examination ever made of our legal services and of the arrangements for their provision. Arguably, its major recommendation was that the legal profession should continue to be organised in two branches, those of barristers and solicitors.

Representations to the commission had been made from a number of sources that fusion might avoid unnecessary duplication of work, might ensure that the client saw only one lawyer throughout the proceedings in which he was concerned and that that would be a general advantage. At the end of the day the commission attached greater weight to the factor that fusion would be more likely to lead to an unacceptable reduction in the number and distribution of smaller firms of solicitors—a point that my hon. and learned Friend forcibly made—and to the dispersal of the specialist service that is now provided by the Bar.

While it accepted that some saving of costs might accrue in smaller cases, the commission anticipated that the expense of litigation might turn out to be greater in the more substantial cases. Accordingly, the unanimous conclusion of its members was that it was in the public interest for the profession to remain organised in its two branches.

As to the issue of costs, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton adverted to the Crown Prosecution Service. It is true that solicitors who are employed as agents by the Crown Prosecution Service to prosecute in magistrates' courts are paid more than barristers, but that is not by a margin that is judged to be greater than the increased overheads that they must pay. That matter has been carefully assessed by the Treasury.

Mr. David Ashby (Leicestershire, North-West): Will my right hon. and learned Friend give an undertaking to review payments to the Bar for prosecution work if the resolution of the Inns of Court is passed that commercial rents should be paid on premises that are used by the Bar? In other words, barristers' costs will relate more closely to those of solicitors.

The Attorney-General: I take that point, which was well made by my hon. Friend. Remuneration for lawyers who do publicly funded work is kept under close review.

The conclusion of the Royal Commission was, as I have said, accepted by the Government in their response to the report. That opinion remains unchanged. The weight of evidence before the commission strongly suggested that a two-branch profession was more likely to secure the high standard of advocacy which is indispensable to the administration of justice, and the commission so concluded. The Government remain of the view that this consideration bears as much force today as it did in 1979. We have not seen evidence in the intervening eight years which persuades us that circumstances have now changed so as to lead us to revise our acceptance of the commission's conclusion with regard to fusion.

There is an important additional argument upon which my hon. and learned Friend touched. It regards the width of choice that is available. In a rather graphic illustration, he said that Marshall Hall would not be available to those other than clients of the firm of which he would have been a partner. The width of choice that is available to a solicitor on behalf of his client is an immensely important advantage that the present system provides to the lay client.

That brings me to the question of rights of audience. Here I part company with my hon. and learned Friend because I think that it is an issue that is related to the debate about fusion. The present position is that, in criminal proceedings, solicitors acting for a defendant have limited rights of audience in the Crown court, whereas they have unlimited rights of audience in magistrates' courts. Section 83 of the Supreme Court Act 1981 gave the Lord Chancellor power, in order to ensure that the public is adequately served, to extend solicitors' rights of audience, having had regard to any shortage of counsel in a particular area, to any rights of audience that were previously exercised by solicitors and to any other circumstances affecting the public interest.

It is against the background of considerations such as those that solicitors have, for many years, enjoyed wide rights of audience in the Crown court in Bodmin, where it is recognised that counsel are not readily available all the time. Solicitors also enjoy full rights of audience before a judge of the Crown court when he is sitting in chambers and before a High Court judge similarly. Section 4 of the Prosecution of Offences Act 1985, which set up the Crown Prosecution Service, gives the Lord Chancellor similar powers in respect of prosecution work, but the Government made it clear during the passage of that Act that they were not considering the question of any general extension of rights of audience, and that the new power would be used only to the same limited extent as that in the 1981 Act.

In its report, the Royal Commission pointed out that few solicitors had the experience in advocacy that was necessary to enable them to practise with wider rights of audience, and that the practising Bar was more than adequately equipped to meet the needs of the public. It recognised that the suggested extension of solicitors' rights of audience in the superior courts would involve considerable changes in the profession. The Royal Commission held that these would distract the profession from meeting the needs of the public for other services which solicitors could and should provide. The commission concluded accordingly that there was little sense in making a change which would put additional burdens on the solicitors' branch, which was already overloaded, and at the same time would erode the position of the Bar, in particular its junior members. The Government, in their response to the commission's report, accepted that conclusion. Moreover, in the recent White Paper on legal aid we reiterated that we did not intend to extend rights of audience in the Crown court. We do not at present see any reason to revise that decision, nor to give further consideration to extending solicitors' rights of audience in other areas.

It is right, however, that over the past few years each branch of the profession should have been looking closely at its organisation, and at the whole range of its professional practices, to see where its service to the public could be improved. That has been done, and to good effect in that reforms within each branch have resulted which are aimed at producing a speedier, more cost effective and more proficient service to clients.

Both branches of the profession have improved their arrangements for the recruitment and training of new members. The Law Society has introduced a programme of continuing education under which all solicitors admitted after August 1985 are obliged to attend training courses during the three years immediately following their admission. Some of the courses, which are frequently attended by senior practitioners on a voluntary basis, are geared towards the acquisition of such basic skills as client communication and office management, but many are set up for the purpose of developing practitioners' specialist knowledge.

Only in the last fortnight, proposals have been published by the Law Society to improve access to the courts for those who are not eligible for legal aid, or who are not adequately covered by legal aid—a point raised by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). The scheme proposed would be run on insurance lines under which litigants would pay a fixed and moderate fee for entry into the scheme and be protected against liability for costs in the event of the litigation being unsuccessful. In addition, the accident legal advice scheme has just been launched with a view to removing the difficulties that many potential plaintiffs in personal injury cases encounter in identifying a firm of solicitors willing to help them. The scheme provides for free initial advice on the possibility of a claim.

The Bar Council, for its part, is aiming to provide an increased number of scholarships to cover the period of study at the School of Law, where training is being substantially remodelled so as to place less emphasis on academic study and more on the acquisition of practical skills, in client communication long neglected, in my personal view as well as in advocacy. The Bar Council envisages that most of the 200 to 300 new barristers who start practice every year will receive significant financial help while at the School of Law and during their subsequent year's training in pupillage.

Those initiatives are warmly welcomed by the Government. The Government are also grateful for the way in which both branches of the profession have been examining, with officials of the Lord Chancellor's Department, further ways of saving cost to the public and of improving productivity.

There is only one criterion against which the structure of the legal profession may properly be judged, and that is the public interest. No tradition, practice, rule or privilege, however deeply entrenched, can be sustained unless it meets that test. I believe that the profession itself, in each of its branches, seeks no other test and acknowledges that none other would be justified. The initiatives to which I have referred illustrate the reality of that commitment; and that, too, is the standard which the Government will apply to the legal profession, no less stringently than in any other area of service to the public.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inner City Task Forces

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what account the inner city task forces take of the level of political profile of groups seeking financial support; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The aim of our inner cities Initiative is to improve employment and enterprise in the inner cities. If projects meet that aim, and as long as it is clear they have no ulterior political purpose, it is likely they will receive help. The political opinions of people putting forward projects are of no concern to us when we evaluate projects, but we have no intention of financing political campaigning of any kind.

Inner City Areas (Business)

Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what new initiatives he intends to take to encourage the establishment and survival of business in inner city areas.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are continuing to develop the measures outlined before the election, including my Department's inner cities initiative, for targeting assistance more effectively on the problems of the inner city. I shall ensure that my Department's programmes take proper account of the need to encourage the establishment and revitalisation of businesses in the inner city areas.

European Trade Mark Office

Mr. Mills asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what future plans he has for his action group set up to promote the United Kingdom's bid for the proposed European Community trade mark office;

(2) what action he has taken to support the United Kingdom's bid for the proposed European Community trade mark office.

Mr. Butcher: My Department is continuing the active role it has taken in support of the United Kingdom bid. Future arrangements for the action group may need to take account of any new developments in Brussels and will be considered in the near future.

Mr. Mills asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has allocated funds to support the United Kingdom's bid for the proposed European trade mark office.

Mr. Butcher: The Prime Minister told the House on 2 July that the Government are backing their bid with generous financial support. This would, of course, be subject to parliamentary approval, which would be sought at an appropriate time.

Rover Group (Istel)

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he expects the Rover group to complete the sale of Istel.

Mr. Atkins: The Rover group announced on 10 June that it had concluded the sale of 75 per cent. of Istel to a consortium comprising management, employees and institutional investors for £26·25 million. The Rover group is retaining a 25 per cent. shareholding in the company.

Following the completion of the sale of Istel, and not withstanding Rover group's minority shareholding, the Government will accept no further responsibility for ensuring the obligations of the company are met.

PRIME MINISTER

European Council

Mr. Spearing asked the Prime Minister if, further to her statement to the House of 1 July, she will state if the financial proposals placed before the Heads of Government meeting of the European Economic Community were there in the Commission Document 87, COM. 101; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The Commission proposals on Community financing in documents COM(87) 100 and 101 have formed the basis for discussion in the Council of Ministers since February. These proposals remain on the table, but the present state of discussion is reflected in the presidency conclusions of the European Council, copies of which have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Prime Minister (1) if she will list her official visits abroad, with countries visited and appropriate dates since 10 July 1986;

(2) if she will give the reason for each of her official visits abroad since 10 July 1986;

(3) if she will give details of her official engagements on a daily basis on all overseas trips which she has undertaken since May 1979.

The Prime Minister: The information is as follows:

Date	Country visited	Reason for visit
1986
11-13 July	Canada	Opened British week at Expo' 86. Talks with Mr. Mulroney.
11-12 September	Norway	Talks with Norwegian Government.
16-17 September	Germany	Anglo-German bilaterals. Visit to British forces.
14-15 November	United States of America	Talks with President Reagan.
21 November	France	Anglo-French bilaterals.
8-9 December	France	Report to the European Parliament on the outcome of the European Council in London.
1987
7 March	Belgium	Zeebrugge ferry disaster.
23 March	France	Talks with President Mitterrand.
	Germany	Talks with Chancellor Kohl.
28 March-1 April	Soviet Union	Talks with Soviet leaders.
8-9 June	Italy	Economic summit.
29-30 June	Belgium	European Council.

More detailed information can be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Blowpipe Missiles (Member's Questions)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister why, in the light of her substantive answer to the hon. Member for Linlithgow of 29 June, Official Report, column 29, about the alleged presence and source of Blowpipe missiles in Nicaragua, she made the statement in her reply of 2 July to an identically worded question from the hon. Member about Afghanistan, that it was not the practice of Her Majesty's Government to comment on matters of this kind.

The Prime Minister: The British public well understand the differences between the situation in Nicaragua and the Soviet occupation of Afghanistan. In central America, it is our declared policy that the use of force is not the way to solve the problems of the region. In the exceptional circumstances of that case, we thought it right to make clear that, in line with our policy, exports of defence equipment were not, as had been alleged, taking place. This was an exception to our well-established policy of not commenting on matters of this kind.

Parliamentary Pensions

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if, in calculating increases in pensions paid under sections 26 and 29 of the Parliamentary and Other Pensions Act 1972, any acount is taken of differences between the increased salary payable under the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1972 and the actual salary paid to the office holder.

The Prime Minister: No.

Salary

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will list for 1 July each year from 1979 to 1987 (i) the annual salary payable to the Prime Minister under the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1972 and (ii) the annual salary actually paid to the Prime Minister; and if she will estimate the new pension currently payable under the Parliamentary and Other Pensions Act 1972 to anyone relinquishing the office of Prime Minister after 1 January 1987.

The Prime Minister: The first column in the table sets out the annual salary payable to the Prime Minister under the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1975. The second column sets out the annual salary actually paid to the Prime Minister. In addition to a salary under the Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1972, the Prime Minister receives the reduced parliamentary salary payable to all Ministers and other office holders in the House of Commons. This is set out in the third column. The fourth column sets out the total salary the Prime Minister is entitled to from both sources. The fifth column sets out the total salary actually paid to the Prime Minister.

The pension payable to anyone relinquishing the office of Prime Minister after 1 January 1987 is currently £16,791 per year.

Following is the table:

	(1) Salary payable to Prime Minister £	(2) Salary drawn by Prime Minister £	(3) Reduced Parliamentary salary £	(4) Total salary entitlement £	(5) Total salary actually drawn £
1 July 1979	22,000	22,000	5,265	27,265	27,265
1 July 1980	33,000	22,000	6,930	39,930	28,930
1 July 1981	36,725	27,825	8,130	44,855	35,955
1 July 1982	38,200	28,950	8,460	46,660	37,410
1 July 1983	38,987	29,367	9,543	48,530	38,910
1 July 1984	40,424	30,304	10,626	51,050	40,930
1 July 1985	41,891	31,271	11,709	53,600	42,980
1 July 1986	43,328	32,208	12,792	56,120	45,000
1 July 1987	44,775	33,145	13,875	58,650	47,020

Non-Government Organisations (Grants)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister if she will give the total amount of grants made to tax receiving independent non-government organisations in 1986-87 and the likely amount in 1987-88.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 2 July 1987, c. 144]: Such organisations would cover all bodies which are in the receipt of any tax rebates or exemptions, including nearly all commercial organisations, but would exclude some voluntary sector bodies. Information on grants made to these organisations is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Prime Minister what are the criteria used in awarding grants to tax receiving independent non-government organisations; and if she is satisfied that the taxpayer gets value for money.

The Prime Minister [pursuant to her reply, 2 July, c. 144]: Grants awarded by Government Departments to independent organisations are made according to criteria which depend on the nature of the grant.

For instance, grants to voluntary organisations by the Home Office Voluntary Services Unit are subject to criteria agreed administratively, and these organisations must normally be working at a national level. Grants made under the urban programme by the Department of the Environment are governed by statutory authority, providing that urban aid be directed to particular geographic areas, that the projects meet the current objectives of the urban programme, and that they have the support of the local authority, which has to bear 25 per cent. of the cost. Grants made by the Manpower Services Commission for the provision of training are subject to criteria laying down the nature of the training and the numbers involved.

All Departments are aware of the requirement to ensure value for money.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Licensing Laws

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with Christian churches in Northern Ireland concerning the proposed alteration to public house licensing laws.

Mr. Needham: Copies of the proposals for draft orders, together with their explanatory documents, were sent to all the main churches in Northern Ireland. Written comments were received from a number of them, but of the main bodies only the Presbyterian Church asked for a meeting, which I held with it on 15 December 1986.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with political parties in Northern Ireland concerning the proposed alteration to pub licensing laws.

Mr. Needham: The views of the main political parties were sought in 1984 when the Government published their consultative document on Sunday opening and the range of premises permitted to sell intoxicating liquor. In March 1985 the Northern Ireland Assembly reported to the Government on that document. When the proposals for the draft Licensing (Northern Ireland) Order and the draft Registration of Clubs (Northern Ireland) Order were published in October 1986 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland wrote to the heads of the main political parties inviting their comments on the proposals. Only the Social Democratic and Labour party responded.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Legal Aid

Mr. Fraser asked the Attorney-General what information he has on the delays in the issue of legal aid certificates which are taking place in Area 1, London; and what steps he is taking to eliminate those delays.

The Attorney-General: The average time taken in Area 1 from application to issue of a certificate — in non-contributory cases — or the issue of an offer — in contributory cases — was 118·6 days for the financial year 1986-87 as compared with 139·9 days for 1985-86. I understand that the legal aid administration of the Law Society has recently implemented a number of changes designed further to reduce the delays, as a result of a review by independent consultants of working methods in Area 1.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General (1) how many posts there were for each of the Crown Prosecution Service areas in the London areas and throughout England and Wales as at 30 May 1987 for (a) professional and (b) non-professional personnel;

(2) how many persons were in post in each Crown Prosecution Service area as at 30 May 1987. in (a) professional and (b) non-professional posts.

(3) how many posts there were for the Crown Prosecution Service areas in the London area and throughout England and Wales as at 30 May 1986 for (a) professional and (b) non-professional personnel;

(4) how many persons were in post in each Crown Prosecution Service area as at 30 May 1986 for (a) professional and (b) non-professional posts;

(5) how many persons are in posts as (a) chief crown prosecutors, (b) branch prosecutors, (c) senior crown prosecutors and (d) crown prosecutors, indicating how many are male; and female;

(6) whether he proposes to take any steps to bring into line the pay of those who transferred into the Crown Prosecution Service from the county prosecution service, as senior crown prosecutors and those recruited as senior crown prosecutor or promoted to senior crown prosecutor from within the service;

(7) how many staff who resigned from the Crown Prosecution Service were (a) chief crown prosecutors, (b) branch prosecutors and (c) senior crown prosecutors and (d) crown prosecutors, between 1 April 1986 and 30 March 1987;

(8) what representations he has received from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and chief constables elsewhere with regard to the performance of the Crown Prosecution Service; and if he will make a statement;

(9) what steps he intends to take to attract further recruits into the Crown Prosecution Service in order to fill the vacant posts, particularly in London and the home counties;

(10) how many persons have been seconded to other areas to meet or assist in the shortfall of staff in London and elsewhere in the Month of May 1987; and what has been the average cost of secondment per person in the payment of expenses.

The Attorney-General: I will reply to the hon. Member when the information has been obtained.

Solicitors and Barristers (Training Courses)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General what training courses he proposes to introduce in advocacy for inservice training for (a) solicitors who have just been admitted, (b) barristers who have completed no pupilage and (c) barristers who have completed no more than six months training.

The Attorney-General: I will reply to the hon. Member when the information has been obtained.

Committed Papers

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General what qualifications will be required of those persons not professionally qualified in law whom he proposes to employ to prepare and vet committal papers.

The Attorney-General: I will reply to the hon. Member when the information has been obtained.

Magistrates' Courts (Agents)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General what is the average weekly cost of appointment of agents in the magistrates' courts in each of the London areas and throughout England and Wales.

The Attorney-General: I will reply to the hon. Member when the information has been obtained.

Case Papers

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General what steps he proposes to take to ensure that case papers for agents, solicitors or barristers are provided, at the latest, the night before the hearings.

The Attorney-General: I will reply to the hon. Member when the information has been obtained.

EMPLOYMENT

Youth Training Scheme

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the current numbers of YTS-employed status trainees; and if he will make a statement outlining the procedure by which employers are made aware of the scheme.

Mr. Cope: It is estimated that around one in ten of YTS trainees have employment status. Employers are made aware of the scheme in a number of ways: the Manpower Services Commission makes information and literature available to employers; individual managing agents may approach employers to be involved as work experience providers; and local and national employer organisations encourage their members to take part in YTS.

Remploy

Mr. Alan Williams asked the Secretary of State for Employment in each year since 1979 what has been Remploy's (a) turnover, (b) profitability, (c) grant from Government and (d) grant per employee from Government.

Mr. Lee: Remploy's turnover in each year since 1979 was as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	29·9
1979-80	33·1
1980-81	39·0
1981-82	41·7
1982-83	49·4
1983-84	55·6
1984-85	62·7
1985-86	70·8
1986-87	[1]77·6

[1] Provisional.

Remploy does not make a profit, but the excess of expenditure over income generated through sales for each year was as follows:

	£ million
1978-79	22·6
1979-80	27·2
1980-81	34·9
1981-82	42·2
1982-83	43·4
1983-84	46·3
1984-85	49·3
1985-86	53·0
1986-87	[1]50·9

[1] Provisional

The level of revenue subvention from Government for each year was as follows:

	£million
1978-79	22·6
1979-80	27.2
1980-81	35·2
1981-82	39·2
1982-83	42·4
1983-84	44·6
1984-85	47·8
1985-86	48·5
1986-87	[1]47.9

[1] Provisional.

Dividing the total revenue subvention by the average number of disabled employees in each year, gives the following results:

1978-79	2,800
1979-80	3,311
1980-81	4,304
1981-82	4,640
1982-83	4,850
1983-84	5,109
1984-85	5,362
1985-86	5,449
1986-87	[1]5,356

[1] Provisional.

Mr. Alan Williams asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were employed by Remploy in each year since 1979, and in what product areas.

Mr. Lee: The average number of people employed by Remploy by product group in each year since 1982 was as follows:

Total average employees by product group

	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
Head Ofice	214	191	195	207	166	150
Furniture and Medical	2,876	3,627	3,587	3,398	3,370	3,196
Leather and Textiles	3,436	3,668	3,594	3,735	3,763	3,624
Packaging and Assembly	4,331	3,639	3,751	4,023	3,969	4,047
Total Employees	10,857	11,125	11,127	11,363	11,268	11,017
of which Section 2 disabled	8,448	8,742	8,730	8,915	8,900	8,944

Information is not available by product group prior to 1982.

Jobcentre Recruitment

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment what methods he is considering for the improvement of jobcentre recruitment.

Mr. Lee: We are constantly looking for ways of improving jobcentre recruitment services. Existing methods are varied according to local managerial judgment of labour market conditions, availability of resources and the wishes of employers. Jobcentres have been remarkably successful with this, as with other parts of their services and last year placed almost 2 million people in jobs.

Mr. Janner: asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will consider proposals that jobcentres should accept curricula vitae as part of their recruitment methods.

Mr. Lee: As the hon. Member may know, long-term unemployed people in job clubs are trained to prepare CVs and encouraged to use them as part of their job search activity.

So far as the job broking activities of jobcentres are concerned, it is unlikely that greater usage of CVs would increase recruitment to employer's vacancies. Very few employers using jobcentres for recruitment ask for CVs, often requiring a speedy response and preferring to gain such information on job application forms or when interviewing candidates. Most jobcentre vacancies are successfully filled by self-service methods which do not lend themselves to the use of CVs.

Tourism (Upper Waiting Hall)

Miss Fookes asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has considered an application for an exhibition relating to tourism to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Lee: To date I have not received any such application, but I would welcome such a request in the future.

Wages Inspectorate

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to increase the strength of the Wages inspectorate.

Mr. Nicholls: No.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make a statement on the number of actions taken by the Wages inspectorate against illegal activities by employers in accordance with the rules.

Mr. Nicholls: In 1986 two employers were successfully prosecuted for offences under wages council legislation.

So far in 1987, four employers have been successfully prosecuted and a further three cases are expected to be heard shortly.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) whether the People's Republic of China has accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice to resolve any dispute over implementation or interpretation of the joint declaration on the future of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether the United Kingdom has accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice to resolve any dispute over implementation or interpretation of the joint declaration on the future of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The People's Republic of China has not accepted the compulsory jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice and the United Kingdom's acceptance of compulsory jurisdiction is subject to reciprocity. Nevertheless, both Governments have made it clear that they are firmly committed to the full and faithful implementation of the joint declaration in the interests of maintaining the stability and prosperity of Hong Kong. We intend to honour the agreement to the full and are confident that the Chinese Government intend likewise.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what judicial procedures will be used after 1 July 1997 to resolve any dispute between the United Kingdom and the People's Republic of China over implementation or interpretation of the joint agreement on the future of Hong Kong; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: There is no provision in the joint declaration for the judicial resolution of disputes. It would be for us and the Chinese Government to seek to resolve any differences of view by whatever methods seemed appropriate at the time. There is close co-operation between our two Governments and we are fully satisfied with the progress that has been made in the implementation of the joint declaration.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many visas for emigration from Hong Kong have been issued in the past five years; if he will list the totals by country of destination; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Hong Kong people are free to come and go as they wish. Exit visas are not required and travellers are not questioned on the purpose of their journey. In these circumstances, statistics on the numbers emigrating are not available. However, we estimate that on average about 20,000 people have emigrated in each of the past five years.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, following his consultations, he will state whether the National People's Congress of the People's Republic of China, after 30 June 1997, maintain rights to amend the basic law of the special administrative region of Hong Kong and to review the constitutionality of the local laws of the special administrative region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Under the Chinese constitution, the power to amend the basic law, like other Chinese statutes, rests with the National People's Congress. However, the joint declaration provides that the basic policies set out in that agreement—which will be stipulated in the basic law—will regain unchanged for 50 years from 1 July 1997. In accordance with the terms of the joint declaration, laws enacted by the Legislature of the Special Administrative Region which are in accordance with the basic law and legal procedures will be regarded as valid.

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the statement by Sir Sze-Yuen Chung, a senior member of the Hong Kong Executive Council, concerning the totality of the control which will be exercised over Hong Kong by the People's Republic of China after 30 June 1997, and concerning the degree of local control over political affairs, represents Her Majesty's Government's policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Sir Sze-Yuen Chung has made clear that in his statement he was putting forward his personal views. Our general position is made clear from our signature of the Sino-British joint declaration. This provides inter alia that from 1 July 1997 the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region will enjoy a high degree of autonomy, except in foreign and defence affairs which will be the responsibilities of the Central People's Government of the People's Republic of China.

Human Rights Conventions (China)

Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which of the following United Nations human rights international instruments have been signed and ratified by the People's Republic of China: (a) the international covenant on economic, social and cultural rights, (b) the international covenant on civil and political rights, (c) the convention relating to the status of refugees, (d) the convention relating to the status of stateless persons and (e) the convention on the political rights of women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The People's Republic of China has not signed and ratified or acceded to (a), (b), (d) or (e). It acceded to both the convention and the protocol relating to the status of refugees on 24 September 1982 (c).

Cultural Relations

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on cultural relations.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 1 July, at columns 476 and 477.

Korea

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the peaceful reunification of Korea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As the hon. Member was informed by my hon. Friend the then Minister of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, the Member for Mid Sussex (Mr. Renton) on 14 April 1986, at columns 244 and 245, our policy to support progress towards reunification by means of direct dialogue between the Koreans.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to commence diplomatic relations with the Democratic People's Republic of Korea; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We have no plans to open diplomatic relations with North Korea.

AIDS

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what additional funds are being made available to the International Planned Parenthood Federation for work in AIDS-related campaigns; and for what precise purpose such funds are intended.

Mr. Chris Patten: We are providing an additional £1·6 million over three years to enable the federation to develop information and counselling services on AIDS for its health workers and clients.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funds are being made available to CAFOD for work in AIDS-related campaigns; and for what precise purpose such funds are intended.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have made no grants to CAFOD for AIDS-related campaigns or projects. We believe the best way to tackle the AIDS problem is to work within national AIDS programmes, and we are encouraging other donors and voluntary agencies to do the same. These programmes are being developed with the assistance of the World Health Organisation's special programme on AIDS, to which we have so far contributed £3·25 million.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make it his policy to ensure that the basis of any AIDS campaign run by voluntary organisations overseas, using British Government funds, is that chastity before marriage and fidelity within it should be promoted as being more likely to tackle the spread of AIDS than promiscuous sexual behaviour protected by condoms.

Mr. Chris Patten: We believe assistance in this field, including that from voluntary organisations, should be provided within the framework of national AIDS programmes. The responsibility for developing these, which will include appropriate measures to prevent sexual transmission of the desease, rests with national Governments.

European Trade Mark Office

Mr. Mills asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made in the foreign affairs deliberations of the Council of Ministers on London as the location for the proposed European Trade Mark Office.

Mrs. Chalker: The Commission has yet to make a recommendation on the location of the Community Trade Mark Office and the issue has not therefore been discussed in the Council. My right honourable and learned Friend and I have, in discussions with other EC member states, sought support for London as the best site.

South Africa (Trade Unionists)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East on 1 July, he will state which nine trade unionists' cases were raised by Her Majesty's Government's ambassador in Pretoria on 19 December 1986; and what was the outcome of those discussions.

Mrs. Chalker: The nine trades unionists are Mr. Moses Mayekiso, Mr. Denis Dickinson, Mr. Peter Seabela, Ms. Patricia Dlungwana, Mr. George Hlabizulu, Mr. Alexander Kgagodi, Mr. Joseph Timane, Mr. Madla Cele, Mr. Philip Majara.

The South African Government were left in no doubt of the Twelve's strong concern in the matter of their detention.

St. Helena (Television Programmes)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will consider the possibility of transmitting BBC1 and BBC2 television by satellite to St. Helena.

Mr. Eggar: St. Helena has no television service and the islanders would require special facilities to receive television programmes broadcast by satellite. We are aware of the potential opportunities offered by satellite broadcasting, but the question of Government involvement raises fundamental policy issues.

TRANSPORT

Women's Needs

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. Channon: Women have special needs relating to their use of public transport services and various road safety issues. These reflect factors such as more restricted access to private cars and greater fears for personal safety. These matters are given due weight in the formulation of policy on these issues, and in the monitoring of developments such as bus deregulation. The Department consults organisations representing the interests of women when this is appropriate although in general the policy is to consult organisations representing all those concerned with particular issues.

Equal opportunities training, including that designed to increase awareness of the needs of women, is included in all the Department's main management training courses.

M66 (Inspector's Report)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set out the timetable for receipt and publication of the inspector's report on the M66 from Denton to Middleton; and when he will expect construction to start if the inspector recommends construction.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report is expected shortly. I shall make an announcement after I have considered it. The scheme is included in the national trunk road programme for a start of work in the period April 1989 to March 1991.

BR (Punctuality)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he collects from British Rail about its punctuality performance, region by region.

Mr. David Mitchell: None. But I receive quarterly information now by sector.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what reasons have been supplied to him by British Rail for the trends in punctuality over the last six months (a) nationally and (b) in the London Midland Region.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail has been making efforts to improve its performance, on which it will be reporting in its annual report, as I asked the chairman last October. I am glad to say that punctuality has improved over the last six months. I do not monitor punctuality regionally.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the punctuality performance of railways in other European Economic Community countries in comparison with that of British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: None. Comparisons with foreign rail services are of limited use because circumstances vary from country to country.

BR (Accident Record)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about British Rail's accident record over the last six months (a) nationally and (b) in the London Midland Region.

Mr. David Mitchell: Section 6 of the Regulations of Railways Act 1871 and orders made under it—currently the Railways (Notice of Accident) Order 1986, SI 1986 No. 2187—requires statutory railway authorities to report specified accidents and dangerous occurrences to the Department. In the case of British Rail these are made as individual reports or on monthly bulk returns depending on the nature and severity of the accident or incident. In each case the region of BR is identified. All the reports and returns are collated, analysed by the Railway Inspectorate and any adverse trends are thereby identified. The accident statistics, together with an analysis and commentary, are included in the Railway Inspectorate's annual report, published for each calendar year by HMSO. Based on the reports received so far, the accident record during the past six months, both of BR and of London Midland region, appears relatively satisfactory and in line with the improved overall safety performance achieved in recent years.

British Rail (Derelict Land)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the total amount of derelict land in the ownership of British Rail; and what was the equivalent figure for 1979.

Mr. David Mitchell: The amount of vacant and underutilised land owned by British Rail at 31 March 1987 was 1,246 sites, totalling 9,404 acres. The equivalent figure at the end pf 1979 was 2,823 sites, totalling 18,333 acres.

Motorway Bridges (Graffiti)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he intends to take to remove graffiti from motorway bridges.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The removal of graffiti from trunk road bridges is left to the judgment of the local highway authorities acting as the Department's agents. The mormal practice is to remove obscene or racist graffiti quickly. To save money and lane closures, the treatment of the remainder is undertaken as soon as possible within the routine maintenance works programme.

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the implications for road safety of graffiti on motorway bridges.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There is no evidence that graffiti on a motorway bridge poses a problem for road safety. The danger is for those placing the graffiti.

Federation of Professional Railway Staff

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss recognition of the Federation of Professional Railway Staff.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. This is a management matter for the Railways Board.

Heathrow Airport

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about excessive charges by duty-free shops at Heathrow airport.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No one has made representations to us in the last two years.

Shipping Disasters (Inquiries)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Christchurch on 29 June, Official Report, column 236, to which inquiries he was referring when he stated that in relation to previous public inquiries into matters analogous with the Herald of Free Enterprise disaster, a policy of not bringing criminal charges had been applied.

Mr. David Mitchell: My right hon. Friend was referring to formal investigations ordered under section 55 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1970. But the same policy is applied in relation to all such inquiries, as evidenced in the Government's response to recommendation 22 of the Royal Commission on Tribunals of Inquiry 1966, Cmnd. 3121.

Watermead Country Park

Mr. Vaz asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give reasons why his Department is resisting proposals for alternative access to Watermead country park from the A46 rather than through Alderton Close, Rushey Mead, Leicester.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The A46 in Leicester is a heavily used dual carriageway road. Introducing a new access or intensifying the use of an existing access to this type of road is to be avoided on safety grounds.

Our advice was sought informally about the proposed alternative access to the Watermead country park because here the A46 is a trunk road and we are the highway authority. Our advice has been confined to this access as the A46 at Alderton close is no longer a trunk road. Here it is a principal road and Leicestershire county council is the highway authority. Nevertheless, the traffic and road safety implications would still need to be considered.

We understand that a planning application is to be formally submitted at which time when we have seen the details we would hope to discuss with Leicestershire county council and the planning authority how the access to the park should be best accommodated along this section of the A46.

A46-A47

Mr. Vaz asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to defer implementing Leicestershire county council's proposals for the extension of the A46-A47 until full public consultation has taken place; and if he will authorise a further public inquiry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Implementation of the proposals for the A46-A47 link is a matter for Leicestershire county council as highway authority. The council has recently stated there will be public consultation on the detailed proposals.

Pembury and Sidcup Bypasses

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is his current estimate of the opening dates for the A21 Pembury bypass and the A20 new Sidcup bypass.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Both of these new bypasses are due to be completed next spring. I understand that the contractor for the A20 Sidcup bypass hopes to finish early, to allow opening by the end of this year.

M20 (Hollingbourne-Ashford)

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet received the report of the inspector into the inquiry into the Hollingbourne-Ashford section of the M20 motorway; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report was received in February. I hope to make an announcement soon.

Birmingham Relief Road

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the sites that have been and are currently under consideration as suitable for service facilities on the Birmingham northern relief road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We are not yet ready to announce proposals for a site for an MSA on this road. We hope to be able to do so later in the year when indicating the proposed alignment of the road.

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the draft line order for the Birmingham northern relief road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We expect to publish the draft line order in September.

Burntwood Bypass

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations his Department has received from Walsall metropolitan borough council with respect to the proposed Burntwood bypass.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department has been discussing road proposals in this area with both Walsall and Staffordshire councils. Any decision to build a Burntwood bypass is essentially one for these authorities to make. This Department is considering how best such a scheme could link to the proposed Birmingham northern relief road.

Brownhills (Traffic Surveys)

Mr. Richard Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Transport if any recent traffic surveys have been carried out in the Brownhills area by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The last full surveys in Brownhills were taken in 1985. Automatic traffic counts are in regular use alopg the A5 between Weeford and M6.

Motorcycle Helmets

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the availability of motorcycle helmet visors complying with the new regulations on abrasion resistance; and if, to avoid insurance complications for motorcyclists unable to comply with the new regulations, he will waive temporarily the new requirements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I will answer this question shortly.

South Wales—Heathrow (Rail Link)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, when considering the study of a new rail link from central London to Heathrow, he will look at the question of providing a direct rail link from south Wales to Heathrow on the journey to Paddington.

Mr. David Mitchell: It would be for British Rail to bring forward the case for such an investment. If it could be justified commercially, I would be happy to approve it.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make provision in the Channel Tunnel Bill for adequate facilities to ensure the safety, comfort and convenience of people with disabilities travelling on trains through the proposed Channel tunnel.

Mr. David Mitchell: Eurotunnel's original submission to the Governments showed that they realised the need to make provision on their shuttle services for people with disabilities. They are now working closely with representatives of disabled people's organisations to establish their requirements and see how they can best be met; British Rail has a firm commitment to providing for the needs of passengers with disabilities on all their major services; and the safety authority will need to be satisfied by the arrangements proposed.

Provision in the Channel Tunnel Bill is therefore unnecessary.

Merchant Fleet

Mr. MacDonald asked the Secretary of State for Transport what plans Her Majesty's Government have to arrest the annual decline in the registered tonnage of the British merchant fleet.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Government's interest is twofold: first, to ensure adequate merchant shipping resources to meet the country's need in emergency or war. Plans for this include new measures aimed at encouraging the retention of British seafarers on British-owned vessels.

Second, to help the competitive position of the United Kingdom merchant shipping fleet, a number of important initiatives have been taken at the level of the EEC and on a wider international basis, aimed at providing improved access to trading opportunities.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Afforestation

Dr. David Clark asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what return to the nation is expected for new afforestation proposals made by the Forestry Commission; and if he wil publish any guidelines on this subject which have been issued by his Department to the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Major: The overall financial targets set for the Forestry Commission are to achieve an overall return, in real terms, of 3 per cent. on its forest estate and 5 per cent. on its commercial recreation investment. It also has objectives in the fields of rural employment, recreation and the environment. The commission's performance over the period from 1982 to 1987 will be reviewed later in the year when the accounts for 1986-87 are completed and performance targets for the next three years will then be set

Income Tax

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the lowest rates of income tax for Italy, Japan, West Germany, the United States of America and France.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The lowest nominal rates of national income tax for the countries concerned are:

	per cent.
Italy	12·0
Japan	10·5
West Germany	22·0
United States of America	11·0
France	5·0

Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the immediate revenue cost of abolishing the 60 per cent. tax band, thus making the maximum rate of tax 50 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the immediate revenue cost of abolishing the 60 per cent. and 50 per cent. tax bands, thus making the maximum rate 40 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to seek to reduce rates of income tax; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As we said in our election manifesto, our aim is to cut income tax still further and reduce the basic rate to 25p in the pound as soon as we prudently can.

Mortgage Interest Relief

Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the increase in tax collected if mortgage interest relief was restricted to the basic rate of income tax only.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The direct revenue yield in a full year, at 1987-88 levels, from restricting relief to the basic rate is estimated at £340 million. This makes no allowance for the effect of any consequential changes to the distribution of outstanding mortgages.

Mr. Speed asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received in the past 12 months about the more favourable tax treatment of mortgages for unmarried people living together rather than that given to married couples; and what reply he has sent.

Mr. Norman Lamont: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has received about 200 representations on the subject in the past 12 months. Replies have referred to last year's Green Paper on the reform of personal taxation, which suggested that one possibility would be to apply mortgage interest relief to the residence so that two or more people borrowing to buy a house would share the relief limit between them, whether they were married or unmarried.

Exchequer Income

Dr. Cunningham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the estimated total yield of (a) income tax, (b) value-added tax, (c) all other taxes, (d) all Customs and Excise duties and (e) all miscellaneous income to the Exchequer, other than borrowing, (f) public sector borrowing and (g) rates in each year from 1979-80 to 1987-88, estimated.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

General Election (Costs)

Mr. Kaufman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the estimated total cost to public funds of the recent General Election.

Mr. Lawson: £27 million.

VAT

Mr. Gardiner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he proposes to take steps to ease the cash flow problems caused for many companies whose value added tax refunds are held up by the Civil Service strike; and whether he will allow them to use their monthly pay-as-you-earn payment to the Inland Revenue to make good the shortfall.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1987, c. 177]: The Customs and Excise computer system is working again and repayments of value added tax are now being made, together with the addition of repayment supplement—5 per cent. of the tax to be repaid—where appropriate. It will take some days for the backlog to be cleared.

In considering a request for deferral of tax payments, Inland Revenue collectors of tax have general discretion to take account of temporary financial difficulties which a business faces.

CIVIL SERVICE

Unions (Meetings)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Minister for the Civil Service when he next intends to meet the Civil Service unions.

Mr. Luce: I have no plans at present to meet representatives of the Civil Service trade unions, but I meet them informally from time to time. Matters of mutual interest are discussed.

THE ARTS

Women's Needs

Ms. Richardson asked the Minister for the Arts what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what he has done to indentify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. Luce: I am delighted that women play a strong and active part in every field of artistic activity. I should like to see more women appointed to the trustee and similar governing bodies of the organisations for which I am responsible and am pleased to receive suggestions for suitable candidates.

British Museum (Shoreditch)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Minister for the Arts what requests the British museum has received from (a) Ghana and (b) Papua New Guinea for the return of tribal art treasures stored in Shoreditch; what reply was sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The British museum received requests from Ghana in 1974 and 1975 about the return of material in its collections; it was explained at the time that the museum was prevented by Act of Parliament from disposing of its holdings.

The museum has received no request from Papua New Guinea for the return of any material.

Ethnographic material not on general display in the British museum is available for inspection and study.

Library Authorities

Mr. Lawrence asked the Minister for the Arts what he is doing to assist library authorities in developing management costing systems.

Mr. Luce: I am very glad to announce the publication today, as No. 17 in the Library information series, of "A Costing System for Public Libraries". This report sets out the basis of a costing system that will, I believe, be of real value to librarians and the authorities they serve.

Nowadays the public sector has to show that it uses the taxpayer's and ratepayer's money efficiently and effectively, so good cost information is essential. I hope that the report will engage the commitment of the library service to a sustained and systematic process of reviewing and improving its management techniques and thus its service delivery. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of Parliament.

ENERGY

Electricity Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Electricity Council about privatisation.

Mr. Parkinson: I have had preliminary discussions with the chairman of the Electricity Council on a wide range of issues, including privatisation. The Government will be undertaking a great deal of preparatory work, in consultation with the industry and others, before bringing forward its proposals for privatisation.

WALES

Ministerial Visit

12. Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions he has visited Wales since his appointment.

Mr. Peter Walker: Since my appointment I have each week visited Wales, I have had many meetings with my officials to obtain a full and detailed briefing on all matters affecting Wales, I have met a number of Welsh local authority leaders and I have had a number of meetings with Welsh MP's and I have arranged a substantial number of future meetings and visits.

Roads

13. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for investment and improvement of the road system in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Government's programme for improvement of the road network in Wales is set out in "Roads in Wales 1985".

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what road improvements are now included in the preparation pool.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The concept of a preparation pool of schemes was discontinued some time ago. The Government's programme for road improvements is set out in "Roads in Wales 1985".

Rhondda Valley

14. Mr. Allan Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next plans to visit the Rhondda valley.

Mr. Peter Walker: I hope to find a suitable opportunity to visit the Rhondda and many other places in the months ahead.

Agricultural Land

16. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has had proposing the designation of the whole of Ynys Môn as marginal agricultural land; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: There have been 321 representations from individual farmers against exclusion of their own land from the less-favoured area. Representations have also been received from the farming unions.

Labour Statistics

17. Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give his estimate of the number of people in full time employment in Wales in 1987, to the latest available date, compared with 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker: Data for male employment do not distinguish between full and part-time workers. The total of full-time and part-time male and full-time female employees in December 1986, the latest available, is estimated to have been 678,000; the corresponding estimate for December 1979 was 865,000. Between June 1979 and June 1986 self employment in Wales increased by 30,000 to 154,000. Since December 1986 unemployment in Wales has fallen by nearly 11,000.

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the numbers of notified vacancies in Wales, in south Glamorgan and in the area of the Vale of Glamorgan at the latest convenient date; how those compare with the figures for a year previously.

Mr. Peter Walker: The number of vacancies notified to jobcentres and careers offices in Wales and south Glamorgan on 8 May 1987 and 2 May 1986 are given in the following table. This information is not available on a constituency basis.

	Jobcentres	Careers Offices	Total
8 May 1987
Wales	13,017	336	13,353
South Glamorgan	1,662	87	1,749
2 May 1986
Wales	11,925	129	12,054
South Glamorgan	1,728	41	1,769

Cynon Valley

18. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Wales what resources he will make available to deal with the housing and health situation in the Cynon valley.

Mr. Grist: The Cynon valley will continue to receive its fair share of available public resources in relation to its needs.

Railways

19. Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he next intends to meet the chairman of British Rail to discuss rail communications in south Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: My predecessor met the chairman of British Rail on 25 November 1986. I have at present no specific plans to do so.

Delyn Enterprise Zone

20. Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will support Delyn borough council's application to extend the Delyn enterprise zone.

Mr. Grist: Decisions on applications submitted by local authorities, including Delyn borough council, to adjust boundaries or create new zones, will not be taken until [1]consultants' report on the performance to date of enterprise zones, just received, has been considered.

[1] PA Cambridge Economic Consultants.

Welsh Water Authority

21. Mr. Rowlands asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make a statement on the future development of the Welsh water authority.

Mr. Grist: This is a matter for the Welsh water authority, I understand it will be publishing within the next two weeks its annual plan, which outlines future developments.

Industrial Regeneration

22. Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether any of the actions to be taken to meet the needs of the inner cities in England will be devoted to areas in Wales such as the industrial valleys and areas where the old major industries have declined.

Mr. Peter Walker: I intend to give priority to measures aimed at speeding up the regeneration of those areas in Wales suffering from urban decline, including the south Wales valleys. In doing so I shall have regard to the particular circumstances of Wales and I shall examine all available mechanisms to ensure that they are deployed and co-ordinated to the best possible effect.

Primary Schools

23. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future of village primary schools in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Where proposals for the closure of rural primary schools come before my right hon. Friend they are decided on the merits of the individual case, taking account of all the information available. The effects of the proposals upon the quality of education are a prime consideration.

"Housing for Senior Management"

24. Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will withdraw Circular 30/68: "Housing for Senior Management".

Mr. Grist: No.

Council House Sales

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many council dwellings had been sold to tenants, up to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Grist: A total of 48,477 council dwellings have been sold to sitting tenants under the right-to-buy scheme since its introduction in October 1980, up to 31 March 1987.

In addition, 2,211 council dwellings were sold under voluntary agreements during the same period.

Alcoholism

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what reports he has received concerning the level of alcoholism in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: Earlier this year the Health Education Advisory Committee for Wales published its report "Dealing with Alcohol Problems in Wales", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This report proposes a comprehensive health promotion strategy to tackle the problem. The Welsh Health Promotion Authority is considering the report and I look forward to receiving their recommendations.

Farming (Diversification)

Sir Raymond Gower asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are his conclusions regarding the scope for diversification of farming in Wales; and what particular measures he has in mind.

Mr. Peter Walker: On 9 February a number of new policy initiatives were announced designed to encourage alternative uses of farm land, increase diversity on farms and in the rural economy generally, and enhance environmental protection. They include a scheme to encourage the development of farm woodlands, further designations of environmentally sensitive areas and the introduction of a scheme offering new grants towards on-farm diversification.

Specific proposals for the farm woodland and diversification schemes have been the subject of consultation documents. Both have been generally welcomed in Wales. While it is too early to assess the likely take-up I am sure that these two schemes, and the further proposed designations of environmentally sensitive areas announced by my predecessor on 15 May, will be of benefit to Welsh farmers wishing to diversify.

Historic Monuments

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what proportion of (a) the full-time and (b) the part-time employees of Cadw are Welsh-speaking;

(2) how many of the (a) full-time and (b) part-time employees of Cadw deal directly with the public in their work; and what proportion of these are Welsh-speaking;

(3) how many people are at present employed by Cadw and, of those, how many are employed on (a) a full-time basis and (b) a part-time basis.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The position relating to staff working for Cadw as at 1 July is:

	Full-time	Part-time
Total	197	18
Those who:
—speak Welsh	51	—

Housing Associations

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many housing units are operated or owned by housing associations opeating in Wales.

Mr. Grist: At 31 March 1987, registered housing associations operating in Wales held 19,000 dwellings in their housing stock.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are at present housed by each of the housing associations operating in Wales.

Mr. Grist: This information is not held centrally.

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to which of those housing associations operating in Wales are based (a) in Wales and (b) outside Wales.

Mr. Grist: Of 115 registered housing associations operating in Wales 94 are based in Wales and 21 outside Wales. Following is a list:

Teacher Training

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if, pursuant to his answer of 1 July, he will place a copy of the joint UGC/WAB working group report on initial teacher training at Cartrefle college in the Library.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have placed a copy of the report in the Library of the House.

SCOTLAND

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information about the action taken in relation to women's needs by the Department of my right hon. and learned Friend was published in April 1987 in the review of the Nairobi forward-looking strategies for the advancement of women, copies of which have been placed in the Library. Government Departments, including that of my right hon. and learned friend, consult and are consulted by organisations representative of the interests of Scottish women, for example, in correspondence and through participation in seminars. In line with other Government Departments, the Scottish Office gives training to its staff on equal opportunity matters, including the importance of guarding against prejudicial assumptions about the skills and expectations of women on promotion or recruitment boards and in assessing staff performance.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Dunnachie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the current level of unemployment in Glasgow, Pollok expressed as a percentage of the total population available for work under each of the following headings (a) full-time male, (b) part-time male, (c) full-time female, (d) part-time female and (e) young people between the age of 16 and 21 years; and what steps he is taking to reduce these figures.

Mr. Lang: It is not possible to relate unemployment figures to claimants' employment status in their last jobs, and percentage rates are not calculated for localities smaller than travel-to-work areas. The information requested is not therefore available.

However, the numbers of male and female unemployed claimants in the Glasgow Pollok parliamentary constituency, together with the numbers and rates for Glasgow TTWA, on 14 May, the latest date for which information is available, were as shown below.

	Glasgow Pollok parliamentary constituency	Glasgow travel-to-work area	Percentage
Males	5,619	79,572	22·2
Females	1,677	29,310	10·9
Total	7,296	108,882	17·3

In addition, on 9 April, the latest date for which age breakdowns are available, the number of unemployed claimants aged 19 and under, and aged 20-24, in the Glasgow Pollok parliamentary constituency totalled 1,278 and 1,686 respectively.

This information is available in the Library.

The key to achieving reductions in the level of unemployment lies in the Government's policy of keeping inflation down, stimulating enterprise, restoring competitiveness to industry and establishing a strong private sector, thereby encouraging the creation of more jobs. The full range of the Government's employment, enterprise and training measures is also available to assist the unemployed. While the situation in Scotland remains far from satisfactory, the fall in the unemployment figures in recent months and the high level of vacancies are very encouraging.

Electoral Register

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps are taken by electoral registration officers to ensure that all people qualified to be electors are included on the electoral register; what staff and resources are provided for this purpose; and how often a full canvass is conducted for the purposes of updating the register.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: A full canvass is conducted each year in the weeks leading up to the qualifying date of 10 October to update the electoral register. All reasonable steps are taken by means of door-to-door canvass or delivery of form A to each household to ensure that all those who are qualified to be electors are included on the electoral register. The onus rests on each householder, or person owning or occupying the premises, to provide the information required by the registration officer.

The staff and resources for this purpose are determined and provided by regional and islands area councils which appoint the registration officers.

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many official poll cards were returned to returning officers by the Post Office in each Scottish constituency of the recent general election either because of errors in the electoral register or because the electors had moved away.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not available centrally and could not be obtained without disproportionate cost.

Lothian and Borders Police Force

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will make a statement on the level of establishment of the Lothian and Borders police force;

(2) if he will make it his policy to make an increase in establishment of the Lothian and Borders police force.

Mr. Rifkind: The present authorised police establishment of Lothian and Borders police is 2,393 and at 31 March the actual strength (taking into account secondments to central service posts or to the Scottish crime squad) was 2,434. In terms of section 3 of the Police (Scotland) Act 1967, any proposal to increase the authorised establishments is in the first instance a matter for the Lothian and Borders police board.

Charities (Community Charge)

Mr. David Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to give a discount from collective community charges to charities at a level no less than the existing rate relief.

Mr. Rifkind: It would be inappropriate to carry over into the community charge system provided for in the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc (Scotland) Act 1987 precise equivalents of the reliefs available under the domestic rating system. The Act therefore makes no special arrangements for charities in the community charge system. The present structure of reliefs, including those for charities, will continue to apply to non-domestic rates.

I have, however, made it clear that people who are solely or mainly resident in hospitals, nursing homes, residential care homes and certain hostels will be exempt from personal community charge liability, and this will apply to many establishments run by charities. They will remain subject to non-domestic rates, with reliefs as appropriate.

Council House Sales

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the number of council homes sold to their tenants in each Scottish local authority area in each of the last five years; and what percentage this represents of the total council house stock in each area.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested is set out in the table.

Nurses

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the number of nurses who have left the National Health Service in Scotland for reasons other than retirement in each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: This information is not held centrally.

Homelessness

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the total number of homeless families and individuals in Scotland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: Information held centrally relates to applications under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 and is shown in the table below.

Year ended 31 March	Total Applications	Accepted by local authorities as homeless	Accepted by local authorities as potentially homeless
1979	16,030	7,490	4,053
1980	15,460	7,440	2,770

Earnings

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the Scottish average weekly wage for (a) full-time male employees, (b) part-time male employees (c) full-time female employees and (d) part-time female employees in (i) cash terms and (ii) real terms based on 1987-88 prices for each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: The following information has been derived from the new earnings survey, conducted by the Department of Employment in April each year.

Owing to the size of sample used in the survey, figures for part-time males are not available, and all figures are subject to variability.

Crime Statistics

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of Scotland if he will give the total number of recorded crimes for Scotland in each year since 1979 classified by category.

Mr. Rifkind: Statistics on crimes recorded by the police in Scotland are published annually in the Scottish Home and Health Department Statistical bulletin "Recorded Crime in Scotland". Bulletins No. 2/1985, 2/1986 and 4/1987 which are available in the Library contain the information requested.

HIDB (Grants)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the total value of grants made by the Highlands and Islands Development Board to companies or projects in Scotland in each year since 1979 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms on 1978-88 prices.

Mr. Lang: Expenditure on grants to businesses by the Highlands and Islands Development Board under its section 8 scheme is shown in the table. The board under the same scheme also makes loans on concessionary terms and takes equity shares in businesses. Under other schemes the board makes grants to research, business advisory, marketing, training and social development projects but information in the form requested on the total value of these grants is not readily available.

SDA (Grant Aid)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will publish a table showing the total numbers of applications for grant aid made to the Scottish Development Agency in each year since 1979 and the number and percentage of these which were accepted in each year;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the total value of grants made by the Scottish Development Agency to companies or projects in Scotland in each year since 1979 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms on 1987-88 prices.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Redundancies

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of closures of factories or businesses in Scotland which have involved more than 50 redundancies in each year since 1979; and if he will give the total number of jobs lost in each of these years as a result of these closures.

Mr. Malcolm Rifkind: The table shows the number of closures confirmed to the Manpower Services Commission as due to occur in Scotland, involving more than 50 redundancies in each year since 1979, and the number of workers involved.

Closures involving more than fifty redundancies in Scotland from January 1979 to June 1987

Notes:
[1] To June.
(1) Workers not made redundant but transferred to other company plants when their own plant closed are not included in the table.
(2) The 1987 figures are provisional and include only those closures which have been confirmed as due to occur up to June 1987 and where all the redundancies have taken place by that date.

Forestry Commission (Planting Proposals)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the Forestry Commission consults the Nature Conservancy Council about its planting operations or planting proposals within Caithness and Sutherland; and if he will list those Forestry Commission planting proposals which have been forwarded to the Nature Conservancy Council for comment.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Forestry Commission has consulted the Nature Conservancy Council about its planting programme in Caithness and Sutherland. The properties concerned are listed below.

Inversbin
Dyke
Achormlarie
Tannach Hill
Cnoc a' Mhoid
Sallachy
Stroupster

Forestry Grants Scheme

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those forestry grants scheme applications received by the Forestry Commission for land in Caithness and Sutherland which have been forwarded to the Nature Conservancy Council for comment; and if he will indicate the outcome where appropriate with each case.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Since 17 February 1987, when the Forestry Commission undertook to consult the Nature Conservancy Council on all planting proposals in Caithness and Sutherland, forestry grant scheme applications relating to the following properties have been forwarded to the Council for comment:—

Yellow Moss*
Lairg Estate
Newport, Berriedale
North Burn*
Loubcroy*
Ben Bhraggie
Skitten
Strathy East
Cnoc na Main*
Braelangwell
Torrish

Cnoc Bacach
Limekiln/Whitewell*
Eriboll
Kirkton Farm*
Sciberscross*
Glencalvie
Glencalvie (Native pine)
Achany
Dhonnadh
Jubilee Wood

The Nature Conservancy Council has lodged objections to the planting proposed in the cases marked with an asterisk. In the remaining cases — with the exception of Dhonnadh and Jubilee wood on which their comments are still awaited—the council has signified its agreement to the proposals made.

Druim Carn na Muc (Afforestation)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the natural hazards, windthrow risk and soil capability for afforestation of that land at Druim Carn na Muc in Caithness which is owned by the Forestry Commission; and if he will state the estimated internal rate of return that would accrue from a plantation on this land.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are no special natural hazards which would affect forestry on this site. The windthrow risk is assessed as class 5, which is typical for many parts of Scotland; the soil is a nutrient-rich peat, which would give a good average yield class of timber; and the estimated internal rate of return to the Forestry Commission is between 2 per cent. and 2·5 per cent.

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional advice will he give to community charge registration officers as to the sale of names and addresses of people contained in the community charge register, when the sale of the names and addresses takes place without the consent or knowledge of the data subject.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend is considering what notice should be given to persons registered as liable to pay the community charges of the availability for sale of the publicly available part of the register, as provided for by section 20(4) of the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987.

Prisons

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what additional revenue resources have been allocated for the administration of the new extension to Her Majesty's prison, Shotts.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Approximately £2,800,000 for 1987-88.

Ayr Bypass

Mr. Dunnachie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to prevent the proposed Ayr motorway bypass from being constructed in Glasgow, Pollock; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I assume the hon. Member is referring to Strathclyde regional council's section of the proposed A77 Ayr road route. My right hon. and learned Friend is at present considering objections which have been lodged against the proposals, and he will decide shortly whether to arrange for a public local inquiry to be held.

Guinness plc

Mr. Michael J. Martin asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet the chairman of Guinness plc to discuss the implications for the Scottish economy and, in particular, for employment in the Port Dundas area of the Glasgow, Springburn constituency, of the future development of the company.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend and I have met the chairman of Guinness on a number of occasions and will do so again if we judge a meeting to be appropriate. We fully recognise that the future success of the company will be beneficial to the Scottish economy in general and to the prosperity of the hon. Member's constituency in particular.

McKinnon's Knitwear

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has had on the current ownership of Mackinnon's Knitwear at Coatbridge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: I understand that the Mackinnon's Knitwear Company at Coatbridge is currently still owned by Dawson International plc. However, I believe that the Coblecrook dyeing works at Alva has been sold by Dawson International plc to Mr. David Hodgson of David Hodgson Ltd. also in Alva. Approximately 107 of the 160 jobs at Coblecrook will be preserved.

Lead Plumbing

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of properties in Scotland with lead plumbing; and what proportion of the total this represents.

Mr. Rifkind: The information is not held centrally.

Ferry Service (Tenders)

Mr. Macdonald asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the difference in cost between the lowest tender for the new Caledonian MacBrayne ferry to serve South Uist, Barra, Coll and Tiree and the successful tender from the Appledore Ferguson yard.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Details of tenders submitted are confidential, for commercial reasons.

Western Isles (Road Equivalent Tariff)

Mr. Macdonald asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what would be the extra cost of introducing a road equivalent tariff to the Western Isles; by how much it would reduce fares for commercial and private users; and when he now expects to introduce road equivalent tariff.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not available. There are no plans to introduce a road equivalent tariff, for the reasons given by the then Secretary of State for Scotland in his statement to the House on 21 February 1984 at column 697-698.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state those features of the curriculum proposed for city technology colleges which will differ from or be additional to his proposed core curriculum for the comparable age group in other secondary schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: City technology colleges will be independent schools outside the scope of statutory provisions for the national curriculum but they will be required as a condition of grant to implement the substances of the national curriculum. The time allocated to the foundation subjects will also enable city technology colleges to develop distinctive characteristics and they will be expected to use this opportunity to give special emphasis to the teaching of science and technology.

Ravensbourne College of Art and Design

Mr. Mullin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received concerning the charging by Ravensbourne college of art and design of mandatory levies of up to £150 per course to pay the cost of equipment for students taking B/TEC HND courses in communications engineering and design; and what is his policy with regard to such levies.

Mr. Dunn: None. The charging of such levies is a matter for determination by the individual institution.

Conservative Central Office (Correspondence)

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether his Private Office composed and typed replies to letters received regarding ministerial business on Conservative Central Office headed paper during the general election; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Replies on Conservative Central Office headed paper were handled by Central Office or by my political adviser.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Retirement Pension

Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the real value of the state retirement pension, expressed as a percentage of the value of the pension payable in 1978-79, for each subsequent year.

Mr. Scott: The real value of basic retirement pension, expressed as a percentage of its value in November 1978, is as follows for each subsequent year:

Date of increase	Real value in November 1987 terms
	Single per cent.	Married couple per cent.
November 1979	101·8	101·8
November 1980	102·9	102·9
November 1981	100·2	100·1
November 1982	104·6	104·6
November 1983	103·4	103·5
November 1984	103·6	103·6
November 1985	105·1	105·1
July 1986	104·5	104·5
April 1987	102·1	102·2

London Hospitals (Infectious Outbreaks)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the effect on London hospitals of the outbreak of the infection of multi-resistant staphylococcus aureus; and what steps are being taken to deal with this problem.

Mrs. Currie: Methicillin-resistant staphylococcus aureus (MRSA) has spread widely throughout hospitals in London and to a lesser extent elsewhere. In 1986, MRSA was reported by 170 hospitals participating in a national survey. A large proportion of reported cases are in North East Thames RHA where a working party has been looking at the problem and further recommendations are now being considered.

The effect of an outbreak on a hospital include the isolation of infected patients; restrictions on the transfer of patients between hospitals; possible restrictions on routine admissions and the swabbing of all staff.

Preventive measures include the maintenace of high standards of hygiene for both patients and staff and the thorough cleaning of infected wards. Infection control nurses have an increasingly vital role to play in the maintenance of hygiene standards and avoidance of cross-infection through effective liaison with all levels of hospital staff, including the organisation of training programmes for health care workers.

A national survey of MRSA is in continual progress. This survey, conducted jointly by the division of hospital infection of the public health laboratory service and the communicable disease surveillance centre, makes its results available to microbiologists allowing them to know whether patients and staff transferred to their hospitals come from areas where MRSA is prevalent.

Guidance on the control of multi-resistant staphylococcus aureus is available. The joint public health laboratory services/DHSS hospital infection working group has produced draft guidance on hospital infection in general. This document is presently out for consultation.

A copy of a fact sheet on MRSA was placed in the Library on 28 April 1987.

Local Office (Newham)

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what recent changes there have been in the service offered to the public at the Woodgrange Park road, Newham office of his Department; how many hours (a) a day and (b) a week the office is currently open; what alternative arrangements have been made for claimants; and if he will make resources available for the restoration of a full service.

Mr. Portillo: From the beginning of the year, public opening hours at Woodgrange Park office have been reduced intermittently from the normal 9.30 to 3.30 pm. From 10-20 June callers to the office were seen by appointment only, with an effective system to identify and admit instances of special need. These restrictions in the service were caused by trained staff vacancies and industrial action by some staff. Since then with the assistance of additional staff from regional reserve resources, normal opening hours have been maintained. The exception to this was 25 and 26 June when the office was again closed as part of a national campaign of industrial action. The regional reserve staff currently working at this office will be retained until an additional 24 permanent posts, recently added to the office's complement, are recruited and trained.

Conceptions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what date he expects the figures for 1985 relating to the number of conceptions in England and Wales by age of the mother to be made available.

Mrs. Currie: No date has yet been set for the publication of these statistics but it is expected that they will be published during August or September.

Contraceptives (Minors)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if, on the forthcoming publication of the figures for 1985 relating to the number of conceptions in England and Wales by age of the mother, he will review the current policy concerning the prescription of contraceptives to minors without parental consent;

(2) if, in view of the recent report by Sheffield health authority that the drop in attendances at family planning clinics by children aged under 16 years during the period in 1985 when it was deemed illegal to prescribe contraceptives to minors without parental consent did not lead to any increase in the number of births or abortions in that age group, he will reassess his policy on the prescription contraceptives to minors.

Mr. Newton: Policy is kept under review in the light of all the relevant factors and new information which becomes available, including such studies as that conducted in Sheffield.

Motor Neurone Disease Association

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what grants have been made available by his Department to the Motor Neurone Disease Association since 1983; whether consideration is being given to the long-term funding of research into motor neurone disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: In 1986 the Department awarded the Motor Neurone Disease Association a three-year grant at £10,000 per year under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 in support of its patient care services. In 1984-85 the association was given a grant of £6,000 towards the cost of a computer.

The main Government-funded agency for the promotion of medical and related biomedical research in this country is the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant-in-aid from the Department of Education and Science. I understand that the council is currently carrying out research into this disease and is always prepared to consider further soundly based scientific proposals for funding through its grants scheme in competition with other applications.

Foreign Visitors (Surgery)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many foreign visitors received non-urgent surgery in hospitals in the United Kingdom in each of the past eight years; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consideration has been given to restricting non-urgent surgery to British patients and imposing full charges on non-British patients who contracted their disease abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Information on the nationality of patients treated in National Health Service hospitals in England is not collected centrally. (Information for the rest of the United Kingdom is a matter for my right hon. Friends, the Secretaries of State for Wales and Northern Ireland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.)

It is residence in the United Kingdom, rather than citizenship or nationality, which is the basis of eligibility for free NHS treatment. Under regulations effective since October 1982, anyone not ordinarily resident is liable to charges for hospital treatment unless covered by a reciprocal health care agreement or other specific exemption.

Hospital Treatment (Fees)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consult insurance companies on lifting the seven-day statutory period for claims for fees for emergency treatment by hospitals; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Under section 155 of the Road Traffic Act 1972, an emergency treatment fee is payable by the person using the vehicle in respect of each individual given emergency treatment immediately following a road traffic accident. The fee may be claimed by a doctor attending the scene of an accident or by a hospital, and section 156 of the Act requires that it be requested within seven days of the treatment being given.

The Government intend to introduce legislation to abolish the emergency treatment fee payable to hospitals at the earliest convenient opportunity.

Pupils (Work Experience)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider introducing help towards travelling costs for school pupils taking part in work experience whose parents are in receipt of supplementary benefit.

Mr. Portillo: It is not the purpose of the supplementary benefits scheme to help with educational expenses, including those arising from participation in a work experience scheme. I understand the matter of such expenses is covered in Department of Education and Science circular 7/74 and Welsh Office Circular 135/74 which fall within the responsibilities of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Education and Science and for Wales.

Ethnic Minorities (Languages)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of (a) Asian men and (b) Asian women (i) in Leicester and (ii) in the United Kingdom speak little or no English.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that these figures are not available.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many interpreters are available in offices of his Department (a) in Leicester and (b) in the United Kingdom in areas where there is a significant ethnic minority population.

Mr. Portillo: DHSS offices do not employ interpreters as such, but most offices with catchment areas containing significant ethnic minority populations do have staff ready to use skills in ethnic minority languages to help claimants who have little or no English and have no one to help them. No record is maintained of numbers who do this. Leicester offices have staff proficient in Asian languages and ready to help in this way.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what leaflets other than the "Which Benefit?" guide are available to ethnic minority claimants seeking to exercise their rights in respect of social security benefits.

Mr. Portillo: "Which Benefit?" is the only social security leaflet nationally produced in Asian languages.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to ensure the effective distribution of information concerning benefits translated into ethnic minority languages.

Mr. Portillo: The leaflet "Which Benefit?", which describes the whole range of social security benefits is published in six Asian languages. These are Bengali, Chinese, Gujerati, Hindi, Punjabi and Urdu. It is planned to produce a Turkish version in 1988. There is insufficient demand for other forms or leaflets in these or other minority languages to justify national production.

On their own initiative a few local and regional offices have produced additional advice and information in ethnic minority languages. Local information officers continuously liaise with ethnic minority communities to supplement this.

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will take steps to ensure training for appropriate staff of his Department concerning the need for proper explanation to people from ethnic minorities who have language difficulties concerning their rights.

Mr. Portillo: The Department's staff training branch is currently developing a training course to be entitled "Service to the Multi-Racial Community". In addition to focusing the attention of staff on attitudes towards people from ethnic minorities and discussing racism, the course, of two-day's duration, will examine the problems of communication encountered by people of minority backgrounds, especially those of Afro-Caribbean and Asian origin.

The course which in its development has built on the experience the Department gained from earlier training exercises in this field, will be available in the autumn of 1987. Whilst no language training as such is provided for our staff, financial assistance is readily available under the further education and external training schemes for those staff who wish to further their personal interest or development by learning a modern language, as it is, of course, for a wide range of other subjects.

Clients with little or no command of English are encouraged to enlist the help of friends, relatives or voluntary agencies in pursuing their claims. Many DHSS offices whose catchment areas contain sizeable ethnic minorities do maintain lists of staff willing and able to use second language skills to help claimants in difficulties.

Departmental Pamphlets

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total cost of providing pamphlets in (a) the English language and (b) minority languages to inform actual or prospective applicants for social security benefits of their rights, during the last year for which records are available; and what is the estimated cost in 1987.

Mr. Portillo: In 1985-86 (the last year for which figures are available) £1,237,469 was spent on production of English language leaflets. £28,531 was spent on reprints of leaflets in six Asian languages. In 1987-88 the budget for social security leaflet production is £5,465,000. It is planned to spend about £120,000 on new editions of minority language leaflets. All figures are for nationally produced leaflets only.

Breast Milk Substitutes

Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what consultations have taken place with the British Medical Association about the advertising of breast milk substitutes; what was the outcome; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans are there to bring the United Kingdom voluntary code on breast milk substitutes into line with the World Health Organisation's code, "WHO International Code of Marketing of Breast Milk Substitutes"; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what are the enforcement responsibilities of the United Kingdom code monitoring committee with regard to breast milk substitutes; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what guidelines exist on advertising of breast milk substitutes; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The aim and principles of the World Health Organisation code as far as infant formulae are concerned are secured in the United Kingdom by the Food Manufacturers Federation's code, which includes advertising guidelines, the health Circular HC(83)13 and the FMF monitoring committee. We understand the committee is currently preparing a report for Government and when it is received we shall consider whether changes to the present arrangements are necessary. The relevant BMA committees were consulted before the present arrangements were established.

Kidney Stones (Treatment)

Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will name those district health authorities which have the new machines for treating patients with kidney stones by means of lasers, rather than by use of surgery; and how many machines his Department are planning to purchase in this financial year.

Mrs. Currie: The names of district health authorities which use lasers to treat kidney stones are not recorded centrally. A different form of treatment, known as extracorporeal shockwave lithotripsy, uses shock waves to disperse kidney stones. This service is being developed on a regional basis and it is for regional health authorities to plan their purchases of lithotripters. We are, however, aware that within the National Health Service, lithotripters are in use in the West Lambeth and South Manchester health authorities. A machine is being installed in Sheffield.

Supplementary Benefit (Appeals)

Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the backlog in the number of appeals to the local supplementary benefit tribunal serving the Bournemouth area.

Mr. Scott: The Bournemouth social security appeal tribunal covers the Department's Bournemouth and Poole local offices. The number of appeals awaiting action at these offices has decreased from 207 on 10 February 1987 to 82 on 30 June 1987.

Family Credit

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has made any assessment of how many low-income families in (a) the Leeds, Central constituency and (b) the Leeds metropolitan district council area will be worse off when the new family credit is introduced.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that it is not possible to make estimates on such a localised basis. On the illustrative assumptions in the technical annex to the White Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd 9690), family credit would be expected to reach about double the number of families now helped by family income supplement, and in all but a few families the amount of family credit payable would be greater than FIS. For the overall effect of the social security changes on the disposable income of working families (on the illustrative assumptions) I refer the hon. Member to tables 12(ii) of the technical annex.

Mr. P. J. Johnson

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department intends to reply to correspondence from Mr. P. J. Johnson of 40 Gloucester Road, Liverpool 6, a constituent of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen, which was dispatched on 16 January; when his Department intends to reply to correspondence from Mr. P. J. Johnson which was dispatched, by recorded delivery, on 18 May; if he will return documents included in correspondence to Mr. P. J. Johnson; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Conductive Education

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the application for assistance towards the cost of a four-year evaluation of the conductive education project being established in Birmingham by the National Foundation for Conductive Education was received by his Department; how much financial assistance is being sought; what meetings have been held with the national foundation; when it is anticipated a decision will be reached; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: the application by Birmingham university for assistance towards the cost of evaluating the four-year conductive education project being established in Birmingham was received in this Department on 2 March 1987. The original provisional estimate amounted to £245,200 with the proviso that this would need to be increased to allow for the increase in academic salaries. A revised estimate of £325,857 was received on 1 July. Officials from the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Health and Social Security had previously met the director of the National Foundation for Conductive Education on 23 January 1987 to discuss the evaluation project. A decision on the application will be made as soon as possible.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many kidney patients on average requiring dialysis are now being treated per million of the population; and if he will publish the figures for each of the regional health authorities.

Mrs. Currie: According to provisional information provided by the European dialysis and transplant association, the number of patients receiving dialysis treatment per million population in each regional health authority on 31 December 1986 was as follows:

Patients per million population

Region	Patients
Northern	158·1
Yorkshire	116·1
Trent	153·4
East Anglian	110·5
North West Thames	103·8
North East Thames	179·7
South East Thames South West Thames	[1]105·1
Wessex	66·8
Oxford	113·1
South Western	124·9
West Midlands	117·9
Mersey	96·5
Northern Western	126·3

[1] Regions have arrangements for shared service.

These figures should be treated with caution because patients do not always receive dialysis in the region in which they reside. Patients with a functioning transplant are excluded.

The statistics imply an average figure for England of 122·4 patients per million population receiving all forms of dialysis on 31 December 1986: the corresponding figure for the whole of the United Kingdom was 120·9.

Patient Costs

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the average cost of treating a patient on the National Health Service; and if he will break the figure down in terms of hospitalisation, drugs, surgery and general medical care.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the section on agriculture and food in the review of the forward-looking strategies for the advancement of women published recently by the ministerial group on women's issues. This section discusses the position of women in these areas and various ways in which my Department and others are giving help. Consultation takes place in my Department with a wide range of interested bodies including women's organisations, and training is given to my staff which, as appropriate, takes account of the position of women.

Food Exports (Radioactivity)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what British food exports have been returned to Britain over the past 12 months as a result of unacceptable levels of radioactivity, listing the quantities and the value of each product; and if he will make it his policy to reduce the maximum acceptable level within the United Kingdom to 600 becquerels a kilo.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Women's Needs

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. John Patten: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state the current number of entries, and the maximum and minimum number of entries, for each index of the police national computer over the last year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The current number of records and the maximum and minimum number of records in the year to 30 June 1987 for each substantive index of the police national computer are as follows:

	Number of entries on 30 June 1987	Maximum in last 12 months	Minimum in last 12 months
1. Stolen and suspect vehicles	437,450	437,450	381,482
2. Vehicle Owners	35,384,795	38,146,538	34,612,382
3. Chassis (Engine numbers)	711,873	711,873	646,343
4. Fingerprints	3,751,499	3,751,499	3,672,707
5. Fingerprints scene of crime	6,930,988	6,930,988	6,621,971
6. Criminal Names	5,164,206	5,164,206	5,126,840
7. Wanted/missing persons	99,341	107,093	98,008
8. Disqualified drivers	326,173	326,173	313,498
9. Convictions	1,872,045	1,872,045	1,239,405
10. Major Investigations	376,868	376,868	119,646
11. Crime Pattern Analyses	13,896	14,199	11,904

Telephone Tapping

Mr. Steinberg asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy to respond to inquiries from right hon. and hon. Members as to whether named constituents are subject to telephone tapping; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: Anyone who believes that the interception of his or her telephone communications has been authorised may apply to the Tribunal established under the Interception of Communications Act 1985 for an investigation.

I shall continue the longstanding policy of successive Governments never to cofirm or deny whether interception has been authorised in any particular case, irrespective of whether interception has been authorised or not.

Trans-frontier Television and Broadcasting

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the latest progress achieved in formulating a Council of Europe Convention on trans-frontier television and broadcasting.

Mr. Renton: Six meetings have been held in Strasbourg since March to discuss the formulation of the Convention and good progress is being made. The relevant interests in the United Kingdom are currently being consulted on the latest draft text before discussions resume at the beginning of September.

Although there are still a number of issues to be resolved, we are hopeful that agreement can be reached on a final text before the end of the year.

Parliamentary Boundary Commission

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the timetable of work of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I will reply as soon as possible.

Korea

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applications have been made for visas to enter the United Kingdom from the People's Republic of Korea in each of the past eight years; and how many were granted.

Mr. Renton: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Foreign Visitors

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce a requirement that all foreign visitors should have to give a written undertaking when applying for a visa that they are free from disease; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: No. Entry clearance officers already have the power to refer for medical examination any applicant for entry clearance who:

(a) intends to remain in the United Kingdom for more than six months;

(b) mentions health or medical treatment as a reason for his visit;

(c) appears not to be in good health; or

(d) appears to be mentally or physically abnormal

Entry clearance officers also have discretion, which the immigration rules require them to exercise sparingly, to refer for examination in any other case.

Isle of Man Free Port

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he was informed by the Isle of Man Government of the proposals by a South African company to operate in the Isle of Man free port site; what observations he made on the proposal; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether he was consulted by the Isle of Man Government on the proposals by a South African company to develop on the Isle of Man free port site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Isle of Man authorities informed Her Majesty's Government in January 1987 of the possibility of a United Kingdom subsidiary of a South African company operating in the free port. The Isle of Man authorities were informed that there was no reason why the use of the free port by the company concerned for the purpose of its operations would be contrary to United Kingdom policy.

The Isle of Man authorities have given clear assurances that under no circumstances would any arrangements be entered into which would run counter to United Kingdom policy regarding restrictive measures on trade with South Africa, and we are satisfied that they have established for this purpose appropriate legal and administrative controls over the use of the free port.

Polish War Veterans

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will waive the naturalisation fee for those Polish war veterans who wish to become British citizens; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: No: it is reasonable to expect those who wish to become British citizens to pay for the cost of dealing with their applications, and concessions to one group would only increase the costs to others.

Woodlands Crescent, Knutsford

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department plans to sell its four remaining properties in Woodlands crescent, High Legh, Knutsford, Cheshire; and for how long and why they have been empty.

Mr. John Patten: There are at present five empty prison staff quarters in Woodlands crescent, High Legh, Knutsford, Cheshire, two of which are surplus to operational requirements. One of the two properties has been sold, subject to contract, and the other is about to be placed on the market. These surplus properties have remained empty since 1982 but had been retained in the expectation that they would be required for use by staff at Her Majesty's Youth Custody Centre, Thorn Cross. Of the remaining three properties, which have been empty since May this year, one has been allocated and the other two await allocation to prison staff.

Captain Simon Hayward

Mr. Gorst asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received any request from the Swedish defence lawyer appointed to represent Captain Simon Hayward to provide evidence only available from official British sources that could assist him in the defence of his client; and if he will give an assurance that any such evidence held by police or other authorities in the United Kingdom and material to proving the innocence of Captain Hayward, in the event of charges being preferred against him, will not be withheld or suppressed.

Mr. Douglas Hurd: We have no record that such a request has yet been received in the Home Office. The release of information held by the police or other authorities in this country is a matter for those authorities to decide. It is normal practice for the police forces of member countries of Interpol to make available to each other evidence which might assist the conduct of a criminal investigation.

Juries (London Area)

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis into allegations that there is a gang in Great Britain, particularly in the London area, which has funding of at least £1,000,000 and which brings illegal pressure to bear on jurors selected to serve on court cases of a serious nature.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis that the police have no evidence that such a gang exists.

Insider Dealing

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to provide increased penalties for insider dealing involving mandatory prison sentences for serious offences; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Clause 42 of the Criminal Justice Bill will raise the maximum penalty for insider dealing from two to seven years' imprisonment. We do not intend to make imprisonment mandatory, however, or otherwise to interfere with the courts' discretion in sentencing, which enables them to take account of all the aggravating or mitigating factors in a particular case.

ENVIRONMENT

Community Charge

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his best estimate of the average pyment of the poll tax to be levied upon each adult in Nottingham in each of the years (a) 1990, (b) 1991 and (c) 1992.

Mr. Howard: Since the new system will not come into effect until 1990, it is not possible to say what the level of the community charge in Nottingham will be when it is introduced. However, I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) on 29 June, at column 44.

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what amendments he proposes to introduce following the introduction of the community charge to existing legislation which bases levels of compensation upon gross or rateable values; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Alternative methods of assessing statutory compensation payments which are currently based on rateable or annual value are under consideration. Non-domestic rateable values will of course continue.

Dog Wardens

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many local authorities employ dog wardens; and how many dog wardens are employed in each case.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not collected by the Department, but I understand that the joint advisory committee on pets in society estimates that some 200 local authorities in Great Britain currently operate dog warden services. No reliable information is available as to how many dog wardens are employed in each case.

Parish Councils

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to extend the powers of parish councils, particularly in planning.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Greenwich (Inner Area Programme)

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department received the London borough of Greenwich's bid for the 1987-88 inner area programme; what approvals have so far been given and at what annual cost; what projects remain to be approved and at what annual cost; and when he expects to announce decisions on the remaining projects.

Mr. Trippier: The bid was received on 1 December 1986. Subsequently there have been consultations with Greenwich and other Government Departments. Approval has been given to continuing commitments arising from the traditional urban programme and other designated district arrangements at a cost of £799,000 in 1987-88. Decisions are outstanding on 12 projects costing in total £743,000 in 1987-88. I shall write to the hon. Member shortly.

Inner Area Programme

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the inner area programme bids received from each of the inner London boroughs for 1987-88 indicating which have been approved and the date of approval.

Mr. Trippier: The information is shown in the following table.

Borough	Provisional Inner Area Programme Allocation[1] £ million	Bid Received £ million	Date of Approval
Greenwich	1·6	1·5	[2]
Hackney	10·8	13·9	[2]
Hammersmith and Fulham	5·0	7·9	[2]
Haringey	2·0	3·2	10 April 1987
Islington	10·0	17·6	[2]
Kensington and Chelsea	1·25	1·2	29 April 1987
Lambeth	12·8	20·8	31 March 1987
Lewisham	1·5	1·5	22 April 1987
Southwark	1·75	3·5	31 March 1987
Tower Hamlets	4·5	9·3	[2]
Wandsworth	4·5	6·5	[2]

[1] Announced by Minister for Housing, Urban Affairs and Construction on 30 January 1987; see Official Report, 30 January.
[2] Approvals have been given to continuing commitments from 1986-87 on these inner area programmes

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what proposals he now has for the disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Moynihan: As my right hon. Friend made clear in his statement on 1 May, it is now for UK NIREX Ltd. to come forward with proposals for the development of a deep multi-purpose facility for the disposal of low and intermediate-level radioactive waste.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Redwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many planning appeals have been submitted to his Department in each of the years 1984, 1985 and 1986 in respect of planning applications that have been turned down by the Wokingham district council; and how many planning appeals in each of those years have resulted in the decision of Wokingham district council being overturned.

Mr. Waldegrave: The number of planning appeals received from the Wokingham district council area in 1984, 1985 and 1986 is given in the table together with the number of planning appeals that were allowed in each of those years.

	1984	1985	1986
Appeals received	79	104	105
Appeals allowed	20	27	35

Local Authorities (Rates and Precepts)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list in descending order all English local authorities on the basis of the percentage change in their local rate or precept from 1981-82 to 1987-88, showing in each case the percentage change in current expenditure in the same period;

(2) if he will list in descending order all English local authorities on the basis of the percentage change in their current expenditure from 1981-82 to 1987-88, showing in each case the percentage change in the local rate or precept in the same period.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed the information in the House of Commons Library.

Tenanted Housing

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list any request for disposals of tenanted housing, other than to sitting tenants, awaiting his consideration for special consent.

Mr. Waldegrave: The only outstanding applications for consent to dispose of tenanted housing are by Ashford borough council, for disposal of the freehold of two flats, and by the London residuary body, for the disposal of the freehold of eight flats.

Local Authorities (Grant-related Expenditure)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in descending order, using their 1987-88 budgets, all English local authorities on the basis of the percentage above or below their grant-related expenditure assessments for 1987-88.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed the information in the House of Commons Library.

Urban Development Grants

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many projects to date are covered by urban development grants; how much public expenditure is involved in the current financial year; and how much is committed thereby in future years.

Mr. Ridley: A total of 242 projects have been approved for urban development grant to date. The total public expenditure on these projects is estimated at £124 million, of which £65 million had been incurred up to the end of 1986-87. Of the remaining £59 million, it is estimated that £25 million will be incurred in the current financial year.

Non-domestic Rates

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the total of non-domestic rates paid to local authorities in Great Britain in each year from 1974-75 to 1987-88.

Mr. Ridley: The informaion is as follows:

Total rates paid by non-domestic ratepayers in Great Britain

	£ billion
1974-75	2·0
1975-76	2·6
1976-77	2·8
1977-78	3·1
1978-79	3·4
1979-80	4·0
1980-81	5·0
1981-82	6·1
1982-83	6·9
1983-84	7·2
1984-85	7·6
1985-86	8·2
1986-87	9·2
1987-88	9·8

Departmental Communications

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish (a) the circulars, (b) the circular letters, (c) the statutory instruments and (d) other communications sent to all authorities, or all authorities in a class, by his Department in England in each year from 1 April 1981 to the present date.

Mr. Ridley: Copies of statutory instruments and numbered circulars issued by my Department since 1 April 1981 are available in the Library. I shall write to the hon. Member with a list of circular letters issued by my Department, and will arrange for that list to be placed in the Library. Details of other communications to all local authorities could only be produced at disproportionate cost.

Regional Development Fund

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the number of applications made to his Department by local authority enterprise boards for grants from the European regional development fund.

Mr. Ridley: No applications have been received from local authority enterprise boards for European regional development fund grants since 1980. However, under the main fund regulation we have received a total of three applications from enterprise trusts and enterprise agencies.

Derelict Land

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report for each of the metropolitan district council areas (a) the total acreage and (b) the proportion of all land designated as derelict at the latest available date.

Mr. Ridley: The information is given in the following table. The figures in column (b) are based on information available at 1 April 1982, the date of the last survey of derelict land in England. The figures shown in brackets represent the proportion of derelict land which is considered to justify reclamation.

A further survey of derelict land is planned for April 1988.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the amount of derelict land grant made available to individual local authorities for each year since 1979, and where appropriate split these into class A and class B grants.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Local Authority Expenditure

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish for each authority selected for rate limitations in 1987-88, the percentage increase or decrease in its 1987-88 budgeted total expenditure compared with its original 1986-87 budget.

Mr. Ridley: The information, based on 1986-87 expenditure data used for the purposes of the rate limitation report 1986 and the latest 1987-88 budget figures supplied by authorities to my Department, is as follows:

	Percentage
Basildon	−0·2

Community Charge (Ministers of Religion)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what representations he has received concerning special provision under the proposed community charge for ministers of religion;

(2) whether he intends to make special provision under the community charge for ministers of religion.

Mr. Howard: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Callywhite Lane Industrial Estate

Mr. Harry Barnes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what requests he has received to meet a deputation from firms, councils and others directly affected by the underground fire burning on Callywhite lane industrial estate in Dronfield, Derbyshire to discuss ways and means by which his Department will assist in overcoming this emergency.

Mr. Trippier: In addition to the hon. Member's request to my right hon. Friend to meet a deputation to discuss this matter, we have received similar requests from the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr Benn) the former hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East, Mr. Ellis, industrialists on the estate, solicitors acting for landowners, the North-East Derbyshire district council and the Dronfield town council.

Churches and Charities (Local Government Finance)

Mr. David Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what arrangements are envisaged for churches and charities under the proposed reform of local government finance.

Mr. Howard: So far as non-domestic properties are concerned the existing exemptions and reliefs from rating will continue broadly unamended. This will apply to properties such as churches and other places of public worship, church halls, sheltered workshops and charity shops. Institutions, such as convent schools, will be apportioned as between non-domestic and domestic parts. Existing reliefs will be availble in respect of the non-domestic parts.

Those individuals who live in properties owned by churches or charities will be treated in the same way as all other individuals, that is those under 18 — or over 18 and in full-time schooling — will not be liable for the community charge, nor will patients resident in hospitals, homes for the elderly and other similar caring institutions. Students will pay 20 per cent. of the community charge. Those on low incomes will be eligible for rebates of up to 80 per cent. of the community charge. Benefit entitlements will be increased to assist those on the lowest incomes in paying the 20 per cent. contribution.

Community Charge

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the likely cost to local authorities of collecting a community charge as opposed to domestic rates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1987, c. 100]: Our preliminary estimate is that the cost of collecting the community charge may be, broadly, up to twice the cost of collecting domestic rates. However, much depends on individual local authorities. The introduction of a wholly new system offers the opportunity for a reappraisal of existing practices, with the aim of reducing unit costs for example, by the wider use of direct

DEFENCE

Plutonium

Mr. Benn asked the Secretary of State for Defence from where plutonium exported to the United States for military use since May 1979 came; and whether there are any plans for future exports of plutonium for military use under the 1959 amendment of the 1958 UK-US mutual defence agreement on atomic energy.

Mr. Sainsbury: On the export of plutonium to the United States, I refer the right hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Eddisbury (Mr. Goodlad) to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 19 November 1984 at column 25, which quoted several earlier replies, including that given by my hon. Friend the Member for Chertsey and Walton (Sir G. Pattie) to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 25 April 1984 at column 506, which may now be updated to read, "during the past 16 years". On the second part of the right hon. Member's question, I have nothing to add to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) on 19 February 1985 at columns 406-7.

Warsaw Pact

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what conventional force categories the Government consider the Warsaw pact to have serious or overwhelming superiority.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to annex A and paragraphs 108 and 109 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" (Cmnd. 101-I).

Trident Submarines

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether his Department has considered equipping the Trident submarines with C4 and D5 warheads should the INF talks be concluded successfully.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The decision made on 11 March 1982, announced at columns 975-7, to purchase the Trident D5 missile rather than the C4 missile remains the basis of the United Kingdom Trident programme and is unrelated to the progress of current negotiations on INF.

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the yield of Trident warheads is intended to be greater than that of the modernised Chevaline warheads.

Mr. Sainsbury: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on the yield of British nuclear warheads. However, as the essay "The Minimum Deterrent" which appears on pages 39 to 42 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" makes clear, Trident, when introduced into service, will represent no more than a minimum deterrent.

Cruise Missiles

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether, following the nuclear planning group meeting at Stavanger, he has held further discussions on the possibility of basing air-launched cruise missiles at Fairford, Lakenheath or Upper Heyford or on whether these bases will be used to host planes carrying air-launched cruise missiles;

(2) whether, following the nuclear planning group meeting at Stavanger, he has held further discussions on the possibility of basing sea-launched cruise missiles at Holy Loch and other United States bases in Britain.

Mr. Ian Stewart: It remains NATO policy to maintain the minimum forces necessary for deterrence. The NATO Alliance continually assesses its nuclear capability and makes whatever adjustments are necessary to maintain deterrence, taking account of arms control proposals and other developments. Various possible adjustments are under consideration within NATO on a confidential basis.

Chemical Weapons

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether, following the United States congressional vote stipulating that at least one ally should store binary chemical weapons before existing stocks are removed, the Government have been approached by the United States to be that ally.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. The position remains as set out in the essay on chemical weapons and arms control in chapter 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" (Cmnd. 101).

Neutron Weapons

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will publish in the Official Report information on whether British troops have been trained for the use of neutron weapons or have participated in exercises requiring this training.

Mr. Freeman: No British units have been trained in the use of enhanced radiation weapons, nor have they participated in exercises requiring this training.

Ballistic Missiles

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence if the Government have revised their view of the necessity for anti-tactical ballistic missile defence in anticipation of a successful conclusion to the INF talks.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The progress of the INF talks will, of course, be taken into account in the evaluation of the threat from tactical ballistic missiles. The current NATO studies, in which the United Kingdom is participating, are examining the threat from conventional missiles and possible counters to this, and there is no reason to discontinue them.

Low-flying Training

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what consideration has been given to alternatives to low flying over land as methods of training service pilots.

Mr. Freeman: The RAF training programme already uses simulators as much as possible. However there are limits to their training value as they cannot simulate all aspects of flying. Low-flying training is therefore necessary to give pilots full experience in realistic conditions, and this generally needs to be over land as there is very limited training value in flying over flat and featureless areas of ocean.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the military value of low-flying exercises over land.

Mr. Freeman: Low-flying training and exercises over land are essential to enable the RAF to master the necessary techniques to fulfil its tasks whilst avoiding detection by enemy radar.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the implications for public support for the services of the disturbance from low-flying training exercises.

Mr. Freeman: We recognise public concern about the disturbance which can be caused by low-flying military aircraft, and do our best to minimise such disturbance, but we do not believe that this issue detracts from the generous public support given to the armed forces.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are taken to warn the public about imminent low-flying exercises.

Mr. Freeman: It is not practicable to provide advance notice about routine low-level flying, since such training is conducted on a day-to-day basis, as weather and other considerations allow. Advance warning is however given to hon. Members, the Press and organisations such as the National Farmers' Union about major training exercises.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many pilots have been disciplined for breaching low-flying regulations in each year since 1979; and what was the nature of the discipline.

Mr. Freeman: Very few complaints reveal irresponsible breaches of the low flying regulations and therefore formal disciplinary action is infrequent. Between 1979 and 1986 there was one case of a pilot being court-martialled, two of pilots being fined and five of pilots being summarily disciplined for offences that fell short of courts-martial. Less severe infringements are dealt with by informal procedures and details are not available.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many complaints were made with regard to low-flying exercises in each year since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Mr. Thomas) on 22 April, Official Report column 584. The 1987 figure for complaints about low-flying training to the end of May is 1,418.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will set up an inquiry to evaluate the cost effectiveness of low-flying training exercises in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: To maintain an efficient and cost-effective modern air force, there is no substitute for thorough training, including adequate training for pilots at low level. Exercises in which forces are co-ordinated, sometimes with other NATO forces, as they could be in any future conflict, are a necessary part of this training. Major low-flying exercises also enable us to test our air defence capability.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will institute a ban on low flying in the national parks pending the results of the inquiry into the most recent accident involving a Jaguar and a Tornado aircraft.

Mr. Freeman: No. The regulations governing the low-flying system are kept continuously under review and altered as necessary. When the board of inquiry has reported on the reasons for the accident these will be taken into account in our continuing review of safety procedures.

RAF Pilots

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many trained pilots have ended their service with the Royal Air Force in the five years following the completion of their training in each year since 1979.

Mr. Freeman: The number of trained pilots who have ended their service with the Royal Air Force in the five years following the completion of their training in each year since 1979 was:

	Number
FY 79-80	7
FY 80-81	4
FY 81-82	4
FY 82-83	3
FY 83-84	7
FY 84-85	7
FY 85-86	6
FY 86-87	13

These figures include pilots who left voluntarily, were discharged or died.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many pilots have been lost in each of the last 12 years in military and training aircraft accidents.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to the annual "Statements on Defence Estimates" which include each year information on personnel killed in service aircraft accidents.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many fully trained pilots were employed in each of the services in each of the last 12 years.

Mr. Freeman: The numbers of fully trained pilots employed in each of the services since 1976 are:

	RN	Army	RAF
1976	1	742	4,346
1977	1	731	3,965
1978	1	696	3,688
1979	1	643	3,501

1986	673	652	3,426
1987	690	650	3,420

[1]Prior to 1980 manpower figures for the RN were not kept in such a way as to enable trained and under training pilots to be identified separately.

Aircraft (Training Exercises)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will list all military aircraft based in the United Kingdom over the last 12 years, including North Atlantic Treaty Organisation aircraft, involved in training exercises over the United Kingdom mainland.

Mr. Freeman: During this period, a large number of aircraft have been based in the United Kingdom, including much of the Royal Air Force and many aircraft of our NATO allies. To compile the information requested would involve disproportionate cost and effort.

Jaguar Aircraft

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest cost of a Jaguar aircraft in each of the specifications being supplied to the services.

Mr. Sainsbury: No new Jaguars have been delivered to the RAF since 1978 but the cost adjusted to current prices would be between £5·5 million and £6 million depending on variant.

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Jaguar aircraft have been involved in accidents during the last 12 years; and how many were irreparably damaged and on what dates.

Mr. Freeman: Since 1 June 1975, there have been 135 serious Jaguar accidents. In these, 49 aircraft sustained irreparable damage on the following dates:

5 February 1976
2 July 1976
15 September 1976
17 September 1976
14 December 1976

24 June 1987

Tornado Aircraft

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest cost of a Tornado aircraft in each of the specifications being supplied to the services.

Mr. Sainsbury: The latest estimated costs at 1986-87 average outturn prices for the two versions of the Tornado are:

	£ million
Tornado F Mk 2 (air defence variant)	17·5
Tornado GR1 (strike)	18·0

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tornado aircraft have been involved in accidents during the last 12 years; and how many were irreparably damaged and on what dates.

Mr. Freeman: Since entering service with the RAF, there have been 37 serious Tornado accidents. In these, 12 aircraft sustained irreparable damage on the following dates:

27 September 1983
28 October 1983
6 February 1984
12 July 1984
18 July 1984
8 November 1984
12 December 1985
2 December 1986
10 December 1986
30 March 1987
3 June 1987
17 June 1987

Directorate General of Quality Assurance

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what sites are currently being considered for the headquarters of the directorate general of quality assurance; and when he expects the final decision to be announced.

Mr. Sainsbury: I cannot yet add to my predecessor's reply to the hon. Member on 3 April 1987, which was that the further appraisal of the future accommodation needs of the directorate general of defence quality assurance is still in progress.

Surface-to-air Missiles (Afghanistan)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence why he will not make a statement on the collaboration between the United States of America and Her Majesty's Government in sending surface-to-air missiles to Afghanistan.

Mr. Sainsbury: Successive Administrations have not felt obliged to answer questions of this kind.

Challenger Tank

Mr. Speed asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans currently exist to improve the fighting capability of the Challenger tank.

Mr. Sainsbury: The capabilities of our tank fleet are kept under constant review. A number of equipment enhancements are currently in hand. A new thermal imaging and observation sight is presently being fitted to all Challenger tanks. New developments now well under way include a new gun, together with its improved ammunition and elevation gearbox, improved computer sighting system and new target acquisition and solid state electronic gun control systems.

Trident

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer of 1 July, Official Report, column 114 to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North why he is unwilling to indicate the nature and extent of the penalty clauses operative in the event of cancellation of the Trident programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: There are no penalty clauses attached to the Trident programme.

HMS Onyx

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what official visits have been paid to foreign ports by the diesel submarine HMS Onyx since 1 January.

Mr. Ian Stewart: HMS Onyx visited Las Palmas, Spain in March 1987, and is currently visiting Valparaiso, Chile.

Chile (Navy Vessel Visits)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what visits have been paid by Royal Naval vessels to ports in Chile since 1 January.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Visits have been made by Her Majesty's ships to Chilean ports on the following occasions since 1 January 1987:

HMS Herald—February 1987
HMS Minerva, RFA Bayleaf—May 1987
HMS Onyx—July 1987

O Class Submarines

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards the export of O class submarines to non-North Atlantic Treaty Organisation member countries.

Mr. Sainsbury: Any such sale would be subject to the normal export licensing procedure. All applications for permission to export defence equipment take full account of political strategic and security interests.

AV-8B Aircraft

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the AV-8B aircraft, in the light of the United States House of Representatives Armed Service Committee's decision to withdraw funding for the programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: A decision on the future of the AV-8B aircraft is a matter for the United States Government.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he or his officials have had with officials of the Department of Defence in the United States of America and with members of the United States Congress on the future of United States-United Kingdom collaboration in aircraft production, in the light of the House of Representatives Armed Services Committee's decision to end funding of the AV-8B programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: My noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement and Ministry of Defence officials have had a variety of discussions with the United States Department of Defence and members of the United States Congress about what would be the implications for transAtlantic collaboration in general and for the particular programme of collaboration on the procurement of the AV-8B for the United States Marine Corps and the Harrier GR Mk 5 for the Royal Air Force if a decision were to be taken to end funding of AV-8B production. Congressional consideration of this matter is of course not yet complete.

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many AV-8B aircraft have been ordered; what are the planned delivery dates; and what contingency plans exist for their disposal in the event of the cancellation of the programme by the United States Congress.

Mr. Sainsbury: These are matters for the United States Government; but I understand that orders for 328 AV-8B aircraft (including trainers) are planned, that 86 aircraft have been delivered to date and that the delivery of the remainder should be completed by the mid-1990s.

Defence Equipment (United States of America)

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the value of imports of defence equipment from the United States of America for each of the last six years, together with the corresponding figures for United Kingdom defence exports to the United States of America.

Mr. Sainsbury: It has not been the practice of successive Governments to publish detailed figures for our defence trade with individual countries. The annual defence balance of trade ratios agreed with the United States for each of the last six years, United States: United Kingdom are:

	Ratios
1980-81	2·0:1
1981-82	2·0:1
1982-83	1·9:1
1983-84	2·1:1
1984-85	1·9:1
1985-86	1·5:1

Thorn-EMI Factory, Bulwell

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the reasons for and the effects upon the United Kingdom's defence of the closure of the Thorn-EMI factory in Bulwell, Nottingham, a principal supplier of nerve gas detection equipment to his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1987, c. 114]: Subject to the satisfactory fulfilment of their contractual obligations to the Department, closures of sites by defence contractors are entirely a matter for the commercial judgment of the companies themselves. We expect no difficulty in finding alternative sources of

BR (Investment)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what level of investment has been made by British Rail in the London Midland region in each of the past eight years.

Mr. David Mitchell: Investment in infrastructure (cash prices) in the London Midland region in each of the past eight years is as follows:

	£ million
1979	33·9
1980	40·9
1981	36·2
1982	18·5
1983	23·5
1984-85[1]	57·5
1985-86	47·6
1986-87	42·7

[1] 15-month accounting period.

These figures do not include investment in locomotives and rolling stock, as it is impossible to apportion BR's rolling stock accurately between regions.

BR (Passenger Satisfaction)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he takes to monitor the level of passenger satisfaction with British Rail.

Mr. David Mitchell: British Rail has been asked to report in its annual report and accounts on its performance against agreed quality standards. I shall, in addition, be receiving reports on this from it quarterly. I also see the annual reports of the statutory rail consumer committees and my officials and I keep in touch with them. Finally, I expect shortly to receive regular reports from British Rail on the results of its surveys of passenger satisfaction with Network Southeast services.

Transport (Manchester)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Transport what reply he is sending to the recent approach made to him by the chairman of the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority concerning both the rail link to Manchester airport and the light rapid transport project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: My Department is working closely with the PTA, and PTE and, in the case of the airport rail link, BR and the airport company on the necessary evaluations of these projects. I fully recognise the importance which the PTA attaches to them and its wish for early decisions, but those involved also understand that the Government must be satisfied that the projects represent good value for money before public resources can be committed to them.

Tax Licensing

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he plans to revise circular 3/85 on tax licensing in the light of the judgment in Regina v Reading Borough Council ex parte Egan.

Mr. David Mitchell: When a transcript of this judgment is available I shall consider whether the advice contained in circular 3/85 should be revised.

M25

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the latest five-day and seven-day average traffic flows on a 16 and 24-hour per day basis on each section of the M25, indicating the month when the counts were taken.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information requested is given in the following table. The figures shown are for May 1987 apart from the sections between junctions 1-2, 2-3 and 12-13 where automatic counting loops will be installed later this year. The flows given for those sections are taken from a one-day count conducted on Tuesday 3 June 1986.

M4

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will state the latest five-day and seven-day average traffic flows on a 16 and 24-hour basis on each section of the M4 between west London and Reading.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information available is as follows:

		24-hr 7-day	16-hr 7-day	24-hr 5-day	16-hr 5-day
1983	J1-2[2]	89,000	[1]	92,000	89,000

Mr. Neil Hamilton asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the availability of motorcycle helmet visors complying with the new regulations on abrasion resistance; and if, to avoid insurance complications for motorcyclists unable to comply with the new regulations, he will waive temporarily the new requirements.

Mr. Peter Bottomley [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 17]: I am informed that the major supplier of motorcycle helmet visors is presently dealing with a backlog of orders and that some motorcyclists therefore could be finding it difficult to obtain the visors they need which comply with the regulations. Any motorcyclist in that position who wishes to continue to wear a visor not meeting the new requirements would be well advised to check the position with his insurance company.

DEFENCE

Radiation

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any activity, discharge or emission, including storage of radioactive materials, from the Aldermaston and Burghfield atomic weapons plants subjects any member of the general public in any one year to a radiation dose of more than 0·1mSv.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. The recent report (NRPB—202) by the National Radiological Protection Board assesses the doses likely to have been experienced by members of the public arising from the airborne and liquid discharge from AWRE, Aldermaston and ROF (Burghfield) over the years since these establishments began their operations: the maximum doses assessed by NRPB are very low, considerably less than 0·1mSv per annum. These estimates are consistent with the extensive programmes of environmental monitoring conducted in the area by MOD and also independently by the environmental authorising departments. Radiation emitted from radioactive materials handled and stored at these sites does not add to the very low doses. Thorough internal scrutiny and independent investigations such as the Pochin inquiry, have failed to identify any other potential pathways for radiation exposure where doses to members of the public would exceed those given by NRPB in its recent report.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what actual numbers of service men and women were registered on the electoral roll at the time of the recent general election under the special provision made for members of the armed forces; and what percentage this amounted to in the case of each service.

Mr. Freeman: At 31 March 1987, the last date for which figures are available, some 203,763 voting registrations for service personnel were held on index. Based on current strengths of service personnel this amounts to an overall registration level of 64 per cent. for all three services. The figures by service are as follows:

		Percentage
RN RM	50,809	76
Army	103,389	65
RAF	49,565	53

All figures exclude service spouses also registered under the Service voters provisions.

Lea Aviation Ltd.

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if it is with his approval that two serving Royal Air Force officers are directly connected with a private company, Lea Aviation Ltd., which uses Royal Air Force assets for commercial gain;

(2) who authorised the use by Lea Aviation Ltd. at an air show on the North Weald airfield, Epping, of front-line Royal Air Force aircraft including Tornados, Harriers and Hawks;

(3) on what basis is the amount paid by Lea Aviation Ltd. to his Department for the use of Royal Air Force assets computed;

(4) whether the contract for the use of Royal Air Force aircraft at the recent private air show operated by Lea Aviation Ltd. at the North Weald airfield, Epping, was put out for tender;

(5) who provided the security arrangements for the protection of the Tornado, Harrier and Hawk aircraft which took part in a recent airshow organised by Lea Aviation Ltd. at North Weald airfield, Epping; and who paid for the arrangements.

Mr. Freeman: I shall answer shortly.

Serving Military Personnel (Commercial Organisations)

Mr. Denzil Davies asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the guidelines for circumstances whereby serving military personnel are allowed to be directly connected with commercial organisations whose business includes the use, for private profit, of military equipment.

Mr. Freeman: I shall answer shortly.

WALES

Education Statistics

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of school leavers in Wales with five or more higher grade O-level CSE passes in each local education authority stayed on in full-time education after the minimum school-leaving age in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: In 1984-85, it is estimated that 62 per cent. of school leavers in Wales who possessed five or more higher grade GCE O-level or CSE examination passes continued full-time further or higher education. Comparable figures for each local authority are not available.

Dairy Industry

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the state of the dairy industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Although measures have been introduced to curb the continuing over-supply problem in the milk sector, latest figures confirm that incomes on all dairy farms in Wales went up by 52 per cent. in 1985-86, and the dairy sector remains the most profitable of the livestock commodities in Wales.

Mid-Wales Development Board

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he has any plans to give extra financial aid to the Mid-Wales Development Board in 1987; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The resources made available to Mid-Wales Development for 1987-88 will make possible an 8 per cent. increase in the board's gross expenditure compared with last year. Funding in subsequent years will be considered during the course of this year's review of public expenditure.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food (Radioactivity)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what British food exports have been returned to Britain over the past 12 months as a result of unacceptable levels of radioactivity, listing the quantities and the value of each product; and if he will make it his policy to reduce the maximum acceptable level within the United Kingdom to 600 Bq/kg.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987]: This information is not available. There is no statutory requirement for exporters to furnish details of any returned consignments.

The British Government have made it clear that they regard the level of 600 Bq/kg adopted for Community imports from third countries as unduly restrictive and are supporting moves to establish more scientifically based levels in future EC emergency regulations.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Women

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he takes to ensure that overseas aid funds are utilised in ways which benefit women and in projects which are for the improvement of womens' lives and under their control.

Mr. Chris Patten: We recognise the importance of taking the role of women fully into account in aid projects. Some of our projects include special components for women. We are prepared to contribute to projects specifically devoted to helping women.

Aid and Trade Provision

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he intends to take in the light of the conclusion in the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on bilateral aid that the aid and trade provision has introduced a conflict of priorites.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am studying the second report of the Foreign Affairs Committee on bilateral aid. The Government will give their detailed observations on the report, including the section on the aid and trade provision, after the summer recess.

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list, for each of the last five years (a) the amounts spent on the aid and trade provision, (b) the sums received by each recipient company and (c) the nature of the contracts so funded.

Mr. Chris Patten: The amount spent under the aid and trade provision in the last five financial years was follows:

	£ million
1982-83	46·8
1983-84	28·4
1984-85	59·5
1985-86	36·5
1986-87	181·3

Aid Programme

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when, in the light of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Countries' report, published on 19 June showing Britain's aid to have fallen from 0·34 per cent. of gross national product to 0·32 per cent, he anticipates achieving the United Nations target of 0·7 per cent.

Mr. Chris Patten: We shall continue to maintain our substantial aid programme. The planned cash increases in aid set out in the 1987 public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 56-I) are intended to maintain the real value of the aid programme. Like previous Administrations, we have not set a timetable for achieving the United Nations target for aid of 0·7 per cent. of GNP.

Third World

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the new flow of resources between Britain and the third world in each of the last five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: Net official and private flows from Britain to developing countries in each of the last five years were:

	£ million	Percent of GNP

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. Butcher: My Department is aware of the need for women to play their full part in the wealth creation process. It has adopted a number of measures to encourage women to pursue non-traditional careers in industry, for example in engineering, information technology and management generally. Some of these measures are described in more detail in the Home Office review of the United Nations' "Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women", a copy of which is in the Library. They include support for initiatives in education, such as the Government's engineering and technology programme; and encouraging companies to tailor their recruitment and career structures to the needs of women. Industry is responding positively.

I am also keen to increase the number of women taking up public appointments for which my Department is responsible. We encourage women's organisations to submit details of possible appointees, and we welcome their views on the Department's work. The training offered to all staff in the Department covers the importance of bearing in mind the needs of particular groups, including women, and officials are kept fully informed of equal opportunities requirements in personnel matters.

British Telecom

Mr. Allen asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions the Director of OFTEL has had with British Telecom about the effect of the proposed charges for directory inquiries on the blind and disabled.

Mr. Butcher: This is a matter for the Director General of Telecommunications. He is responsible for ensuring that British Telecom complies with the condition of its licence which obliges it to provide directory information free of charge, or with appropriate compensation for any charges paid, to those persons who are so blind or otherwise disabled as to be unable to use a telephone directory.

Defence Equipment

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will outline the guidelines followed by the Government when deciding on export licences for defence equipment.

Mr. Alan Clark: In considering applications for licences all relevant factors are taken into account including the type of equipment, its proposed destination and the use to which it might be put.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish a table in the Official Report listing the number of export licences for defence equipment issued for each country since May 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to make public information of this kind.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give details of United Kingdom trade in defence equipment in 1986 including the value of such trade and the role of his Department.

Mr. Alan Clark: For details of United Kingdom trade in defence equipment I refer the hon. Gentleman to the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987-2, Defence Statistics" (Cm. 101/II) (tables 2.7 and 2.8), copies of which are in the Library.

The role of my Department in the trade in defence equipment is that of licensing authority.

UN Conference on Trade and Development

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will be attending the United Nations conference on trade and development in Geneva in July.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall attend as leader of the United Kingdom delegation.

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proposals Her Majesty's Government will be making through the European Community or on their own, to the United Nations conference on trade and development in order to assist developing countries in the areas of aid, trade and debt.

Mr. Alan Clark: The United Kingdom will reaffirm its policy of offering effective support through the United Kingdom aid programme for the poorest developing countries, especially those undertaking IMF-IBRD agreed structural adjustment. We shall confirm our support for the internationally agreed debt strategy, stressing the Chancellor's new initiative for the poorest, most heavily indebted sub-Saharan African countries. This involves the provision of additional resources to relieve official debt in those countries adopting sound policies. We shall also emphasise the importance of active participation by developing countries in the Uruguay round and underline the constructive part which the United Kingdom and the European Community are playing in these negotiations.

Manchester Airport (Rail Link)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what reply he is sending to the recent approach made to him by the chairman of the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority concerning both the rail link to Manchester airport and light rapid transport project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Task Force Grants (Leeds)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to his reply of 29 June, how much task force money has been allocated to each of the following projects in the Chapeltown area of Leeds, (a) Positive Action for Training in Housing, (b) Jamaica Society, Leeds, (c) Community Enterprise Trust and (d) the development fund in partnership with the Yorkshire bank.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Task force money has been allocated as follows:

(a) Positive Action for Training in Housing—£93,000;
(b) Jamaica Society, Leeds—£132,000;
(c) Chapeltown Harehills Enterprise Ltd. (CHEL — also known as Community Enterprise Trust) — £249,000;
(d) Task Force Development Fund—£100,000.

The task force uses its own moneys to supplement and encourage the investment of other Government and private sector funds. Each of these projects has attracted significant funds from other Government, public and private sources as follows:

(a) Positive Action for Training in Housing—£75,000 from the Manpower Services Commission and £50,000 from the private sector;
(b) Jamaica Society — £130,000 from the Manpower Services Commission, £25,000 from Leeds city council and £50,000 from the Yorkshire Post;
(c) CHEL — £50,000 from Imperial Chemical Industries plc towards personnel costs;
(d) Task Force Development Fund — the Yorkshire bank has placed no limit on the sum it is prepared to set aside for loans. Provided that projects meet the scheme's criteria, it will be offered loan facilities.

Shipbuilding

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much shipbuilding intervention fund support has been paid out in each year since 1977, and in total, to each of the member countries of the European Community.

Mr. Atkins: There is no support for merchant shipbuilding paid for out of European Community funds. Each member state administers a regime of aid that is agreed with the European Commission within the framework of successive Council directives on shipbuilding aids. For the United Kingdom, Her Majesty's Government have made the following payments to merchant shipbuilding yards from the shipbuilding intervention fund:

Financial Year	£ million
1976-77	1·4
1977-78	19·3
1978-79	10·8
1979-80	36·3
1980-81	45·8
1981-82	54·5
1982-83	54·9
1983-84	43·4
1984-85	28·1
1985-86	30·8

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will publish a table showing the balance in shipbuilding expenditure since 1979 between merchant and warship yards.

Mr. Atkins: Since British Shipbuilders is funded centrally, I can only provide an estimate that over 70 per cent. of total Government support of more than £1,750 million since 1979 has been used for merchant shipbuilding. The warship yards now in the private sector very nearly covered their costs. The balance has been used to support the corporation's engineering, shiprepair and offshore concerns.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will provide a table for the number employed in (a) the merchant and (b) the warship shipbuilding industry in each of the European Economic Community countries, including the United Kingdom, and Japan, Korea and Taiwan in 1979 and in the most recent year for which figures are available.

Mr. Atkins: The available information for merchant shipbuilding is as follows. Comparative information on warshipbuilding is not available. In 1979, 29,000 were employed in United Kingdom warship yards. In 1986 the figure was 17,700.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will provide an updated list of the subventions on offer, in credit, loan and direct subsidy facilities for the shipbuilding industry in each of the European Economic Community countries, Japan, Korea and Taiwan.

Mr. Atkins: The information given to the hon. Member on 9 December 1986 about aid regimes in other countries remains the most up-to-date information available. No EC member state has yet received Commission approval for a new aid regime under the sixth directive on aid to shipbuilding.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proportion of world orders has been won by the British shipbuilding yards in 1986 and the latest convenient date in 1987.

Mr. Atkins: During 1986 United Kingdom shipbuilding yards won 2·1 per cent. of world orders. Data for 1987 are not yet available.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list all public sector shipbuilding orders that are to be awarded in 1987 and 1988; and if he will list all those orders where tenders are currently invited.

Mr. Atkins: The following merchant shipbuilding orders are planned:

Car-passenger ferry for Caledonian MacBrayne Ltd. Following their attractive tender, terms and conditions are to be discussed with the Appledore-Ferguson yard at Port Glasgow.

Cargo-passenger ship for the Overseas Development Administration, to be supplied to the Government at St. Helena. Tenders have been invited.

Passenger ferry for Shetland islands council. Tenders have been invited.

Two passenger ferries for Orkney islands council. Tenders have not yet been invited.

The placing of warship and naval auxiliary orders is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

British Shipbuilders

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list all current orders and completion dates for each British Shipbuilders yard.

Mr. Atkins: The following is the information:

British Shipbuilders yard	Current orders	Completion date
Govan	2 container ships	First half 1989
Austin and Pickersgill	1 multi-purpose cargo vessel	Second half 1987

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Allowance

Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the loss of revenue from income tax if the personal allowance for single people were to be raised to £3,320 and for married couples to £5,200; and what would be the net effect after allowing for recoupment by indirect taxation based on current spending patterns.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The full year direct revenue cost of increasing the present personal tax allowances to £5,200 for a married man and £3,320 for a single person is approximately £7 billion at 1987-88 income levels. The net cost, after allowing for increased payments of indirect taxes is likely to be somewhat less, but this cannot be estimated readily since a range of macro-economic factors would be involved.

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. Major: In formulating and implementing economic policy, the Treasury has regard to the needs of all British subjects, both women and men. The Green Paper "Personal Taxation" dealt specifically with the tax treatment of married women and has been the subject of consultation with a wide range of representative bodies. Changes to the principal Civil Service pension scheme were made on 1 July 1987, to give, wherever possible, equality of treatment for men and women. Training is given to all members of staff to enable them to carry out their duties efficiently and effectively. The Treasury has nominated an equal opportunities officer, and personnel policies and procedures have been reviewed and are being monitored to ensure that they do not discriminate against women.

Overseas Assets

Mr. Cohen asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing for each year since 1979 the total of United Kingdom-owned assets overseas, broken down by country and into figures for the public and private sectors.

Mr. Major: Estimates of United Kingdom owned assets overseas are published in the annual Pink Book, "United Kingdom Balance of Payments", copies of which are in the Library. The 1986 edition showed summary information in table 1.2 each year between 1966 and 1985, distinguishing public sector and private sector assets; further details are shown in section 9. Figures for end-1986 will be published in August and are expected to show total overseas assets net of liabilities of around £110 billion.

An analysis of total overseas assets by country is not available. However, details of the book value of direct investment assets analysed by country were published in an article in the 22 May 1987 issue of "British Business". These figures are collected only every three years, the latest relating to end-1984. Also, information on United Kingdom banks' overseas claims, by country, is published quarterly in table 14 of the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin. Copies of these publications are in the Library.

Wives and Husbands (Taxation)

Ms. Richardson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to introduce independent taxation for wives and husbands.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) about the taxation of married couples on Friday 3 July, at column 177.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will bring forward proposals to ensure that married couples are treated no less favourably for capital gains tax purposes than couples cohabiting.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion. We shall continue to keep under review the capital gains tax position of married couples in the context of our more general consideration of the overall tax regime for them, including the tax arrangements for their investment income.

Tax Law (Repeal)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Exchequer of repealing section 37 of the Income Tax and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Personal Taxation

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Exchequer of taxing income above the standard rate at 35 per cent. for the first £10,000, at 45 per cent. for the next £10,000, and at 50 per cent. for the remainder.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The full year cost at 1987-88 income levels is estimated to be about £1·1 billion. This estimate makes no allowance for possible changes in the behaviour of taxpayers.

VAT (New Houses)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with the housebuilding organisations and estate agents on the implications of the case initiated by the European Economic Community Commission before the European Court on 15 September on the levying of value added tax on new houses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: We have kept closely in touch with bodies representing the construction industry over this case. We have fought the case strenuously at all stages and will continue to do so.

Income Tax

Mr. Hunter asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what would be the immediate revenue cost of abolishing the 60 per cent. tax band, thus making the maximum rate of tax 50 per cent.;

(2) what would be the immediate revenue cost of abolishing the 60 per cent. and 50 per cent. tax bands, thus making the maximum rate 40 per cent.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his replies, 6 July 1987, c. 18]: The full year direct revenue costs at 1987-88 levels of income of reducing the maximum income tax rate to (a) 40 per cent. by abolishing the 45 per cent., 50 per cent., 55 per cent., and 60 per cent. rates and (b) 50 per cent. by abolishing the 55 per cent. and 60 per cent. rates are estimated to be about £1,400 million and £450 million, respectively. These estimates make no allowance for possible changes in taxpayers' behaviour.

Exchequer Income

Dr. Cunningham asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the estimated total yield of (a) income tax, (b) value added tax, (c) all other taxes, (d) all Customs and Excise duties and (e) all miscellaneous income to the Exchequer, other than borrowing, (f) public sector borrowing and (g) rates in each year from 1979-80 to 1987-88, estimated.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 19]: Following is the information.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General (1) whether he proposes to set up specialised training courses for solicitors employed by the Crown Prosecution Service in juvenile cases;

(2) whether he proposes to continue the policy of having specialist lawyers to deal with juvenile prosecutions in England and Wales;

(3) how many Crown Prosecution Service areas have specialist lawyers or departments to deal with juvenile prosecutions; and how many people are so employed in each area in England and Wales.

The Attorney-General: I shall reply to the hon. Member when all the information requested has been obtained.

ENERGY

British Coal Enterprise Ltd (Easington)

Mr. Cummings asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many loans have been made by British Coal Enterprise Ltd. to firms in the Easington district since its inception; what has been the amount of money loaned; and how many jobs have been created.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I regret that figures are not available at sub-regional level. However, I am pleased to be able to report that up to 27 June British Coal Enterprise Ltd. had committed £5·4 million in support of 198 individual projects in its north-east region, and has assisted in the creation of 2,574 jobs opportunities.

EMPLOYMENT

YTS

59. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will conduct a full investigation into the quality of off-the-job education being provided by YTS.

Mr. Cope: No. The youth training board, which includes representatives of the TUC, CBI, local authorities and the education service, is directly involved in ensuring quality on YTS. The new training standards advisory service is undertaking comprehensive quality audits of YTS managing agents and provides expert advice and guidance on quality matters, including the off-the-job training and education provided on YTS. Furthermore, all providers of YTS programmes have had to apply to become approved training organisations and their arrangements for off-the-job training and education are scrutinised as part of the approval process.

60. Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has had on the quality of off-the-job education provided by YTS.

Mr. Cope: We have had four representations over the past 18 months on this subject. One of those concerned the standard of off-the-job training and education provided by YTS, and the remaining three concerned the length of the off-the-job training period.

61. Ms. Quin asked the Secretary of State for Employment what steps he is taking to ensure high standards of off-the-job education for YTS trainees.

Mr. Cope: Potential managing agents for YTS schemes are required to set out in detail their proposals for training including the length and content of the off-the-job training and education that young people will receive. The formal contract between the MSC and each managing agent refers to the agreements reached on these proposals. Thereafter, MSC staff monitor the quality of training provided. To strengthen these arrangements a new training standards advisory service became operational in April 1987. Furthermore, the MSC requires all providers of training to apply to become approved training organisations. Only organisations which gain such status will be able to take part in YTS.

Mr. Mike Fowler

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment how long it has taken his Department to prepare its case for the appeal of Mr. Mike Fowler of 8 Meadow close, Houghton Green against the decision to reclaim benefit paid to him when he was a councillor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: This is a complex case. I shall write to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Women

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of women seeking work but not included in the unemployed register.

Mr. Lee: According to preliminary results from the labour force survey, in Great Britain in spring 1986 there were an estimated 593,000 women without a job and seeking work but not included in the count of unemployed benefit claimants. This compares with 479,000 included in the count but either not seeking work or in employment during the week of the survey. Details were published in the April 1987 edition of Employment Gazette, on page 208.

Average Earnings

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the latest figures for average earnings for (a) all women, (b) women in manual occupations and (c) women in non-manual occupations, expressed as (i) mean average, (ii) median and (iii) mode; and what are the comparative figures for men.

Mr. Lee: The latest date for which information is available is April 1986. Table 1 in part A of the report on the new earnings survey 1986 gives information on the gross weekly mean and median earnings of full-time adult employees in Great Britain. Information on the distribution of weekly earnings from which the modal ranges can be determined is published in table 29 of part B of the new earnings survey 1986. Copies of both these reports are available in the Library.

VAT

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with the Health and Safety Executive on the implications for safety at work of the case initiated by the European Economic Community Commission before the European Court on 15 September on the levying of value added tax on protective clothing and footwear; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: None. Neither I nor my predecessor has had discussions with the Health and Safety Executive on the forthcoming case before the European Court. The implications for safety, along with other considerations, will be assessed when the verdict, and its basis, are known.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

High Commissioner (Vanuatu)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what are the number plates used by official vehicles of the High Commissioner in Vanuatu;

(2) whether he will institute an inquiry into the use of the High Commissioner's official car by a Government official for the delivery of Conservative party fund-raising literature in Vanuatu; and if he will make a statement;

(3) why the official car of the High Commissioner in Vanuatu was used to deliver Conservative party material to Mr. N. Anderson of OSAS, P.O. Box 567, Port Vila, Vanuatu; and if he will make a statement;

(4) what is the practice with regard to the use of official diplomatic cars for delivering non-official material; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what is the practice with regard to Her Majesty's embassies acting as receiving points for mail addressed to United Kingdom citizens working abroad and forwarding such items to their correct addresses.

Mr. Eggar: The 75 technical co-operation officers and OSAS officers and their families regularly use the High Commission's postal box number 567 for both official and private mail which is then delivered to staff living locally in Vila. The registration numbers of High Commission vehicles are CD UK 1 and UK 5. All private mail received by the High Commission addressed to Mr. Anderson would have been handled in this manner. It would of course be quite improper for the High Commission to open or inspect the contents of private mail.

EC (Directives and Regulations)

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total number of directives and regulations, respectively, produced by the European Economic Community in the most recent year for which figures are available; and what were the comparable figures in each of the previous 10 years.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Women

Miss Widdicombe asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the Government submitted their initial report to the United Nations due under article 18 of the 1979 convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women.

Mr. Eggar: The report has been completed and was submitted to the United Nations Secretary-General on 25 June 1987. Copies have been placed in the Library.

In the preparation of the report women's organisations were consulted, particularly through a seminar on the UN Convention and the reporting process held in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in February. This enabled the officials responsible for writing the report to take their view into account. The report acknowledges their activities and concerns. We shall be sending copies of the report to all those invited to the seminar and upon request, to other organisations which express an interest.

The fullness of the report underlines the seriousness with which we view our obligations under the convention. We shall continue to develop our policies in the light of these obligations.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional advice he is going to give to the electoral registration officers as to the sale of names and addresses of people contained in the electoral register in machine-readable form, when the sale of the names and addresses takes place without the consent or knowledge of the data subject.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: None. We have already advised registration officers that people who buy this data will have to register the details with the Data Protection Registrar and we have told them of the existence of the mailing preference service to help electors who do not wish to be on mailing lists.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to announce the subject access fee and issue the orders under section 29 of the Data Protection Act.

Mr. Renton: We hope to announce the subject access fee within the next few weeks. Drafting of the orders inder section 29 is well advanced, but consultation with the interested parties concerned is not yet complete. We plan to lay the orders immediately after the summer recess.

Police National Computer

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current number, and the maximum number and minimum number of entries for each of the sub-categories of the stolen and suspect vehicle index of the police national computer over the last year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of entries in each of the sub-categories of the stolen and suspect vehicle index of the police national computer as of 30 June, together with the maximum and minimum number of entries for the previous 12 months, is as follows:

Sub-category	30 June 1987	Maximum in last 12 months	Minimum in last 12 months
Lost or stolen	354,902	354,902	290,056

Found or apparently abandoned	27,270	29,553	22,719

Sub-category	30 June 1987	Maximum in last 12 months	Minimum in last 12 months
Removed into police custody	15,888	15,888	11,985
Removed by police from one street to another	246	579	151
Repossessed by finance company[1]	0	112	0
Suspected of being involved in a particular incident, for example crime[2]	1,510	3,590	1,510
Owned or used by police	5,375	6,127	5,375
Of interest to the police, for example owned by known criminals or by missing persons	19,843	30,703	19,843
Seen or checked by the police in noteworthy circumstances, for example at night in an area where a series of crimes is under investigation	7,386	11,623	7,314
Details not to be passed over open radio, for example police vehicles used in observation duties	4,653	4,662	4,280

[1] Since November 1986 new records of vehicles in the sub-categories "Obtained by Deception" and "Repossessed by Finance Company" have been included in the "Lost or Stolen" sub-category.
[2] Since November 1986 new records of vehicles "suspected of being involved in a particular incident (for example crime)" have been included in the "Of interest to police" sub-category.

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current number, the maximum number and minimum number of entries for each of the sub-categories of the wanted and missing persons index of the police national computer over the last year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The number of entries in each of the sub-categories of the wanted and missing persons index of the police national computer on 30 June 1987, together with the maximum and minimum number of entries for the previous 12 months, was as follows:

Sub Category	30 June 1987	Maximum in last 12 months	Minimum in last 12 months

Crime (Use of Knives)

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to increase the penalties upon those found guilty of carrying knives for offensive purposes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The courts are already sending more people to prison when convicted of carrying offensive weapons. The existing maximum penalty on conviction on indictment is two years imprisonment and/or an unlimited fine. Where the weapons are used to cause injury, high maximum penalties are available.

The Government are concerned about the increased use of offensive weapons and are considering as a matter of urgency possible legislative changes to help curb their sale and use.

Passports

Mr. Boswell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many full United Kingdom passports were issued at each of Her Majesty's passport offices respectively, in each month of the last three years; and what was the average monthly interval between application and issue in each office.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is given in the tables:

[1] The average turnround time is expressed in working days and relates to non-urgent applications which were properly completed.

Crimes Against Women

Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to provide more units staffed by women officers dealing with rape, family violence and crimes against women.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Guidance was issued to chief officers of police on the response to victims of violence against women in Home Office circular 69/1986. The implementation of this guidance is an operational matter for each chief officer in the light of local circumstances.

Kerb Crawling

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many persons have been (a) arrested and (b) convicted for kerb-crawling in Liverpool under the Sexual Offences Act 1985 to date;

(2) how many persons have been (a) arrested and (b) convicted for kerb-crawling under the Sexual Offences Act 1985 in England and Wales to date.

Mr. John Patten: The information available to me, which may be incomplete indicates that up to the end of 1985 21 males had been found guilty of offences under section 1 of the Sexual Offences Act 1985. None of these convictions was in Liverpool. Corresponding details for 1986 are not yet available. There is no power of arrest under the Sexual Offences Act 1985.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied with the operation of the provisons of the Sexual Offences Act 1985 relating to kerb crawling; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: I believe that chief officers of police do their best to enforce this Act, having regard to other calls on their resources. I understand that it is often difficult for the police to obtain evidence that all the elements of the offence as enacted by Parliament were present in a particular case.

Electoral Register

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to whom access is permitted to the lists drawn up by his Department for the purpose of identifying persons resident overseas with the right to vote in United Kingdom general elections.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Representation of the People Regulations 1986 require each electoral registration officer to prepare a list of overseas electors in respect of each constituency in the area for which he acts and to publish it by making a copy available for inspection at his office. He is also required to supply four free copies of the list to each prospective parliamentary candidate or his agent, on request; one free copy to the Secretary of State and the British Library; and any remaining copies to any person on payment of a prescribed fee.

Police Surgeons

Mr. Gareth Wardell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish in the Official Report, for the latest available date, the number of police surgeons employed in each police area in England and Wales, separately distinguishing male and female surgeons.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Police surgeons are appointed by police authorities and no central record is maintained. I am, however, arranging for this information to be collected and I shall write to the hon. Member.

Off-licences

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to review the laws relating to granting off-licences, with a view to requiring applicants to prove that existing facilities are inadequate.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no present plans to do so. It is already open to the licensing justices, when considering an application for a new off-licence, to take into account the number of licensed outlets in the area.

Police Complaints Authority

Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any new appointments are to be made to the Police Complaints Authority.

Mr. Hurd: Mr. Jeff Crawford, formerly senior community relations officer for the London borough of Haringey, and Mr. Karamjit Singh, an assistant county clerk with the Leicestershire county council, have accepted my invitations to serve as members of the authority. Mr Crawford took up his post on 1 July and Mr. Singh will join the authority in mid-August. I hope to make a further appointment shortly.

These three appointments are being made to fill vacancies caused by the resignation of Mr. John Lyttle in January and Air Commodore Stephen King in May and by the creation of an additional post in response to the authority's workload.

Parliamentary Boundary Commission

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has about the timetable of work of the Parliamentary Boundary Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987]: The Parliamentary Boundary Commission has a duty to keep the distribution of seats under continuous review. It is required by the Parliamentary Constituencies Act 1986 to carry out reviews of all the constituencies in its part of the United Kingdom every 10 to 15 years. In the interval between general reviews, it may review particular areas in interim reviews.

The Parliamentary Boundary Commission for England is at present completing its second 1986 interim review, covering 55 constituencies. The commission's report on 53 of those constituencies was laid before the House on 6 May 1986; a further report on the two remaining constituencies is expected later in the year. The commission is also required by the European Assembly Elections Act 1978 to submit a supplementary report to the Home Secretary on European Parliament constituencies which would take account of the minor alterations to constituency boundaries made during the interim reviews carried out since 1983. The commission submitted its third periodical report, after its last general review on 1 February 1983. Its fourth periodical report after the next general review should be submitted between 1 February 1993 and 31 January 1998. I understand that the review is unlikely to begin before 1990.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Education (Costs)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the comparative cost of educating (a) a YTP student, (b) a BTEC student and (c) a GCE O-level student in Northern Ireland's further education colleges, and if these courses have been the subject of discussion between the Northern Ireland Office and the Government of the Republic of Ireland at a meeting of the Anglo-Irish Ministerial Conference.

Dr. Mawhinney [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1987, c. 188]: The information about comparative costs is not available. The joint statements issued after each meeting of the Intergovernmental Conference do not record these courses as having been discussed.

SCOTLAND

Community Charge

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Keeper of the Records of Scotland will allow access to, or a copy taken of, the community charge registers to assist the police or officials from the Inland Revenue or Department of Health and Social Security in their statutory duties.

Mr. Lang: The Keeper of the Records of Scotland is prohibited by section 20(11) of the Abolition of Domestic Rates Etc. (Scotland) Act 1987 from making any community charge register sent to him available for inspection or from allowing copies to be taken, except as may be prescribed in regulations by the Secretary of State. My right hon. and learned Friend is considering what regulations to make under this provision and they will be laid before Parliament in due course.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list all the studies compiled on likely collection rates for the community charge; and if he will place them in the Library.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Labour Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the latest unemployment figures for Greenock and Port Glasgow in the Official Report by district council ward boundary.

Mr. Lang: On 14 May 1987 (the latest date for which information is available) the number of unemployed claimants in each electoral ward of the Greenock and Port Glasgow parliamentary constituency was as shown in the table:

Ward Name	Unemployed Claimants
Port Glasgow East	759
Port Glasgow South	671
Clune Brae	642
Port Glasgow West	357
Gibshill	838
Blairmore	420
Bellville	493
Greenock East Central	663

Bow	572
Larkfield	567
Upper Larkfield	643
Greenock South	493
Greenock West Central	356
Greenock West End	205
Constituency Total	8,331

This information is available in the Library.

Health Care International

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions he has had with Health Care International concerning the provision of consultant staff for the proposed private hospital at Clydebank; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: One discussion has been held by officials of the Scottish Home and Health Department with representatives of Health Care International. The discussion covered in general terms the company's proposals to build a 260-bed private hospital in Clydebank, and the statutory requirement that these be the subject of an application to the Secretary of State for authorisation. That application was received last week. It envisages that 80 full-time consultant staff will be required for the hospital. Steps will now be taken, as the legislation requires, to bring the application to the notice of those whose interests appear likely to be substantially affected by the proposals. They will have six weeks to make any observations to the Secretary of State.

Cancer Screening

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he anticipates that it will be possible for appropriate computer facilities to be made available to health boards in Scotland for cervical cytology screening.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Locally developed computer systems providing facilities to assist cervical cytology screening are already available to four health boards and will shortly be available to a fifth. My right hon. and learned Friend has recently authorised the formation in the Scottish Health Service of a new Directorate of Health Service Information Systems, which has already begun to take responsibility for information technology developments in the service and which has as a major priority the provision of call-and-recall systems in support of preventive services, including cervical cytology. The Directorate – located within the Common Services Agency—aims to develop the software required by a full call-and-recall system for cervical cytology early in 1988 and outline plans exist for these facilities to be made available to all boards during 1988.

Lambs (Chernobyl Radiation)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what monitoring has been done on Scottish lambs this year of the effect of radioactive deposition from Chernobyl.

Mr. Rifkind: A comprehensive programme of monitoring is being undertaken. The results have generally been encouraging. Throughout the greater part of the country, including the areas in Ross and Cromarty and the Uists which were subject to restriction last year, no readings in excess of 1,000 Bq kg have been found. The average of readings throughout Scotland is 315 Bq kg. In a number of areas, chiefly hill areas in the south-west, some higher readings have been recorded and monitoring continues in order to ensure that when lambs from these areas come to be marketed there is no risk to the food chain. In a very small number of lower ground areas, again in the south-west, there are also elevated readings in lambs which are now ready for marketing and in order to ensure that only animals below 1,000 Bq kg reach the consumer I am today making an order under the Food and Environment Protection Act 1985 to restrict the movement and slaughter of sheep from those areas. The persistence of radioactivity would appear to be related to the availability of caesium to growing herbage in different soil types. My Department will arrange as practicable for stock to be monitored individually before they are moved and for those animals found to be above 1,000 Bq/kg a mark and release scheme will again operate so as to compensate farmers for any financial loss due to marking. A payment of £1·30 will also be made for each animal moved from a restricted area after monitoring or marking.

I am arranging for a copy of the completed monitoring results to date to be placed in the Library of the House.

Fisheries Protection

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement on the report of the efficiency scrutiny of the fisheries protection and enforcement effort of the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: The report was submitted early in May. Copies are being placed in the Library of both Houses today. I have agreed that copies should be circulated to the appropriate bodies with a view to starting the necessary consultations on the recommendations contained in the report.

The report recognises that fishery protection and enforcement are a necessary and important service and that the men who provide the service undertake a difficult and sometimes dangerous job. The report suggests that to give value for money the service must not just respond to new demands in flexible and imaginative ways but also continually question how the existing service can be improved.

The main recommendations for obtaining better value for money are:

the creation of an effective deployment strategy linked more closely to objectives on service levels;
the implementation of that strategy through an upgraded and more powerful operations room in the Department;
subject to a review, a reduction in the use of offshore air patrols; radical changes to the crewing and patrol patterns of the fishery protection cruisers;
privatisation of the boat service currently undertaken by the marine detachment;
a reduction in the size of the fleet surveillance and support unit;
and
the introduction of a new employment structure for the marine service to be controlled by the marine superintendent.

Implementation of the recommendations could lead to a reduction in annual costs of at least £1 million in total. The recommendations will be carefully considered in the light of the consultations about to be undertaken.

PRIME MINISTER

City of Glasgow (Visit)

Q13. Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to visit the City of Glasgow.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Fishing Vessels

Q14. Dr. Godman asked the Prime Minister if Her Majesty's Government have any plans to review the safety regulations and provisions governing the working conditions of the crews of United Kingdom registered fishing vessels; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: The safety standards for small ships are being reviewed, taking into account the recommendations about sail training ships contained in the report of the formal investigation into the loss of the MARQUES. Working conditions of crews on United Kingdom registered sailing ships (other than pleasure craft) are governed by the Merchant Shipping Occupational Safety Regulations.

Buckie (Visit)

Q17. Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Prime Minister if she has any plans to visit Buckie.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Armaments (Afghanistan)

Q21. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement on the efficacy of end-user certificates for arms shipments to the Afghan resistance movement.

The Prime Minister: It has been the practice of successive Administrations not to comment on matters of this kind.

Leysmill (Visit)

Q58. Mr. Welsh asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Leysmill.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Teachers

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisfied with the number of qualified physics, mathematics and science teachers in schools.

The Prime Minister: Not yet. But the initiatives taken by the Government to improve supply in these vital areas are beginning to show results. These include a £1,250 tax-free bursary for trainee teachers in the shortage subjects, new flexible training courses, better publicity, the setting up of the Teaching as a Career unit (TASC) to improve recruitment, more in-service training, and working with industry to improve recruitment of mature entrants. There is a reasonable chance of teacher training targets in shortage subjects being met this year for the first time for some years.

AIDS

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Prime Minister whether she is satisifed with the existing level of co-operation between those Government Departments dealing with the various consequences of the spread of the AIDS infection.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Political Organisations (Information)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Prime Minister what is the practice of Government Departments with regard to supplying to party political organisations lists of Government officials, or their agents or employees, resident overseas; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Such information is readily available from published official works of reference (for example, the Diplomatic Service List) and from commercial publications (for example Her Majesty's Consuls' List). The Foreign and Commonwealth Office also produces an Overseas Reference List of staff at posts abroad which is available on request to reputable bodies, including party political organisations. On this basis, copies are currently sent to Conservative central office and to the office of the Leader of the Opposition, among others.

St. Helena (Student Awards)

Dr. Marek asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her reply to the hon. Member for Wrexham dated 2 July, if she will make it her policy to regard residence in St. Helena as possessing equal status to residence in the British Isles for the purposes of student awards.

The Prime Minister: No. Such a policy could not be restricted to St. Helena. There are no plans to change eligibility for student awards.

VAT

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she has yet decided which Minister or Ministers will be presenting the United Kingdom's case before the European Court of Justice on 15 September on the case initiated by the European Economic Community Commission that Her Majesty's Government should cease to zero rate new house building, gas, electricity, news services and protective clothing and footwear; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: These are legal proceedings, and in accordance with normal practice the United Kingdom will be represented at the European Court of Justice by counsel instructed by the Treasury Solicitor.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 July.

Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 July.

Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 July.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 7 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in this House I shall be having further meetings later today.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Polytechnics

8. Mr. Lewis Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what benefits he expects from his proposals to reform the administration of polytechnics.

Mr. Jackson: The proposed reforms will enhance the ability of the polytechnics and colleges to pursue educational effectiveness and efficiency, develop entrepreneurial attitudes, and respond to national needs. The reforms recognise the national role and importance of the institutions and will facilitate improved and more accountable management.

School Transport

13. Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the operation of the provision in section 53 of the Education Act 1986 that local education authorities should have regard to the age of pupil and the nature of the routes which a pupil could be reasonably expected to take in deciding if school transport should be provided at the cost of the authority.

Mr. Dunn: Section 53 of the Education Act 1986 clarifies section 55 of the Education Act 1944. It sets out more explicitly some of the relevant factors to be taken into account by LEAs when considering what arrangements are "necessary" for the provision of transport under Section 55(1) of the Education Act 1944.

Edinburgh University

14. Mr. Nigel Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current financial position of the university of Edinburgh.

Mr. Jackson: The UGC's more rational basis for allocating grants has resulted in Edinburgh university's receiving below average increases in basic grant. It needs to plan carefully for the transition to the new funding levels.

School Activities

15. Mr. Blair asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will publish a list of those school activities for which (a) charges are currently levied and (b) he intends to introduce charges.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information on authorities' charging practices is not collected by central Government. The local authority associations have said that the majority of authorities at present make some charge for day and residential school trips. Charges are also made, less commonly, for a range of other items. My right hon. Friend intends to consult on proposals to clarify the law so that authorities know which items they can and cannot choose to charge for.

16. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about the possibility of imposing charges for certain school activities; and if he will make a statement.

51. Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what fee-charging powers he intends to bestow upon schools within the public sector of education.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and the hon. and learned Member for Leicester, West (Mr. Janner) earlier today.

36. Mr. Flannery asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the local education authorities which charge their pupils in primary or secondary schools for swimming lessons in school time.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) earlier today.

City Technology Colleges

18. Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of the cost to public funds per pupil at city technology colleges and the amount by which this will exceed or be less than the equivalent costs in local authority schools.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has made clear that the basis of recurrent grant to CTCs will be equivalent costs in local authorities, including costs borne centrally by LEAs such as school meals, transport and ancillary services as well as running costs directly attributable to schools. If, in addition, account is taken of central administration, and costs associated with capital expenditure, each CTC place might on average cost of the order of £1,800-£2,000 at current prices, once the programme is fully established.

Sixth Form Education

19. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the future of sixth form education in schools.

Mr. Dunn: Circular 3/87, issued on 6 May, asked local education authorities to review their non-advanced 16-19 provision, including sixth-form provision, and to take appropriate action in the interests of educational effectiveness and value for money.

Schools (Reorganisation)

20. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received on the Government's proposals to allow schools to opt out of local authority administration.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has been encouraged by the extent of support for his proposals expressed to him during recent weeks. Since his return to the Department he has received 54 letters on the subject, of which 25 have come from hon. members.

31. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he intends to issue guidelines on the financial management of those schools choosing to opt out of local education authority control.

Mr. Dunn: Once the necessary legislation has been enacted, my right hon. Friend would expect to issue regulations and guidance concerning the conditions under which grant is paid to schools opting out of local authority control.

41. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on devolution of budgeting to schools.

Mr. Dunn: The Education (No. 2) Act 1986 requires LEAs to delegate control over a part of their budget to individual schools. My right hon. Friend intends to bring forward legislation which will give all secondary schools, and larger primary schools, control over almost all of their recurrent expenditure.

54. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what evidence he has as to the views of parents or governors of any Coventry schools on opting out of local education authority control.

Mr. Dunn: No such representations have been received from Coventry parents or governors.

57. Mrs. Ann Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations he has had with local authority associations about his proposals for schools opting our of local authority control.

Mr. Dunn: The Government will shortly be issuing a consultation document to interested organisations, including the local authority associations, concerning our proposals for grant maintained schools.

Secondary Schools

21. Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what total resources he is making available for secondary schools in 1987-88; and how that figure compares with those for the previous two years.

Mr. Dunn: Within the current year's plans, as published in the Public Expenditure White Paper, Cm. 56, provision for secondary schools in England is £4·8 billion. The comparable planned figure for 1986-87 was £4·1 billion and for 1985-86, £3·9 billion.

34. Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make additional resources available to ensure that secondary schools in county Durham operate effectively.

Mr. Dunn: Most of central Government's contribution to local government expenditure is channelled through rate support grant, which is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for the Environment. My right hon. Friend will be providing education support grants to Durham on some £700,000 of expenditure in 1987-88 to encourage quality in education. The authority's allocation for capital expenditure for 1987-88 was announced in December 1986: my right hon. Friend is unable to make an addition to it.

School Repairs

22. Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his latest estimate of the cost of dealing with repairs and renovations to schools in Bradford.

Mr. Dunn: It is for the Bradford education authority rather than my right hon. Friend to calculate the cost of such work.

Universities (Funding)

23. Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to meet with the principals of Scotland's universities in the near future to discuss funding.

Mr. Jackson: No.

42. Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the chairman of the Universities Grants Committee to discuss the funding of universities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Ministers meet Sir Peter Swinnerton-Dyer in the course of normal Government business. The funding of universities is a frequent topic of discussion.

Schools (Parent Bodies)

24. Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools have yet to form parent bodies under the Education Act 1986.

Mr. Dunn: The Education (No. 2) Act 1986 lays down new provisions concerning the composition of school governing bodies, including increased representation of parents. These provisions will come into effect for new schools from 1 September 1987. For existing schools, the implementation is being phased so that county and maintained special schools are required to have governing bodies constitued in accordance with the new provisions by 1 September 1988 and voluntary schools by 1 September 1989. Although Local Education Authorities are free to adopt the new provisions in advance of the mandatory implementation dates, there is no centrally held information as to how many have done so.

Queen's Speech

25. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about his Department's proposals contained in the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received about proposals in the Queen's Speech for which he is responsible; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has received correspondence from a number of organisations and individuals, and expects that others will wish to comment when they have had an opportunity to consider the Government's proposals.

Young People

26. Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will introduce measures to improve the standards of off-the-job educational opportunities for all young people currently in employment.

Mr. Dunn: The Government have already introduced a series of measures to improve provision which will benefit employed young people taking part-time courses along with others. These include the introduction of work-related NAFE development schemes, the establishment of the National Council for Vocational Qualifications, and the establishment of the Open college.

Teachers (Pay and Conditions)

27. Mr. Hunter asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the teachers' unions with regard to establishing permanent machinery for negotiating teachers' pay and conditions of service.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the National Union of Teachers and the National Association of Schoolmasters/Union of Women Teachers on 2 July. He confirmed the Government's intention of publishing a Green Paper setting out key issues and questions about the most appropriate way of constructing effective permanent machinery for determining pay and conditions. He stated that it was the Government's intention to enter into detailed discussions later in the year with all those with an interest on the basis of the Green Paper.

Pupil-Teacher Ratios

28. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the current teacher-pupil ratio in Basildon; and what is the teacher-pupil ratio for children assessed as having special learning disabilities.

Mr. Dunn: Information for areas within local education authorities is not available centrally. Pupil-teacher ratios specific to the education of children with statements in maintained primary and secondary schools are not collected. In January 1986 the pupil-teacher ratios in maintained, primary, secondary and special schools in Essex were as follows:

January 1986	Pupil-teacher ratios
Primary schools[1]	23·9
Secondary schools[1]	17·0
Special schools[2]	7·4

[1] Includes middle schools as deemed.
[2] Maintained and non-maintained special schools — includes hospital special schools.

The pupil-teacher ratio in special schools covers all children in those schools who are in need of special education whether by reason of emotional or physical disability.

33. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, what is the current pupil-teacher ratio in primary and secondary schools; and how these figures compare with those for eight years ago.

Mr. Dunn: The pupil-teacher ratios in maintained primary and secondary schools in England in January 1986, the latest date for which figures are available, and in January 1979 were as follows:

	January each year
	1979	1986
[1]Primary schools	23·1	22·1
[1]Secondary schools	16·7	15·9

[1] Includes middle schools as deemed.

Teachers (Dispute)

29. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what negotiations are taking place concerning the establishment of a body to replace the Burnham committee.

40. Mr. Day asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the latest position in the teachers' dispute.

44. Mr. Robert Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he intends making any fresh proposals to try to resolve the teachers' pay and conditions of service dispute; and if he will make a statement.

45. Mr. Sims asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to meet the leaders of the teachers' trades unions to discuss more permanent machinery to replace the existing interim arrangements on teachers' pay and conditions.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has announced his intention to publish a Green Paper setting out key issues and questions about the most appropriate way of constructing effective permanent machinery for determining pay and conditions. This will provide a basis for discussions with all those with an interest later in the year.

Rural Schools

30. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received regarding his policy on small rural schools as outlined in Circular 3/87.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received some representations from hon. Members and members of the public, from Rural Voice, and from the Dorset Association for Rural Education.

National Core Curriculum

32. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consultations are planned on the Government's proposals to introduce a national core curriculum.

43. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has for introducing a national core curriculum; and whether he will make a statement.

55. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he intends to consult interested parties about his proposals for curriculum reform.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend will shortly be issuing a consultation document setting out his proposals for a national curriculum, and seeking the views of those concerned within and outside the education service.

School Governors

35. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has received regarding the powers of school governors.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has received a range of representations from local education authorities, parents and other interested parties about the Education (No. 2) Act 1986. Many of these commented upon the provisions of the Act concerning the allocation of functions to school governing bodies.

Inner London

37. Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to meet the leader of the Inner London education authority to discuss future developments for education in inner London.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend would naturally be prepared to consider any request for such a meeting. None has so far been received.

Student Grants

38. Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent representations he has received concerning reform of the student grant system.

Mr. Jackson: The student support review group has received written evidence from 106 organisations, nine of which have also given oral evidence. In addition, since the beginning of the year, the Department has received six petitions, signed by a total of 1,250 people, and several hundred letters.

Universities (Funding)

39. Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the financing of Scottish universities.

Mr. Jackson: The impact of the UGC's more rational basis for allocating recurrent grant has varied between universities depending on their previous funding levels and on their research records. Three of the eight Scottish universities are receiving increases in basic grant above the Great Britain average.

Inner Cities

46. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to improve the quality of education in the inner cities.

Mr. Dunn: It is our intention that educational measures should play a full part in the Government's initiatives in the inner cities. Our proposals for establishing city technology colleges will contribute to an improvement in education in these areas, as will our plans to give greater autonomy to schools and to reform the structure of education in inner London. We shall be considering whether there are other measures which we can usefully take.

Scientific Research

47. Dr. Bray asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to provide leading scientists in key fields with the research opportunities that will attract them to continue their work in this country instead of seeking research opportunities overseas.

Mr. Jackson: The Government are following a policy of selectivity and concentration in research funding, which will mean that our outstanding researchers will increasingly be able to work in this country with the highest quality facilities. We have also agreed a very substantial pay increase for academics, with new arrangements for discretion to pay the best more. This will strengthen our whole research effort through the ability to attract and retain good quality staff across a range of disciplines.

School Buildings

48. Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will visit Bradford to examine local school buildings.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so at the present time.

Aberdeen University

49. Mr. Doran asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the current financial position of Aberdeen university.

Mr. Jackson: Aberdeen university is receiving below average increases in basic grant as a result of the UGC's more rational method for allocating grants introduced in 1986-87. The university is in discussion with the UGC about the careful planning needed for the transition to the new funding levels.

Parents (Pressure Group)

50. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he last met the national pressure group representing parents.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend last met representatives of the National Confederation of Parent Teacher Associations on 2 March 1987 to discuss school teachers' pay and conditions of employment and future pay determination arrangements.

Unemployed People (Educational Opportunity)

52. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to increase the range of educational opportunity to the unemployed.

Mr. Dunn: The development of educational opportunities for unemployed adults is being encouraged by my Department through the REPLAN programme.

Tertiary Education (Funding)

53. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he will be taking to ensure that local education authorities receive adequate funding for reorganisation of tertiary education.

Mr. Dunn: Provided a reorganisation scheme has been approved in accordance with the provisions of section 12 of the Education Act 1980, my right hon. Friend will normally seek to ensure that the local education authority's prescribed capital expenditure allocations are set at a level reflecting the estimated cost of implementation.

UGC (Financial Allocation)

56. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will now review the Government's financial allocation to the University Grants Committee.

Mr. Jackson: The University Grants Committee has been notified of the total available for distribution as recurrent grant in 1987-88 and of provisional sums for the two subsequent years. The level of provision will be reviewed in the normal way as part of the Government's public expenditure survey.

School Buildings (Rotherham)

58. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what additional provision will be made following the visit of officials of his Department to Rotherham borough council to look at the condition of school buildings to assist the council to maintain its school buildings in the current financial year.

Mr. Dunn: The visit by my officials to Rotherham was undertaken within the context of normal territorial contacts. The opportunity was taken to discuss the basis on which capital allocations are made to local education authorities and to see some of Rotherham's school building problems at first hand. Capital allocations for 1987-88 have already been made and cannot be increased now. We shall be considering the authority's proposals for 1988-89 in the autumn.

O-level Examinations

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of pupils in each relevant age group attained five or more O-levels at GCE in 1986, 1985, 1980 and 1975.

Mr. Dunn: The proportions of pupils leaving school in England with five or more higher grades at O-level/CSE were:

School leavers, England
Percentage of leavers with five or more higher[1] graded results at GCE O-level or CSE

Academic year	per cent.
1974-75	22·6
1979-80	24·0
1984-85	26·9
1985-86	26·7

[1] O-level grades A to C, CSE grade 1.

Parkfields School, Mackworth, Derby

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received any representations from Derbyshire county council recently proposing that Parkfields school at Mackworth, Derby should now be kept open as an 11 to 16 year school in place of the council's original plans to close the school completely.

Mr. Dunn: No.

Surplus School Places

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what criteria his Department uses to define a surplus school place.

Mr. Dunn: The number of surplus places in a school is calculated by comparing current or projected pupil numbers with the school's physical capacity, which is determined by reference to the School Premises Regulations 1981.

Collective Worship

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how he intends to respond to the recommendations concerning collective worship in schools in the report of the Education, Science and Arts Committee on achievement in primary schools, SIC 401, Session 1985-86.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Letters are being sent today from my Department to a range of interested bodies asking for their views on the recommendations on collective worship put forward by the Education, Science and Arts Committee. These recommendations suggested that as the law is being widely and variously interpreted, it should be amended to allow schools greater flexibility in when daily collective worship takes place and how it should be organised. The Government are firmly committed to ensuring that collective worship continues. Comments have been requested by 11 September. If there is general agreement that the law should be amended, I shall include the necessary provisions in the Education Bill which will be introduced this autumn.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Nurses

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the number of intensive care nurses available to the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have not received any formal representations about the number of intensive care nurses available to the National Health Service, although we have received a number of letters referring to nurse staffing difficulties in intensive care units in particular localities. Nationally the total number of nursing staff employed in intensive care units in England continues to increase and at September 1985 there were 5,970 whole-time equivalents; an increase of 66·6 per cent. since 1981. The number entering training in the year ended 31 March 1987 was 563; an increase of 13·5 per cent. over the previous 12 months.

Low-income Families (Expenditure Data)

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the analysis of the family expenditure data for 1985 on low-income families.

Mr. Scott: On a normal timetable, publication of the 1985 low-income tables would be expected toward the latter part of this year; but the precise date will depend on the outcome of the technical review.

Whipps Cross Hospital

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many nurses have left Whipps Cross hospital to take up posts at Roding hospital; and what has been the effect on the number of operations at Whipps Cross hospital.

Mr. Newton: Information about the staffing position of individual hospitals is not held centrally, and the hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of Waltham Forest health authority.

Mental Health Service

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what progress there has been in ethnic monitoring with regard to mental health service delivery for the black and minority community.

Mrs. Currie: We expect health and social service authorities to take account of the needs of all sections of the community they serve when they plan and provide local mental health services. It is for authorities themselves to identify local needs, including the needs of ethnic minorities, and to consider how services are meeting those needs.

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish in the Official Report information on the proportion of black and minority people treated by state mental health provision in the London borough of Southwark from June 1980 on a quarterly basis to present; and if he will indicate the number of these which are sectioned psychiatric patients and the number which are voluntary patients.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that the information requested is not centrally collected for National Health Service mental health facilities.

Benefits

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the total number of applicants for (a) supplementary benefit and (b) unemployment benefit in Scotland in each year since 1979; and if he will show for each category what percentage of these applications were (i) accepted and (ii) rejected.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. The figures in the table are for the total number of claims made in Scotland and cover some people who have made more than one claim during a year. No figures are available showing the percentage of unemployment benefit claims which are successful.

	Unemployment benefit Claims	Supplementary benefit
		April to March	Claims	Per cent. successful
1979	562,004	1979-80	621,548	77
1980	582,908	1980-81	608,020	75
1981	565,799	1981-82	622,205	75
1982	601,351	1982-83	641,893	78
1983	592,494	1983-84	663,219	79
1984	608,382	1984-85	656,024	81
1985	611,732	1985-86	652,019	74
1986	614,123	1986-87	652,434	71

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many more people are expected to become entitled to each of the income-related benefits and to exemption from Health Service charges on low income grounds as a result of the proposed compensation for the 20 per cent. rates contribution.

Mr. Scott: The numbers entitled to income-related benefits from April 1988 will be dependent on the rates of benefit that will operate from then. These are still to be decided.

Tay Sachs Disease

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received about the future of testing for Tay Sachs disease; and if he will give an assurance that adequate funds will be made available for the continuation of such tests.

Mrs. Currie: Four letters have been received this year about the future of screening for Tay Sachs disease at the regional genetics centre at Guy's hospital in London. The funding of tests for genetic disorders, such as Tay Sachs disease, is a matter for district health authorities to determine.

Social Fund (Manual)

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the organisations which commented on the "Social Fund Manual: Draft Guidance and Directions for Department of Health and Social Security Social Fund Officers."

Mr. Scott: A total of 98 organisations commented on the "Social Fund Manual: Draft Guidance and Directions for DHSS Social Fund Officers". The organisations which commented were as follows:

Age Concern for England
Age Concern for Scotland
Alcohol Concern

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate the main recommendations that were made by organisations commenting on the "Social Fund Manual: Draft Guidance and Directions for Department of Health and Social Security Social Fund Officers".

Mr. Scott: Our purpose in issuing the draft manual for consultation was to obtain the views of key organisations on the operational aspects of the social fund and to test the clarity and comprehensiveness of the text. We have received a wide range of comments and we are giving them careful consideration before preparing the final version of the manual.

Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish the comments received from interested organisations on the "Social Fund Manual: Draft Guidance and Directions for Department of Health and Social Security Social Fund Officers".

Mr. Scott: No. It is a matter for the organisations which commented on the draft manual to publish their comments and some have already done so.

Maternity Allowance

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women have been excluded from eligibility for maternity allowance under the new arrangements as compared with the former; and what are the savings to the Exchequer.

Mr. Portillo: It is estimated that some 94,000 women who would have been entitled to maternity allowance under the former scheme will not qualify for either statutory maternity pay or maternity allowance under the new arrangements. These will almost entirely be women who were not working when their pregnancies began and for whom an income-replacement benefit was never intended. About 20,000 women with recent work records will qualify for SMP or the allowance for the first time.

It is estimated that the new arrangements will result in a net reduction in the publicsector borrowing requirement of £13 million in 1987-88 and £23 million in 1988-89.

Centres for Independent Living

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all the centres for independent living in England; what assistance is provided by his Department for the establishment of such centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: There are many local initiatives under way that are attempting to develop the concept of independent living within the community for disabled people. The King's Fund centre has compiled a register of independent living units for people with a physical or sensory handicap, which has over 300 entries. In addition, we are aware that centres for independent living have been set up in Derbyshire, Exeter, Hampshire, Southampton, Nottingham, Greenwich and Waltham Forest.

Development for this type of facility is a matter for local authorities and health authorities. The Department is, however, providing funds to the Prince of Wales' advisory group for a study of living options for disabled people.

Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he next intends to meet representatives of the local authority associations to discuss implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: A meeting arranged between my predecessor and representatives of the local authority associations on 2 June had to be cancelled because of the dissolution of Parliament. I have now received a letter from the associations seeking a meeting with me and this will be arranged in the near future.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what action he intends to take to involve voluntary organisations of and for people with disabilities in planning the implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: My predecessor as Minister for Social Security and Disabled had a useful meeting with the steering group established by those organisations on 1 April and I shall be writing to the steering group as soon as possible suggesting a framework for involving voluntary organisations where appropriate in future work on the implementation of the Act.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to lay an order to bring sections 5 and 6 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 into force; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I am unable to add to my replies to the hon. Members for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on 30 June, at column 75.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what account he is taking of the United Nations world programme of action in the development of his policies towards people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The United Kingdom Government support the overall objectives of the United Nations world programme of action concerning disabled persons and take them into account when developing policies for disabled people.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will introduce legislation to amend section 29(6) of the National Assistance Act 1948 in order to empower local authorities to make grants directly to people with disabilities in order that they may employ personal assistants to supplement the assistance they receive from their home helps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: There are no plans to introduce legislation on the lines proposed by the right hon. Member.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the total grants made by his Department in each of the last five years (a) to voluntary organisations for people with disabilities and (b) to voluntary organisations of people with disabilities; what is his policy towards the development of organisations of people with disabilities and enabling them to play an active role in the formulation of disability-related policies and programmes as recommended by the United Nations world programme of action; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Grants made under section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968 in each of the last five years (a) to voluntary organisations for people with disabilities are as follows. Disability is understood to cover all aspects of physical, mental and sensory disability or impairment, but figures exclude grants to bodies (for example, those dealing with children and certain medical conditions) which may, incidentally, do some work with disabled people, unless the grant is given specifically for that purpose. The voluntary organisations have been categorised as precisely as possible, but many of these in group (a) have mixed management (both disabled and able-bodied members).

	(a)	(b)
1982-83	2,841,108	143,050
1983-84	3,069,551	182,100
1984-85	3,681,111	223,000
1985-86	3,652,354	240,100
1986-87	3,930,211	248,000

The Government have always adopted a positive policy towards the development of organisations of people with disabilities and have whenever appropriate involved such organisations in the policy making process. The British Council of Disabled People and the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation were consulted on the Government's reply to the United National questionnaire on the first round of the monitoring of the implementation of the world programme of action concerning disabled persons during the United Nations decade of disabled persons 1983-1992.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will seek information on the legislation recently passed in Finland authorising payments directly to people with disabilities for the purpose of employing their own personal assistants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We understand that in Finland legislation providing for the reimbursement by local authorities of expenses incurred by disabled people in the employment of personal help has recently been enacted, and that it will come into general effect on 1 January 1988.

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the recommendations of the European meeting in Yugoslavia to mark the mid-point of the Decade of Disabled Persons; what action he intends to take to implement them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The recommendations to which the right hon. Member refers arise out of the meeting of the European regional experts held in Ljubljana, Yugoslavia in March to consider progress on the implementation of the world programme of action concerning disabled persons at the mid-point of the United Nations decade of disabled persons. This was one of several regional meetings held under the auspices of the United Nations.

A further United Nations global meeting of experts is planned to be held in Stockholm in August, where the reports of the various regional meetings will be considered to enable the Secretary-General to make a report to the 42nd United Nations General Assembly in the autumn of 1987.

At present the Government have not been asked to respond to the report of the Ljubljana meeting, although we have been provided with a copy of it. We shall of course consider the Secretary-General's report when it is available.

I have arranged for copies of the report of the European regional meeting to be placed in the Library.

Greenock and Port Glasgow

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of people in receipt of supplementary benefit in the Greenock and Port Glasgow constituency at the latest available date.

Mr. Portillo: The Greenock and Port Glasgow constituency is covered by the two local offices in Greenock and Port Glasgow, but their boundaries are not conterminous. The table shows the number of people receiving supplementary benefit from those offices on 5 May, the latest date for which information is available:

	Number
Greenock	[1]12,065
Port Glasgow	[1]5,348
TOTAL	17,413

[1] Source 100 per cent. count of cases in action.

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of people in receipt of unemployment benefit in the Greenock and Port Glasgow constituency at the latest available date.

Mr. Portillo: The available information is given in the table:

Number of persons receiving unemployment benefit

At 12 February 1987	Number
Greenock Unemployment Benefit Office	1,698
Port Glasgow Unemployment Benefit Office	886

Heating Allowance

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement outlining the original data on which the figures for fuel contained in Regulation 18(3) of the Supplementary Benefits (Requirements) Regulations were based, the reasons for choosing such a base and the criteria upon which these have been uprated.

Mr. Portillo: Deductions from eligible housing costs in respect of inclusive charges for fuel are based on those formerly determined by the Supplementary Benefits Commission, between 1970 and 1979. These in turn were derived from data obtained from the family expenditure survey on the average expenditure on fuel by all pensioner householders in a particular quarter.

Since 1980 these figures have, where appropriate, been increased in line with movements in the fuel component of the retail price index.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the value in real terms of the supplementary pension rates, including the lower rate of heating addition, for a single or married pensioner after the April 1987 uprating, compared with their value after the 1977 uprating; and what is the difference between the percentage of average earnings at the time represented by the 1977 and 1987 rates.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

Long-term supplementary benefit rate	November 1977 £	April 1987 £	Value of April 1987 rates where November 1977 = 100
Single householder	17·90	38·65	[1]107·8

AIDS

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what are the latest figures for the number of AIDS patients known to his Department; and how many of these have died.

Mr. Newton: The Department announced on 6 July that a total of 870 cases of AIDS, including 490 deaths, had been reported to the communicable disease surveillance centre by the end of June.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what additional resources have now been received by the district health authorities concerned to finance the cost of the drug AZT prescribed for the treatment of AIDS patients.

Mr. Newton: The Government have allocated an additional £1·6 million towards the costs of Retrovir (AZT) to the three Thames regional health authorities, which are caring for 75 per cent. of reported AIDS cases. £1 million was allocated to North West Thames RHA, £400,000 to North East Thames RHA and £200,000 to South East Thames RHA. It is for the regions to decide the allocation of the additional funding to their districts.

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the number of people in the United Kingdom who are HIV positive; and what percentage are likely to develop the full AIDS condition.

Mr. Newton: Our current estimate is that about 30,000-40,000 people in the United Kingdom are infected with HIV and that about 30 per cent. of these will develop AIDS within five years. We do not yet have the experience on which to estimate the proportion who will develop AIDS over a longer time period.

Brain Scanning

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the guidelines for the use of brain scanning for victims of road accidents; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Decisions on the use of brain scanners for any medical purpose is for the clinical judgment of the doctors concerned. Departmental guidance is not issued.

Walton Hospital, Liverpool

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the provision of beds at the neurosurgical unit at Liverpool Walton hospital.

Mrs. Currie: The provision of beds at the neurosciences unit at Walton hospital is the responsibility of the Mersey regional health authority. However, I understand that an extra £216,000 has been invested to introduce a six-bed intensive care unit, which opened in November 1986, and later this year an extra £200,000 will be used to fund an additional six beds, in association with the appointment of a new consultant. The hon. Member may wish to write to the regional chairman for further details.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set up an urgent independent inquiry into errors made by the Liverpool area health authority between March 1983 and December 1985 concerning cervical cancer screening in Liverpool; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 2 July, at columns 146-47.

Pensions

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has in relation to each of the countries of the European Community and each of the other countries with which the United Kingdom has a reciprocal agreement on social security, as to the minimum qualifying condition for (a) a full pension and (b) a minimum pension for (i) people resident in that country and (ii) people resident in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Scott: In respect of EC nationals covered by the Community's social security regulations, rights to retirement pension acquired in one country are maintained on moving to another member state. Under the agreements the United Kingdom has with most of the countries listed there are provisions either for maintaining pension rights for someone who moves residence or for counting insurance in the United Kingdom towards the qualifying conditions for pension in the other country, and vice versa. The exact position depends on the individual's circumstances, on the terms of the agreement and on the characteristics of the other country's system. For EC countries, the main qualifying conditions for pension are given in the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems the European Communities (Position at 1 January 1986)", a copy of which is in the Library. Such information as is readily available for the other countries is contained in the publication by the United States Department of Health and Human Services, "Social Security Programs throughout the World 1985". A copy of this, too, is in the Library.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secreary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the basic full retirement pension for (a) a single person and (b) a couple in each of the countries of the European Community and in each of the other countries with which the United Kingdom has a reciprocal agreement on social security.

Mr. Scott: Most countries of the European Community, and most of those with which the United Kingdom has a reciprocal social security agreement covering pensions, do not recognise the concept of a basic retirement pension. The pension is usually related to an individual's own record of contributions and earnings between certain limits, much like the United Kingdom's state earnings-related pension, and may thus vary widely even for those with an unbroken contribution history. Full or maximum pension would depend on continuous earnings and contributions at the highest possible level within the particular scheme. Some but not all, countries have a minimum pension within the earnings-related scheme for those with contributions over a specified number of years, designed to protect people on low earnings. This may be most closely compared with the United Kingdom basic pension. However, international comparisons of one element of social security support cannot reliably be made. Account has to be taken also of the existence of other forms of assistance — such as occupational pensions and help with housing costs whose availability varies widely between countries.

A fuller explanation of the difficulties involved in making this type of comparison is contained in my letter of 23 June 1987 to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Central (Mr. Caborn). The text of the letter is as follows:

"I am sorry we were unable to reply before the dissolution to the Question you set down in April about the level of United Kingdom pensions as compared with pensions and earnings in other EC countries. This letter explains why a cut-and-dried answer is not possible, and gives the best information we have.

Ministers of all parties have previously declined to answer questions of this kind, on the grounds that the great difference between pension and other social protection systems in different countries rendered valid comparisons impossible. In view of the very misleading publicity in the press and elsewhere about pensions in Britain and Europe, we decided on this occasion to depart from the usual practice and we asked officials to research a more precise answer. The work has taken some time to complete, and bears out the reasons for previous refusals to draw comparisons.

The major difficulty in making any reliable comparisons is that the United Kingdom is unusual in providing a basic pension unrelated to an individual's previous earnings. Only Denmark, Ireland and the Netherlands have flat-rate pensions of broadly the same type. In other EC countries, pensions are related to the individual's own contributions and earnings between set limits—like our own earnings-related pension—and there is accordingly a wide variation in the amount of benefit received. People on low earnings or with a poor work record receive correspondingly low pensions. Someone on average or above-average earnings will get a higher amount. Pensions are not normally related to national average earnings, and it is quite misleading to compare—as the press sometimes does — the pension available to a German or a Frenchman who has been on national average earnings with the British basic pension. In neither case does the figure actually represent the benefit received by most pensioners.

The other difficulty with your specific question is that the basic pension is not itself the only form of state pension provision in this country. About 6·5 million pensioners have graduated pension, which can add about £5 to the basic level. About 1·7 million now have earnings-related additional pension, which can add over £20 to the pensions of a man retiring this year who has been on average earnings. The average earnings-related pension awarded is much lower, because most new pensioners have not consistently earned at the national average level. These variations in United Kingdom provision give some indication of the problems when comparing with countries whose schemes are wholly earnings-related.

Further points to take into account are, firstly, that the United Kingdom is unique in paying a pension in her own right to a married woman, even if she has made no contributions herself. Dependency additions payable in other EC countries are generally speaking much less generous. Secondly, no deductions are made from United Kingdom pensions, whereas some countries, such as France, require pensioners to pay health contributions. Thirdly, occupational pensions are an integral part of the United Kingdom system and are received by some 70 per cent. of recently-retired couples. They are much less significant in most other EC countries, particularly at lower levels of earnings. Fourthly, our pension system is backed by a comprehensive national system of means-tested help for those on lower incomes, for both special needs and regular housing costs. Whilst some EC countries have extra help of this kind, the systems tend to be local and more limited than ours. It is difficult to obtain good information about such schemes, and indeed about average pensions in payment in other EC countries. This is largely because in many EC countries the pension and benefit systems are not centrally administered and good statistics are not held.

In view of these complications, you will appreciate why we have found difficulty in providing a straightforward answer to your question. Some EC countries do however have, within their earnings-related pension scheme, a minimum pension payable to those who have satisfied certain contribution conditions. Such a provision is by no means universal — Germany, for example, has no minimum — but where it exists it seems the best proxy for our basic pension. The contribution conditions vary markedly — 50 years of full contribution in the Netherlands (which has a flat-rate but no earnings-related system) against as few as 15 in Italy and about 44 for a man in the United Kingdom. Subject to this caveat, however, it appears that on this basis our basic pension is about fifth in value in Europe. (Cash values have of course been adjusted to take account of differences in purchasing power.) But I must stress that in terms of overall benefit support for pensioners the comparison is inadequate. Taking account of all sources of support for pensioners, the European Statistical Bureau shows the United Kingdom to spend a higher share of GDP on the elderly than any EC country except Denmark and perhaps France.

You also asked for information on contribution levels. I am afraid that once again there is no clear-cut answer. The United Kingdom has a single contribution covering all benefits. Most EC countries have separate contributions for groups of benefits, since the insurance system is not unified. Denmark, on the other hand, meets most of the cost of social security from general taxation, and benefits are not contribution-related. It is however possible to make a rough estimate of the share of our total NI contribution of 19·45 per cent. (employee and employer combined) required to fund selected benefits. On this basis, it is clear that our contribution rates for pension, widows' and invalidity benefits are among the lowest in Europe.

I think you will see from the foregoing that a neat tabulation of comparative benefit and contribution levels is simply not possible. What is clear is that the total package of care going to pensioners in Britain is among the best in Europe, and that the picture on the basic pension alone is much better than some commentators have claimed."

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has in relation to each of the countries of the European Community and each of the other countries with which the United Kingdom has a reciprocal agreement on social security as to whether the retirement pension is paid on the basis of working, of working and paying contributions, or of residence;

(2) what information he has in relation to each of the countries of the European Community and each of the other countries with which the United Kingdom has a reciprocal agreement on social security as to the minimum age at which state retirement pension can be received by (a) men and (b) women.

Mr. Scott: For countries within the European Community I refer the hon. Member to section IV of the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the European Communities (Position at 1 January 1986)", a copy of which is in the Library. For the other countries (listed as follows) with which the United Kingdom has an agreement on social security I refer the hon. Member to the publication by the United States Department of Health and Human Services, "Social Security Programs Throughout the World — 1985". A copy of this, too, is in the Library.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the value in real terms of the basic retirement pension for a single person and a married couple, as a proportion of (a) average gross male manual earnings, (b) average net male manual earnings, (c) average male earnings, whole economy and (d) average earnings of men and women, whole economy, compared with their value after the November 1977 uprating.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is shown in the tables. Table 1 expresses the basic pension rate as a proportion of average gross earnings, and table 2 shows the rate as a proportion of average net earnings for each of the three earnings indices specified in the question.

Table 1: Basic pension as a proportion of average gross earnings

[4] It is not possible accurately to express the married couple's pension as a proportion of the net combined earnings of male and female employees because of the differences in tax treatment of men and women.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to make allowance in the Government's proposals for planned public expenditure in 1988-89 and subsequent years for the cost of increasing pensions by more than the rate of increase in the retail prices index; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Detailed public expenditure decisions for 1988-89 and later years have yet to be taken. Any consideration of an increase in public expenditure for the purpose suggested would need to take account of a number of factors, including the high level of real increase in pensioners' average net total income in recent years.

Board and Lodging Payments

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many applications have been made to him for exemption from the time limits for supplementary benefit payments for board and lodging on grounds of exceptional hardship; and with what results in each month since the time limits were imposed.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested is as follows:

Earnings

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how the increase in average earnings is calculated for the purpose of revaluing earnings factors; and whether there have been any changes in the method of calculation or the earnings index used.

Mr. Scott: The increase in average earnings for the purpose of the annual Revaluation of Earnings Factors Order is based on the change in whole-economy average earnings not seasonally adjusted, measured between December and December of each year. Minor technical changes were made in 1984 in the index used, as a result of revision of earnings indices by the Department of Employment. In 1983 the method of applying the revaluation percentage to earlier years was adjusted to prevent the risk of cumulative rounding errors as the series of revaluations lengthens.

Mentally Handicapped Children

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to ensure that his predecessor's pledge to remove all mentally handicapped children from long-stay hospitals by the end of 1987 is achieved.

Mrs. Currie: The specific target announced by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Mr. Fowler), the then Secretary of State, and set for health authorities in health circular HC(87) 7 March 1987 is that "by the end of 1988 alternative provision should have been made so that no mentally handicapped child receiving long-term care should need to live in a large mental handicap hospital".

From the detailed information about such children provided by regional health authority chairmen last year, it is clear that alternative provision is already being made or planned for all but a small minority of mentally handicapped children still in hospital who may have particular health care needs. We are following up progress.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many children were placed in long-stay mental handicap hospitals for short-stay or respite care in the last 12 months; for how long they stayed there on average, for every health district; and what alternative community provision, including specialist fostering, is available for such children in each health district and each social services authority;

(2) how many children, by yearly age breakdown, are living in mental handicap hospitals in each health district; and how many of these children now have been jointly assessed by the appropriate local education authority, health authority and social services department.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have as much information as is available as soon as possible.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he has any plans for encouraging voluntary organisations to develop community-based services for children who currently live in mental handicap hospitals; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will introduce measures to make it financially attractive for local authorities to develop appropriate community services for children currently living in mental handicap hospitals, including those with multi-handicaps and behaviour problems; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what is his estimate of the number of mentally or multi-handicapped children who will always require residential health provision.

Mrs. Currie: Voluntary organisations have already since 1982 been encouraged through our Department's pound for pound scheme to make alternative provision in the community for mentally handicapped children from hospitals. Health authorities are able to transfer both short-term and continuing funding to help local authorities and voluntary organisations for this purpose. The Department has made £10·5 million available from central funds to district health authorities for 37 homelike projects in the community for children who require continuous residential health care, and health authorities are also planning such care for most of the children still in hospital, including those with multi-handicaps and behaviour problems. It is not possible to estimate the total number of mentally or multi-handicapped children who will always require such care.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will make a statement on the payment of higher rates of supplementary benefit to residents of small private homes for three or fewer residents.

Mr. Scott: Homes with fewer than four residents fall outside the registration system for residential care homes, but regulations provide that the same levels of benefit can notwithstanding be paid in such homes. The intention of the present regulations has been that this should occur only in homes providing a comparable service to those which are registered. Because some doubt has arisen as to whether they in fact achieve that effect, I have today laid draft regulations which seek to remove that doubt.

ENVIRONMENT

Opencast Coal Mining

Mr. Cummings asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by county for each year, since and including 1976, the opencast coal mining applications that have been considered by him on appeal, and the result of those appeals in each case.

Notes:

(1) Information is available only in respect of these cases recovered for the Secretary of State's jurisdiction.

(2) Prior to March 1 1984 the NCB obtained authorisation for opencast operations from the Secretary of State for Energy and the appeals procedures under the 1971 Town and Country Planning Act did not apply. Prior to March 1 1984 the statistics relate only to private sector operators.

Non-domestic Rates

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average non-domestic rate poundage in England and Wales for 1987-88; and if he will list those local authorities with (a) the highest and (b) the lowest rate poundages in England and Wales.

Mr. Howard: The average non-domestic rate poundage in England and Wales in 1987-88 is 224·8p. The authority with the highest non-domestic poundage in England and Wales is Manchester at 354·5p and the authority with the lowest is Kensington and Chelsea at 117·4p.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the annual estimated receipts from non-domestic rates in England and Wales for 1987-88.

Mr. Howard: The annual receipts from non-domestic rates in England and Wales in 1987-88 are estimated to be £8·6 billion.

Drinking Water

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the current policy of his Department towards the European Community drinking water directive setting maximum levels for various substances in drinking water; how the United Kingdom compares in compliance with its European Community partners in this respect; how many derogations are currently in operation in the United Kingdom and where; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government welcome the European Community drinking water directive as a very useful measure for maintaining and improving drinking water quality. Although the directive has been fully implemented in the United Kingdom, it is not yet possible to make comparison with other member states as most are in the process of implementation or are still preparing legislation. Implementation has highlighted some features of the directive which required review and we are pressing the Commission on this. The following table provides information about derogations in England either given by my Department or sought from the European Commission.

Total number of derogations given under article 9(1)(a) or sought under article 20

Water authority area[1]	Number
Anglian	77
Northumbrian	8
North West	23
Severn-Trent	51
Southern	4
South West	38
Thames	12
Wessex	—
Yorkshire	59
	272

[1] Includes statutory water companies.

Many of these derogations will no longer be needed in 1990 in view of improvements now under way or planned. A temporary derogation has also been requested until December 1989 for certain parts of the United Kingdom in respect of the lead parameter and until 1995 for private supplies for the microbiological and lead parameters.

Responsibility for this subject in other parts of the United Kingdom rests with my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Queen's Speech

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about proposals in the Queen's Speech for which he has responsibility; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I have received many such representations from a wide range of sources, all of which have been carefully considered.

Urban Development Corporations

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the extent to which the identification of title to land may be a complicating factor in urban development corporations aggregating areas of derelict land for redevelopment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: Identification of title to land has not been a major obstacle to the assembly of land by urban development corporations.

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much money he plans to allocate to urban development corporations for inner city rehabilitation during each of the next five years; and what role he anticipates the private sector will play in their operations.

Mr. Trippier: Planned spending by urban development corporations until the financial year 1989-90 was set out in "The Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90" (Cm. 56-II, table 3.10.10).

The private sector will have a crucial role to play in bringing its skills and resources to bear in the regeneration of these areas.

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the seven urban development corporations so far established; and if he will give a general description of their geographical area within the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: The information is as follows.

The members of the six urban development corporations in England are:

Black Country DC

Mr. Bill Francis (Chairman), Mrs. Jean Denton (Deputy Chairman), Councillor Joe Adams, Councillor Eric Alison, Mr. Charles Darby, Mr. Roy Kettle, Mr. Graham McKenzie, Councillor Ray Partridge, Mr. Paul Sabapathy, Mr. Michael Worley.

London Docklands DC

Mr. Christopher Benson (Chairman), Mr. John Mills (Deputy Chairman), Mr. Alan Benjamin, Mrs. Jennifer d'Abo, Sir Andrew Derbyshire, Sir John Garlick, Councillor Jonathon Matthews, Mr. Lewis Moss, Mr. Dennis Stevenson, Mr. Reg Ward.

Merseyside DC

Mr. Donald Foster (Chairman), Mr. John Smith (Deputy Chairman), Professor Graham Ashworth, Professor Noel Boaden, Mr. John Leighton Boyce, Mr. Philip Carter, Councillor Thomas Glover, Councillor John Hale, Mr. Clive Lewis, Dr. John Ritchie.

Teesside DC

Mr. Ron Norman (Chairman), Mr. Jack Dormand (Deputy Chairman), Councillor Michael Carr, Mr. Alan Cherry, Mr. Nigel Clark, Mrs Diana Eccles, Councillor Bryan Hanson, Mr. Roger Kingdon, Mr. Andrew Russell, Mr. John Sutcliffe, Councillor Laurie Wild.

Trafford Park DC

Mr. Peter Hadfield (Chairman), Mr. Anthony Russell (Deputy Chairman), Councillor Barry Brotherton, Mr. Peter Collins, Mr. Hugh Richards, Mr. Hamish Stewart, Councillor Colin Warbrick.

Tyne and Wear DC

Mr. Paul Nicholson (Chairman), Mr. John Ward (Deputy Chairman), Mr. Graeme Anderson, Mr. John Barnsley, Councillor John Donnelly, Mr. John Hall, Dr. Ralph Iley, Mr. Joe Mills, Councillor Bert Moore, Councillor Septimus Robinson.

Cardiff Bay DC is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

The orders establishing the UDCs give a general description of their geographical areas.

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the powers of the urban development corporations under part XVI of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 to discharge their functions in areas of planning where their views conflict with those of local authorities.

Mr. Trippier: Since 1981 the London Docklands Development Corporation and the Merseyside Development Corporation have discharged their functions successfully under the 1980 Act.

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all the members appointed to urban development corporations; and if he will state the annual remuneration paid to each member.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to my answer today to my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, North (Sir T. Skeet) in which I listed the members of UDCs.

Members of urban development corporations are generally part-time. The chairmen and deputy chairmen are remunerated at a level reflecting their time commitment, which may vary. Members receive a flat rate, except Mr. Ward (LDDC) and Dr. Ritchie (MDC) who receive salaries as chief executives of their respective corporations.

The chairman and deputy chairman of London Docklands Development Corporation are currently paid £27,096 a year and £16,616 a year, respectively, on the basis of a time commitment of two days a week. Members receive £4,515 a year.

The chairmen of the other five corporations in England each currently receive £18,146 on the basis of two days a week, except for the chairman of the Tyne and Wear DC who received £13,610 on the basis of one and a-half days a week. The deputy chairmen of the five corporations each currently receive £6,158 a year on the basis of one day a week, except the deputy chairman of the Black Country DC who currently receives £12,316 a year on the basis of two days a week.

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria for selection he has used in making appointments to urban development corporations.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has selected board members on the basis of their ability to do the job. He has included members who have a special knowledge of the locality and appropriate business or professional experience.

Colne Valley (Listed Buildings)

Mr. Riddick asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many domestic properties in the Colne Valley constituency are currently categorised as listed buildings;

(2) how many domestic properties were categorised as listed buildings in the Colne Valley consttuency in 1980;

(3) how many industrial properties were categorised as listed buildings in the Colne Valley constituency in 1980;

(4) how many industrial properties in the Colne Valley constituency are currently categorised as listed buildings.

Mr. Moynihan: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Disabled People (Housing)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking within his proposals for the future development of both public and private sector housing to ensure adequate provision for the housing needs of people with disabilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We intend to bring forward proposals for reform of the home improvement grant system, including grants for home adaptations for people with disabilities. We shall consider the needs of disabled people in developing our other proposals for improving the range and quality of housing choice.

Effluent Standards

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to improve effluent standards in British rivers.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government have already published proposals to introduce statutory river quality objectives to which effluent standards must conform, and generally to strenghten and update water pollution control legislation. The establishment in April of a water inspection arm within Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution and the decision to establish a National Rivers Authority will further strengthen the monitoring and enforcement of such standards.

River Water Quality

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the standard of sewage works discharges and with the effectiveness and methods of sampling water quality in rivers.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend is not satisfied with the standard of sewage works discharges. Some 1,000 sewage works in England and Wales fail to meet their statutory consent conditions and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Pollution will be asking the water authorities to consider how they will remedy their present breaches of those conditions.

My right hon. Friend is aware that problems with the assessment of river water quality became apparent from the 1985 river quality survey. He has arranged for the methodology of the survey to be reviewed, bearing in mind the recommendations of the Environment Committee in its report "Pollution of Rivers and Estuaries" (House of Commons 183). The Department will be discussing with the water industry the improvements that might be made.

Footballers (European Court Action)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what support he is giving football authorities in the action at the European Court over attempts to prevent further movement of English and Welsh footballers to European clubs.

Mr. Moynihan: I understand there is no European Court action concerning this matter. I am aware, however, that the football authorities of member states met a representative of the European Commission on 29 and 30 June to discuss the free movement of professional football players within the European Community.

The outcome of this meeting is essentially for European football authorities.

Brixham Harbour (Development)

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria he proposes to use in deciding whether to call in the planning application for a proposed marina and housing development in Brixham harbour, currently before Torbay district council; and, in particular, what emphasis he proposes to attach to the balance of local opinion.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall be using the criteria set out in the Department's circular 2/81. The Government's general approach is not to interfere with the jurisdiction of the local planning authority unless it is necessary to do so. Each case must be considered on its individual merits.

We will therefore continue to be very selective about calling in cases for our decision, and applications will in general be called in only if planning issues of more than local importance are involved. such cases may include, for example, those which in our opinion could have wide effects beyond their immediate locality, which give rise to substantial regional or national controversy which may conflict with national policy on important matters, and those where the interests of national security or of foreign Governments may be involved.

Council Tenants (Accommodation)

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the level of satisfaction amongst council tenants with their accommodation.

Mr. Waldegrave: We intend to provide council tenants with the right to opt for another landlord, which some will choose to exercise and some will not. That will give the best indication of tenant satisfaction.

Rented Housing

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the deficiency in the quantity of housing available for renting in London by reference to the number of households needing rented accommodation; what research is being carried out in his Department on the deficiency; and when he will report on the results of such research.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he plans to publish a Green Paper or a White Paper on the Government's proposals for rented housing; and what plans he has to consult local authorities over those proposals.

Mr. Waldegrave: We are considering this matter.

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence is available to his Department on the relative performance of local authorities and private landlords as regards (a) the level of vacant property, (b) the condition of the property, (c) rent arrears, (d) fairness in lettings and allocation procedures and (e) harassment; and if he has any plans for undertaking any research on these matters.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information on the condition of dwellings rented from local authorities and from private landlords and housing associations was published in the "English House Condition Survey 1981: Part I Report on the physical condition survey". Results of the 1986 survey are not yet available.

There is no comparative evidence on the other aspects of performance.

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government plan to introduce right to rent, giving any person the right, enforceable in law, to have a house to rent.

Mr. Waldegrave: No.

Property Statistics

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department has carried out on the level of commitment on the part of (a) council tenants, (b) owner-occupiers and (c) private tenants to their property and as to how such a commitment is reflected in the physical condition of their property.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information on the physical condition of housing, occupants' views about their housing and their intended action come from the "English house condition survey". This is a quinquennial survey conducted by the Department of the Environment.

The 1981 survey showed the following breakdown of physical condition by tenure.

Per cent. households

	Satisfactory dwellings	Unsatisfactory dwellings
		Fit			Unfit
		All amenities but medium disrepair	Lacking amenities plus low or medium disrepair	Serious disrepair	Lower medium disrepair	Serious disrepair
Owner occupiers	75	15	1	3	3	3
Private tenants	45	20	3	9	10	13
Local authority tenants	84	11	3	—	1	1
Housing Association tenants	80	9	1	—	3	7
Not known	75	14	—	8	4	—
All tenures	76	13	2	3	3	3

An idea of occupants' commitment to their housing was obtained by asking those occupants who saw that there was something wrong with their home what they intended to do about it. The replies are summarised in the following table.

Per cent. of households

Action intended	Owner occupiers	Private tenants	LA and HA tenants
No action intended	32	49	34
Will do something sometime	34	12	11
Intend to get it done soon	23	6	5
Already arranged to get it done	11	4	9
Have/will approach landlord	—	29	41
All households	100	100	100

Assured Tenancies

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the environment what is his assessment of the current average rent for assured tenancies in (a) central London, (b) inner London and (c) outer London.

Mr. Waldegrave: The information is not available in the form requested. The mean rent for assured tenancies in Greater London at 1 April 1986 was £2,501 per annum.

Private Rented Housing

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what evidence is available in his Department on the relationship between rent restriction and unfitness and disrepair in privately rented housing;

(2) what evidence is available to his Department on the effect of relaxing rent restrictions on privately rented housing on the supply of such housing.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Council Housing

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will remove housing controls on local authorities to allow them to bring their council housing up to acceptable standards.

Mr. Waldegrave: No. There are a number of methods of financing renovation, including bringing in private sector resources.

The Government must continue to control the overall local authority borrowing requirement in order to protect the national economy.

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department is carrying out on the effect on council tenants transferring their existing tenancy to a private landlord on the quality of management and maintenance of rented property in London, particularly as regards the level of vacancy and the physical condition of the property.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Tenants (Legislation)

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if the Government have any plans to legislate for (a) the right for a council tenant to have her home renovated to modern standards, (b) the right for a private tenant to have his home renovated to modern standards, (c) the right for a private or housing association tenant to transfer to a local authority or (d) the right for a council tenant who has chosen to transfer to a private landlord to transfer back to the local authority.

Mr. Waldegrave: Every landlord, public or private, has a duty under section 11 of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1985 to keep dwellings in repair and this duty is enforceable in the courts. All dwellings must be kept up to a minimum standard under public health legislation. In addition, secure tenants under the Housing Act 1985 have a right to repair and, if they obtain their landlord's consent, can carry out improvements and be reimbursed their costs. We have no plans to legislate to alter these rights and duties. We do not intend to legislate as in (c) and (d).

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if tenants will be consulted or balloted before any transfer to the proposed housing action trusts.

Mr. Waldegrave: The detailed arrangements for setting up and running housing action trusts, including arrangements for consultation, are still under consideration.

Community Charge

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library the Government's study of the expected numbers of community charge payers as a proportion of those obliged to pay.

Mr. Howard: I shall answer this question shortly.

Pension Schemes

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will take steps to provide further protection to beneficiaries of local authority pension schemes against trustees who invest the funds of pension schemes into investments involving undue risk; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will issue advice to local authorities about the investment of their pension funds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 3 July 1987, c. 194]: The way in which pension funds are invested is of considerable concern to local ratepayers who are required to make good any deficiencies caused by bad investment. My right hon. Friend is concerned about the way in which some local authorities invested fund moneys in the News on Sunday which is now in receivership and is considering whether additional safeguards are necessary.

The interests of employees or pensioners are not directly affected since their benefits are secured by statute.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Punctuality)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he proposes to take to ensure that British Rail meets the punctuality targets set for it (a) nationally and (b) in the London Midland region.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for British Rail to take the necessary steps to meet its punctuality targets. The chairman has assured me that the national targets can be achieved within the resources available. I have not set targets regionally.

Helicopter Safety

Mr. Bruce asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he proposes to take to introduce electronic monitoring of key components for commercial helicopters following the sheriff's report at the fatal accident inquiry into the crash of a Chinook off Shetland in November 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Civil Aviation Authority, which is statutorily responsible for civil aviation safety, tells me that there is no available electronic monitoring equipment capable of detecting the type of fault that occurred in the tragic accident to the Chinook helicopter before failure. Health and usage monitoring systems are now being developed for helicopters as part of a major programme of research into helicopter safety. The research is being funded jointly by the CAA, the United Kingdom Offshire Operators Association and the Departments of Transport and Energy. Operational trials of HUMS are being undertaken in conjunction with Bristow Helicopters, Smiths Industries and Westland Helicopters using a Bristow's AS 332L Super Puma based at Aberdeen in its normal commercial role in support of the oil industry.

Toll Charges

Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all estuarial crossings in the United Kingdom where a toll is charged together with the amount charged in each case.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following tables list the tolls charged on estuarial crossings in England, Scotland and Wales. There is no tolled estuarial crossing in Northern Ireland.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many people have been killed in hit-and-run car accidents on Merseyside in each of the past five years;

(2) what information he has as to how many persons have been injured by hit-and-run car accidents on Merseyside in each of the past five years.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is customary to refer requests for road accident information within a local area to the authority holding the data. Road safety in local areas is the responsibility of the local highway authorities. I suggest that the hon. Member contacts the Merseyside police authority for the information.

M6 (Thornbridge Viaduct)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to offer compensation to householders whose homes have been covered in dirt and dust during the shotblasting work on the Thornbridge viaduct of the M6 motorway.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department's standard conditions of contract require contractors to be insured against third party claims. The contract for the re-painting of Thornbridge viaduct is a standard one and the contractor has circulated local residents with a local telephone number to contact if they have grievances to report.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport what is the cost of the painting contract on the Thornbridge viaduct of the M6 motorway; and when he expects the work will be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This contract was awarded last May to Colebrand Contracting Ltd. in the sum of £473,092 and is due for completion in October 1987.

British Airports Authority

Mr. Haselhurst asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a further statement about the privatisation of the British Airports Authority.

Mr. Channon: This morning up to 500 million ordinary shares in BAA plc have been offered for sale. The issue has been fully under-written at the finest rates ever achieved for a privatisation—an average of 0·0531 per cent. Up to 260 million shares are being offered to the general public, including BAA employees and pensioners, at a fixed price of £2·45 per share. 115 million shares have been placed firm with financial institutions at the fixed price and 125 million shares have been provisionally placed with institutions. These provisionally placed shares will be subject to clawback to satisfy successful tender applications made by individuals and institutions. Successful tender applications will be accepted at the price tendered, and normally in full.

Prospectuses and fixed price and tender application forms will be published in a number of national newspapers on Friday 10 July and Sunday 12 July. Everyone who has registered with the BAA Share Information Office will be sent a mini-prospectus containing the application forms. Prospectuses and application forms will also be available from 10 July at all United Kingdom branches of Midland Bank, Clydesdale Bank and Northern Bank, certain principal branches of other banks and a number of stockbrokers. Applications must be received by 10 am on Thursday 16 July. Copies of the prospectus will be placed in the Library of the House on 10 July.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Multiple Personal Injury Actions

Mr. Tom Arnold asked the Attorney-General what representations he has received proposing that in multiple personal injury actions raising issues of great complexity and high legal costs, the courts should have power to recommend that appropriate test cases should be funded by the state.

The Attorney-General: I have received one letter, and the Lord Chancellor has received a small amount of correspondence, relating to multiple personal injury actions, but there have been no representations in the terms of this question.

Gazumping

Mrs. Peacock asked the Attorney-General whether he is considering some form of legally binding contracts for offers to purchase houses to prevent the current spread of the practice of gazumping.

The Attorney-General: The Law Commission's report on "Subject to Contract" agreements (Law Com. No. 65, published in 1975) concluded that legislation to impose civil or criminal liability for "gazumping" would be counter productive. The Government hope that buyers and sellers of houses and flats will give favourable consideration to the pre-contract deposit agreement recommended by the Conveyancing Standing Committee in January last.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Parkhurst Prison

Mr. Barry Field asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to bring A and D wings at Parkhurst prison, Isle of Wight, back into use; how long these wings have remained unused; why they are unused; why, and when, they were rewired; what was the cost of rewiring them; when and why these wings were reroofed; and what was the cost of reroofing them.

Mr. John Patten: A and D wings have been out of use since a roof top demonstration in March 1979. Damage caused by this demonstration necessitated immediate repair of the roof to prevent rapid deterioration of the whole building. These repairs, which cost £80,000, were completed in July 1979. The vacation of the wings at that time gave the opportunity to undertake electrical work which had already been planned; this work cost about £100,000.

Since the essential repair work was completed, plans for the use of A and D wings have changed and designs have been prepared for a long-term redevelopment scheme which involved their complete modernisation, including the provision of association facillities and integral sanitation. This scheme is now at an advanced stage and will be implemented as soon as possible. Meanwhile, the wings are unused because they are structurally unsound.

Computerised Criminal and Immigration Records

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proposed international link-up of computerised (a) criminal and (b) immigration records; what assessment he has made of the implications of the United Kingdom system of data protection for the operation of the proposed international link-up; and what information he has on the compatibility of the definitions of terrorism used by the different countries involved.

Mr. Renton: I am not aware of any proposals for an international link up of computerised criminal or immigration records.

Visas

Mr. Robertson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visas have been refused, curtailed, or revoked for personnel who work in the Iranian office complex at 4 Victoria street, London S.W.1.

Mr. Renton: The office complex at 4 Victoria street, London SW1, houses a number of separate Iranian undertakings. The activities of these offices are monitored closely, and while no action has yet been taken of the kind to which the hon. Member refers, as with any foreign national applying to come to or remain in the United Kingdom, Iranians working there will continue to be expected to meet the requirements of the immigration rules.

Immigration

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of immigrants into the United Kingdom this year have been sponsored by people living within Batley and Spen.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Political Refugees

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of political refugees in the United Kingdom from Iran, Iraq, Libya and Syria at the most recent available date.

Mr. Renton: In the eight years between 1979 and 1986 the numbers of nationals of Iran, Iraq, Libya and Syria granted refugee status in the United Kingdom were about 5,220,440, 130 and 30 respectively. Figures for earlier years are not available. It is not known how many of those granted refugee status have remained in this country.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987;

(2) which ferry operators have been penalised under the provisions of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act;

(3) whether his Department has made an estimate of the cost to ferry operators installing the passenger checking procedures necessary to enable them to comply with the provisions of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act; and if he will make a statement;

(4) on how many occasions penalties have been imposed under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act since it came into force.

Mr. Renton: The Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 received royal assent on 15 May 1987, and made carriers liable to charges from 5 March. Up to 26 June notice of liability had been issued in about 1,500 cases; this number will be reduced if carriers are able to show that the charge should not be made in particular cases. Notices of liability have been issued to a substantial number of airlines and ferry operators. Comprehensive details are not readily available. No estimate has been made of the cost to operators of complying with the new legislation. The majority of ferry passengers are, however, British citizens, others with the right of abode in the United Kingdom, or EC nationals, all of whom require only the briefest of checks to confirm their status.

Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the workings so far of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 with regard to overnight detainees at police stations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 provides the police with power to detain without charge persons suspected of an offence. The period of detention is restricted to a maximum of 24 hours or, in the case of serious offences, 36 hours. If persons are detained overnight they must be permitted a period of eight hours rest and provided with refreshment. After charge, a person who is detained in police custody must be brought before a magistrate's court as soon as practicable, in accordance with section 46 of the Act. All detained persons have a right to consult a solicitor and the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme aims to ensure that, for persons who wish to do so, a solicitor may be consulted outside normal working hours.

I am not aware of the Act having created any problems with regard to the overnight detention of suspects in police stations, but if my hon. Friend has a particular case in mind I shall look into it if he lets me have the details.

Crime (Use of Knives)

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding possible legislation on the sale of knives intended for offensive and criminal purposes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received a number of representations from the police representative organisations, police consultative groups, local authorities, hon. Members and members of the public about the availability of offensive weapons, including knives. Some have suggested that curbs should be placed on their sale. We are committed to bringing forward proposals on the sale of offensive weapons which have no legitimate uses.

Detention (Statistics)

Mr. John Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the average term served by those released from detention during Her Majesty's pleasure during the last five and 10 years respectively.

Mr. John Patten: The average time spent under sentence by persons detained during Her Majesty's pleasure in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales was between six and six and a half years for those first released on licence in the years 1977 to 1986 and in the years 1982 to 1986.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Staff Statistics

Mr. Forth asked the Member representing the House of Commons Commission what are the current salaries and numbers in post of the principal grades of servants of the House of Commons.

Mr. Beith: The following table gives numbers in post and current salary scales of House of Commons staff in grades equivalent or related to Civil Service grades 1 to 7 inclusive:

Numbers of staff in post	Equivalent Civil Service grade	Salary scale 1 April 1987
1	Grade 1	*64,739
2	Grade 2	*43,264-45,349
12	Grade 3	*33,725-36,852
4	Grade 4	31,672-33,235
23	Grade 5	26,204-29,680
1	House of Commons Pay Spine U (equivalent to 98 per cent. of Civil Service Grade 5)	25,709-29,116
14	Grade 6	20,251-26,800
1	House of Commons Pay Spine Z (95 per cent. Grade 6)	19,312-25,533
4	House of Commons Pay Spine ZA (93 per cent. Grade 6)	18,936-25,027
4	House of Commons Pay Spine ZE (83 per cent. Grade 6)	17,037-22,493
45	Grade 7	16,392-21,757

* All rates include inner London weighting of £1,465 per annum except in the case of those grades asterisked to whom no such weighting is payable.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Vietnam

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are the current relations of Her Majesty's Government with Vietnam; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Member for mid-Sussex (Mr. Renton), the them Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 11 June 1986 at column 240. Vietnam's occupation of Cambodia and poor human rights record continues to inhibit our relations.

Libya

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans to establish diplomatic relations with Libya.

Mr. Mellor: No.

Albania

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if there are any plans to establish diplomatic relations with Albania; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: In 1980 we offered to establish diplomatic relations with Albania without preconditions. That offer remains open, but unfortunately the Albanians have not yet taken it up.

Vanuatu

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will seek to dismiss the high commissioner to Vanuatu.

Mr. Eggar: No.

Hong Kong

Dame Jill Knight asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received about the reaction in Hong Kong to China's expressed intentions for the future of the colony, following the recent condemnation by a Peking Foreign Ministry official of attempts to introduce democratic elections; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that my right hon. and learned Friend gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) on 1 July at column 118. I understand that the Chinese official concerned has publicly stated that his remarks were misreported.

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the latest number of representations that have been received by the survey office in Hong Kong in response to the recent Green Paper, "The 1987 Review of Developments in Representative Government"; and how many have been (a) written and (b) oral.

Mr. Eggar: Up to noon on 8 July 1987, the survey office had received 910 representations on the Green Paper entitled "The 1987 Review of Developments in Representative Government." Of these, 899 were written and 11 oral.

European Council (Copenhagen)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the role envisaged for the president of the European Commission and the second member of the Commission, respectively, at the forthcoming European Council at Copenhagen; and by what means proposals they place before the Council will be scrutinised and debated by the House.

Mrs. Chalker: The president of the European Commission and a second member of the Commission will attend the next European Council in Copenhagen as provided in article 2 of the Single European Act which entered into force on 1 July. Commission proposals for submission to the Council will be deposited in Parliament in accordance with the standing arrangements for scrutiny by the House.

Treaty of Rome

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to publish a revised edition of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the Single European Act treaty, together with the preamble of that treaty and its other provisions.

Mrs. Chalker: Now that the Single European Act has entered into force, the European Community publications office are finalising a consolidated text of all the basic Community treaties as amended by the Single European Act. As soon as this is available HMSO will publish its own version.

Indonesia

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the present relations between Her Majesty's Government and Indonesia.

Mr. Eggar: We enjoy good relations with Indonesia. These were strengthened by the visit to London this month of the Indonesian Minister for Research and Technology, Dr. Habibie.

Schoolchildren (Overseas Trips)

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take to seek to stop French immigration authorities singling out individual schoolchildren, travelling on school trips with collective passports, and demanding individual identification where they appear to be of foreign origin.

Mrs. Chalker: We are always ready to investigate specific cases where British travellers overseas appear to have suffered undue inconvenience and, where approproate, to take them up with the authorities concerned.

Sri Lanka

Mr. Burt asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Government of Sri Lanka about the continuing disturbances there; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: We have frequent contacts with Ministers of the Government of Sri Lanka both here and in Colombo. My right hon. and learned Friend discussed the present situation with the Sri Lankan Finance Minister on 19 June, and my noble Friend the Minister of State has recently received the Ministers of National Security and of Lands and Land Development. All reiterated the Sri Lankan Government's commitment to continue to seek a political settlement.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Women's Needs

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. Stanley: In April 1987 the United Kingdom Government produced a co-ordinated response to the "Forward Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women" (FLS) which was adopted by consensus at the Nairobi conference held at the end of the United Nations Decade for Women. This document responds to the recommendations and observations on all aspects of policies for the advancement of women made in the FLS and includes information on monitoring and consultation. The Northern Ireland Office contributed to this reply.

Women's representative organisations in Northern Ireland are regularly consulted during the preparation of legislation and their views are taken into account.

The Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments are responsible for a wide range of public services in Northern Ireland and staff in those services are given appropriate training to ensure their efficient delivery. Where it is relevant to the function in question, the training is designed to help staff appreciate the needs of women in keeping with the needs of all special interest groups.

THE ARTS

Provincial Galleries

Sir David Price asked the Minister for the Arts what progress he has made in arranging for individual objects of superlative artistic merit from the various national collections to be shown in selected provincial galleries on a trial basis.

Mr. Luce: I am concerned to increase public access to the collections of our museums and galleries and regard touring exhibitions as an important means of getting objects to parts of the country where they might not otherwise be seen. I have welcomed the initiative of the Museums and Galleries Commission in setting up a scheme to encourage such exhibitions and have commended to them my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh's suggestion of exhibitions built around one or two outstanding items.

WALES

A55 (Gasworks Waste)

Mr. Martyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether any dumping of gasworks waste from either of the two gasworks demolished for the A55 Expressway has taken place on the Delph landfill site, Plas Bennion, Acrefair.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A quantity of sand was removed from the site of a former gasworks at Conwy Morfa and was deposited at the Delph landfill site, Plas Bennion, Acrefair. I understand that the local authority which is responsible for the site has inquired into the nature of this material, but the results are not yet known.

Sheep

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the sheep industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The sheep industry in Wales has benefited considerably from the EC sheepmeat regime, and the breeding flock has been increasing by 2 to 3 per cent. annually. Producers in Wales benefit from the sheep variable premium scheme for finished lambs — worth £22·7 million in 1986-87, and from the sheep annual premium scheme on breeding ewes worth £37·9 million in 1986-87. In addition hill livestock compensatory allowances on sheep totalled £19·8 million in Wales in 1986.

Development Bodies (Finance)

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table giving the total annual budget of the Welsh Development Agency in each year from 1979-80 to 1987-88 at 1987-88 prices, and on the same basis, total annual expenditure.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information is as follows:

Welsh Development Agency Spending: 1979-80 to 1987-88

£ million 1987-88 prices[1]

	Gross annual budget[2]	Gross expenditure
1979-80	107·8	108·8
1980-81	136·2	129·2
1981-82	141·7	117·8
1982-83	106·0	94·9
1983-84	77·1	80·6
1984-85	82·2	90·6
1985-86	68·1	71·8
1986-87	76·3	76·2
1987-88	86·5	—

[1] Adjusted using the GDP deflator.
[2] Finalised annual budgets which reflect in year adjustments.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table giving the total annual budget of the Development Board for Rural Wales, Mid Wales Development, in each year from 1979-80 to 1987-88 at 1987-88 prices, and on the same basis, total annual expenditure.

Mr. Peter Walker: The gross initial budget provision and the subsequent levels of gross expenditure for the Development Board for Rural Wales at June 1987 prices, based on the gross domestic product (market prices) deflator, are as follows:

£ million 1987-88 prices

	[1]Gross budget provision	[1]Gross expenditure
1979-80	16·0	16·0
1980-81	9·9	9·8
1981-82	13·5	11·2
1982-83	12·9	11·9
1983-84	13·0	11·3
1984-85	13·3	13·4
1985-86	13·4	13·6
1986-87	13·4	[2]13·1
1987-88	13·5	[3]13·5

[1]Figures exclude finance charges arising from repayment of advances under the National Loans Fund.
[2]Provisional.
[3]Estimated

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the value of assets sold by (a) the Welsh Development Agency and (b) the Development Board for Rural Wales in each of the years since 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the annual accounts of the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales for the years up to and including 1985-86, which are in the Library of the House. For 1986-87, for which accounts have not yet been finalised, the estimated value of assets sold by the WDA is £14·6 million and for the DBRW is £1·7 million.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish, for each parliamentary constituency, the amounts spent on (a) industrial investments, (b) factory construction and (c) environmental improvements by the Welsh Development Agency in each year since 1983.

Mr. Peter Walker: The WDA does not maintain details of expenditure in the form requested.

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish, for each parliamentary constituency, the amounts spent on (a) industrial investments and (b) factory construction by the Development Board for Rural Wales, Mid Wales Development, in each year since 1983.

Mr. Peter Walker: The Development Board for Rural Wales has no powers to undertake equity investment in companies. That is the responsibility of the Welsh Development Agency and figures are not available in the form requested. For each parliamentary constituency which falls in whole or in part within the territory of the Development Board for Rural Wales expenditure on factory construction was as follows:

	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87
Brecon and Radnor	635	833	980	680
Ceredigion and Pembroke North	1,412	1,259	915	1,202
Meirionnydd Nant Conwy	375	258	442	205
Montgomery	1,274	2,387	3,383	4,364

Beach Pollution

Mr. Barry Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is proposing to take to reduce the level of pollution on beaches in Wales following the recent survey conducted by the Coastal Anti-Pollution League.

Mr. Grist: Action to improve the quality of Welsh bathing waters and thereby reduce the level of pollution on Welsh beaches is a matter for the Welsh water authority. The authority's "Plan 86" noted the need for expenditure up to £70 million to ensure that those bathing waters recognised under the EC bathing water directive comply with the required standards of the directive.

Nurse Training

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent on nurse training in the last four years; how much he estimates will be spent in the year 1987-88; and what are the corresponding figures at constant prices.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Actual expenditure £ million	Constant price at 1987-88 £ million
1983-84	24·940	25·237
1984-85	26·671	26·976
1985-86	25·802	26·080
1986-87	[1]26·312	[1]26·587

[1] Estimated.

For the financial year 1987-88 it is estimated that the actual expenditure will be £29·5 million. For each year, actual expenditure is made up from two figures. The first is expenditure by the Welsh National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting on salaries of nurse teachers and other training costs. The second is salaries, national insurance and superannuation costs for learners, paid by health authorities. The salary costs do not take account of the service contributions made by learners during training, which vary according to the particular course and the school of nursing. There is additional, but not separately identified, expenditure on informal teaching costs (teaching provided by qualified staff to learners during clinical placements) and on maintenance and contributions in lieu of rates in respect of schools of nursing.

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales what arrangements he is making to pay local authorities additional resources in respect of the teachers' pay award for 1986-87.

Mr. Peter Walker: I am today laying before the House of Commons the Welsh Rate Support Grant Supplementary (No. 2) Report 1986-87, which makes provision for additional expenditure by local authorities and for additional rate support grant in respect of the pay award to teachers for 1986-87.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Overseas Service Aid Scheme

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Overseas Development Administration lists of OSAS appointments and addresses of appointees in any Commonwealth country are in any way (a) classified or (b) subject to any restriction on circulation to the general public.

Mr. Chris Patten: Details of those serving under the overseas service aid scheme are not regarded by the ODA as classified. The Government do not circulate lists of officers, nor disclose their private addresses, to the general public. There are a number of associations of aid-financed officers who are, of course, free to circulate lists to their members, and their addresses, according to their own rules and policies.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sugar

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the cost to the European Community of subsidising exports of sugar in each of the last five years.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The total cost of export refunds on Community sugar was as follows:

	£ million
1982	415·0
1983	444·7
1984	694·9
1985	795·5
1986	802·3

This cost was met partly by production levies charged on Community sugar.

Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the total cost to the European Community of the sugar regime, and the amounts received from levies on sugar beet farmers, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The information requested is as follows. Levy revenue is raised both from production levies paid by sugar manufacturers, who in turn may pass up to 60 per cent. of the cost on to beet growers, and storage levies charged on first-hand sales of Community quota sugar in order to meet the cost of storing Community sugar.

Year	Gross expenditure £ million	Total levy revenue £ million
1982	692·7	393·7
1983	772·1	556·1
1984	952·7	687·0
1985	1,061·1	621·8
1986	1,117·9	[1]

[1] Not available.

Food Exports (Radioactivity)

Mr. Illsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the value of all foods and food products returned to the United Kingdom from other countries due to unacceptable levels of radiation, since the explosion at the Chernobyl nuclear reactor.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr.

Griffiths) on 6 July. This information is not available and there is no statutory requirement for exporters to furnish details of any returned consignments.

The British Government have made it clear that they regard the level of 600 Bq/kg adopted for Community imports from third countries as unduly restrictive and are supporting moves to establish more scientifically based levels in future EC emergency regulations.

Green Pound

Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what is the gap between the green pound and the pound sterling in the beef sector following the devaluation of the green pound in December 1986;

(2) what is the gap between the green pound and the pound sterling in the beef sector as a result of the decisions taken by the Council of Ministers on 30 June 1987.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom MCAs applying in the beef sector immediately before and after the green rate devaluations taking effect on 5 January and 6 July 1987 were:

	5 January per cent.	6 July per cent.
Before	−23·6	−15·1
After	−18·4	−10·6

ENERGY

Advanced Gas-cooled Reactors

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board, the South of Scotland Electricity Board and the Atomic Energy Authority on correction of temporary defects in advanced gas-cooled reactors.

Mr. Parkinson: I have had a preliminary discussion with the chairman of the CEGB at which he explained some of the operational problems being experienced with the board's advanced gas-cooled reactors. Since these are operational matters, I shall ask him to write to the hon. Member. Questions about the South of Scotland Electricity Board are a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Flue Gas Desulphurisation

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what studies the Central Electricity Generating Board has performed to assess the environmental impact of the operation of various systems of flue gas desulphurisation; if he will list those systems which have already been investigated by the board and those which it still intends to investigate; and when he or the board intends to publish the results of these studies;

(2) on what date the Central Electricity Generating Board commenced investigations into the environmental impact of various systems of flue gas desulphurisation for use at coal-fired power stations; and if he will outline the criteria which the board have applied in its studies;

(3) what studies the Central Electricity Generating Board has performed to investigate the environmental impact of the operation of (a) the limestone/gypsum and (b) the Wellman-Lord systems of flue gas desulphurisation (FGD) for Drax B power station; what investigations have been performed by the board in these areas; what results have been yielded; and what is currently the board's favoured option for FGD at Drax B.

Mr. Michael Spicer: These are matters for the Central Electricity Generating Board and I shall ask the chairman to write to the hon. Member.

EMPLOYMENT

Co-operatives

66. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Employment what action his Department has taken to encourage the development of co-operatives.

Mr. Cope: Co-operatives can benefit from a number of schemes introduced by the Government to help and encourage small businesses, such as the loan guarantee scheme and the enterprise allowance scheme. In addition, the National Co-operative Development Agency, which is sponsored by this Department, seeks to stimulate the growth of co-operatives by providing help and advice to co-operatives and to people wishing to set up such enterprises. The number of co-operatives has increased from 300 in 1980 to more than 1,500 at present.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Research and Development

65. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what information he has about the amount of research for British industry currently being conducted at universities in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jackson: In 1984-85 (the latest year for which figures are available) universities in the United Kingdom received £47·7 million from industry in the form of research grants and contracts. This compares with £147·5 million from the research councils, £64·3 million from Government Departments and £57·2 million from United Kingdom-based charitable bodies. I am sure that industry would benefit from taking greater advantage of what the universities have to offer.

City Technical Colleges

Mr. Hill asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what progress has been made in talks with industry for the financial support of a city technology college in Southampton.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has as yet received no proposals to establish a city technology college in Southampton. If there is support in industry and in the local community for doing so he would be pleased to consider any proposals which are put forward.

Nursery Education

Ms. Gordon asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he intends to take to extend pre-school education to ensure that a place is available for all three to five-year-olds whose parents require it.

Mr. Dunn: It is for local education authorities to determine the scale and nature of their educational provision for the under-fives in the light of their own priorities and assessment of local needs. The Government's plans for expenditure on education allow for provision attributable to under-fives to continue in real terms within broadly the same totals as today. Both participation rates and the actual numbers of under-fives in school are currently the highest ever.

Grammar Schools

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many of the proposals from local education authorities for secondary school reorganisation currently before him involve the closure of grammar schools.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is currently considering six proposals under section 12 of the Education Act 1980 which involve the closure of grammar schools.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department employs about 1,200 staff at its London headquarters and 600 at its Darlington office. Seventy-five are employed at the University Grants Committee, also in London. The remaining 600 Department of Education and Science staff mainly Her Majesty's inspectors of schools and their support staff, are based at small divisional and local offices throughout the country. Provision in the Supply Estimates for the Department's gross running costs in 1987-88 is £58·336 million, but it is not possible to break this figure down by location.

Fleckney Primary School

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, in the light of the failure of the Leicestershire education authority to provide facilities at the two sites of Fleckney Church of England (Controlled) Primary School for children to partake of packed lunches, as required under section 22 of the Education Act 1982, he will take steps to resolve the matter forthwith.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend is satisfied, on the basis of inquiries made by his officials, that the Leicestershire education authority is doing everything possible to ensure that facilities are restored at the school.

University Grants Committee (Court Costs)

Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has granted any additional funding to the University Grants Committee to enable it to finance expenses incurred by universities in contesting test cases in the courts; and which universities and colleges have received undertakings from the University Grants Committee that such litigation will be underwritten by the grants committee.

Mr. Jackson: No additional funds have been provided by the Government for this particular purpose. The UGC told universities in 1982 that, in appropriate circumstances, it would be ready to make a contribution towards damages and costs arising from court proceedings in connection with redundancy. This remains its policy.

A-level Examinations (Specialisation)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Scretary of State for Education and Science what is his policy towards the early specialisation entailed by the present system of A-levels.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Government are concerned to broaden the curriculum of A-level students without diluting academic standards. They have announced the introduction in September next of a new examination course, Advanced Supplementary level. The new courses should increase the range of options open to A-level students and give them new opportunities to continue the study to A-level standard of subjects which contrast with or complement their main field of study. The first examinations will be held in summer 1989.

Village Schools

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the criteria his Department has laid down as to the minimum number of (a) pupils, (b) teachers and (c) facilities acceptable for the maintenance of a rural village school.

Mr. Dunn: My Department has made no such stipulations. Circular 3/87, issued on 6 May, referred to the general principles proposed in the White Paper "Better Schools" concerning the size thresholds at which schools of different types can economically deliver a satisfactory curriculum, but acknowledged that there may be some localities where for geographic and other reasons smaller schools need to be maintained.

Geological Surveying

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has received the report of the study group chaired by Sir Clifford Butler into geological surveying; if he intends to publish the report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science has received Sir Clifford Butler's report from the chairmen of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils and of the Natural Environment Research Council, who have recommended that it be published. Accordingly, the report is being published today and copies are being placed in the Library of the House. A number of the recommendations fall to be considered by the Government and my Department is consulting other Departments concerned. My right hon. Friend will make a further statement when these consultations have been completed.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Civil Servants (Salaries)

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many United Kingdom civil servants currently enjoy salaries in excess of (a) £18,500 per annum, (b) £21,500 per annum and (c) £24,000 per annum.

Mr. Brooke: Based on staff numbers at 1 October 1986 and the revised pay rates effective from 1 April 1987, it is estimated that there are 18,400 non-industrial staff in the home Civil Service whose basic pay is in excess of £18,500 per annum, 9,100 in excess of £21,500 per annum and 7,500 in excess of £24,000 per annum. Figures for the Northern Ireland Civil Service cannot be provided on precisely the same basis but would add about 5 per cent. to the numbers in each of the three categories.

Regional Pay

Mr. Redwood asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if his Department has considered using London weighting style allowances as a form of regional pay; and what recent studies have been conducted by his Department into housing costs and labour market pressures affecting public sector workers within and outside the boundaries for payments of London weighting allowances.

Mr. Brooke: In addition to London weighting the Civil Service pay arrangements already permit variation in pay rates, according to the locality of the office, through special pay additions. Other recent developments have ben the new agreement with the Institution of Professional Civil Servants on flexible pay, and changes in the financial package offered when civil servants move location, which now takes more account of variations in house prices across the country.

The Treasury and the MPO monitor relevant developments and their effect on recruitment and retention. Proposals are under consideration to address problems of recruitment and retention where they exist in London, the south-east and other particular areas.

Privatisation (Shareholders)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of shareholders now owning shares in companies privatised since 1979 are (a) current or (b) former employees of that company.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

DEFENCE

NATO—Warsaw Pact (Air Forces)

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Government have changed their assessment of the relative superiority of the air forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation and the Warsaw pact, given the change between paragraph 6, annex A of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986" and paragraph 4, annex A of the current year.

Mr. Ian Stewart: These two paragraphs are to be taken in different contexts. Paragraph 6 of annex A of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986 (Cmnd. 9763-I)" is concerned with the modernisation programmes of NATO's air forces which make an essential contribution to countering the Warsaw pact armoured threat. The equivalent paragraph in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987 (Cmnd. 101-I)" is paragraph 10 of annex A. Paragraph 4 of annex A in this year's statement is part of a commentary on the balance of conventional forces, which indicates that NATO aircraft face greater numbers of Warsaw pact aircraft, a situation unaltered from previous years.

ENVIRONMENT

Rates

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will detail the percentage contributed to total non-domestic rates for England and Wales from (a) commercial properties, (b) industrial properties and (c) other premises.

Mr. Howard: Following is the available information for 1987-88:

Composition of non-domestic rate income in England and Wales

	Per cent.
Commercial properties	52
Industrial properties	29
Other premises	19

House of Commons (Maintenance)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what sums have been allocated in each of the last seven years for expenditure on fixtures, fittings, and equipment in the Vote Office, Table Office, Library, Chamber, Committee Rooms in the Commons and the Commons Dining Rooms, separately.

Mr. Chope: The Property Services Agency, including the Crown Suppliers, is responsible for providing furniture and fittings to agreed standards, and some equipment for the Palace of Westminster. The total value of purchases on these items for the parliamentary estate is currently some £400,000 per annum. Expenditure is not recorded separately for each of the areas identified by the hon. Member.

Housing Investment Programme

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the Nottingham housing investment programme bids and the allocation each year since 1979 at constant 1987 prices.

Mr. Waldegrave: The position has changed since 1979, in that local housing authorities nationally now fund more than half their capital expenditure from capital receipts, rather than from housing investment programme allocations made by the Department.

The proposed capital programme shown by authorities in their HIP submissions cannot therefore be compared directly with their HIP allocations.

Since 1979 the final HIP allocations made to Nottingham city council, and their total capital expenditure on housing, have been as follows:

	1987-88 prices
	HIP allocation £ million	Expenditure £ million
1979-80	42·959	41·890
1980-81	29·211	29·687
1981-82	21·900	26·381
1982-83	24·778	30·831

	1987-88 prices
	HIP allocation £ million	Expenditure £ million
1983-84	18·985	32·845
1984-85	17·355	32·449
1985-86	15·056	27·027
1986-87	13·466	[2]39·701
1987-88	[1]11·091

[1] Initial HIP allocation.

Commission for the New Towns

Mr. Hind asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to increase the funds made available to the Commission for the New Towns in order to enable it to increase its advertising budget.

Mrs. Roe: My right hon. Friend does not provide any funds for the commission's publicity budget; the commission generates sufficient income to cover this and the majority of its expenditure on other activities. It is in the first instance a matter for the commission to assess the levels of expenditure which are required to carry out its responsibilities.

Coal-fired Power Stations

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies his officials have undertaken or commissioned into the environmental impact of various flue gas desulphurisation systems for use at coal-fired power stations; what systems have been investigated; and what results and conclusions have been yielded.

Mr. Ridley: At the request of my Department, the Fellowship of Engineering is preparing an extensive report on individual process and abatement technologies applicable to stationary and mobile sources of pollution arising from the combustion of fossil fuels, including all the main flue gas desulphurisation processes.

The study, which includes an appraisal of the process costs, operating experience, material requirements and ease of by-product disposal, is nearing completion and I expect it to be available for publication in the autumn.

Cars (Emissions)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will provide a table of information outlining nitrogen oxide emissions in grams per kilometre for average cars in service performing standard test cycles using 95 RON petrol, according to (a) the ECE 15-04 urban test cycle and (b) at constant speeds of 90 kilometres per hour and 120 kilometres per hour for the following: (i) the current conventional spark ignition engine with carburettor, (ii) the July 1985 Luxembourg agreement for combined nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons, (iii) United States 1983 standards and (iv) California 1989 standards;

(2) if he will provide a table of information containing estimates of reductions in nitrogen emissions, additional vehicle production costs and fuel penalty for the following technical systems of exhaust emission control for average cars in service performing standard test cycles using unleaded 95 RON petrol: (a) the current conventional spark ignition engine with carburettor, (b) the July 1985 Luxembourg agreement for combined nitrogen oxides and hydrocarbons, (c) the United States 1983 standards and (d) California 1989 standards.

Mr. Ridley: Information on vehicle emission control costs and performance in the terms set out in the hon. Member's questions is currently being analysed by international experts, including delegates from the United Kingdom, for the Executive Body for the Convention of Long-range Transboundary Air Pollution of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe. I would expect the Executive Body to approve the final report for publication at its next session in November this year and I will ensure a copy is placed in the Library of the House at the earliest opportunity.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report the general criteria used by the London Docklands Development Corporation to value the land it has for sale; at what stage of negotiation with any purchasers the corporation is bound by agreements, or previously determined formulae; and to what extent any such formulae take account of increased land values.

Mr. Trippier: The general criteria are that when the London Docklands Development Corporation sells land it must obtain a certificate from an independent valuer that the price is not below current market value and, if that is unobtainable, it must seek specific consent from the Department to the disposal of land at a lower price.

The corporation becomes bound when contracts become unconditional and the point at which this happens will depend upon the nature of the agreement and on its precise terms.

Spectrum Arena, Birchwood

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his reply of 1 July, Official Report, column 99, what is the value of the Spectrum Arena in Birchwood; how long the Spectrum Arena has been empty; and if the Spectrum Arena will be available to Warrington borough council under similar terms to other disposals of community-related assets of development corporations.

Mrs. Roe: The Spectrum Arena was closed on 30 June last year. I cannot say how much the development corporation would be prepared to accept for a sale of the arena, without prejudicing its bargaining position. The corporation would consider any reasonable offer from the council.

Radon Gas

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his proposals for legislation to prevent the construction of buildings susceptible to the build-up of radon gas.

Mr. Moynihan: The building regulations already provide sufficient powers to regulate the construction of new buildings. The regulations are supported by approved documents which give guidance on how to comply with regulations. The Department is working on guidance to be included in the approved documents on measures which may need to be taken in areas where radon is a problem.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what work is still being done and how many people are still employed on the site of Fulbeck which was earlier being considered for nuclear dumping;

(2) what work is still being done and how many people are still employed on the site of Elstow which was earlier being considered for nuclear dumping;

(3) what work is still being done and how many people are still employed on the site of South Killingholme which was earlier being considered for nuclear dumping;

(4) what work is still being done and how many people are still employed on the site of Bradwell which was earlier being considered for nuclear dumping.

Mr. Moynihan: All four sites are in the final stages of reinstatement in accordance with the conditions in the special development order. The total labour force working on all four sites on 7 July was 11; this number varies from day to day as work progresses.

Birmingham Urban Development Agency

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now set a deadline for the submission by Birmingham city council of its proposals for an urban development agency in Birmingham.

Mr. Trippier: No. The city council and its partners are now appointing consultants to prepare a development strategy for east Birmingham which I understand could be complete in September. This is a constructive move forward.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the dates when Ministers in his Department have had meetings with Birmingham city council about the proposed urban development agency.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend met the city council on 30 July and 8 December 1986 and proposes to meet it again shortly to discuss its proposals for an urban development agency.

Council Tenants

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what research his Department is carrying out on the effect on council tenants to transfer their existing tenancy to a private landlord on the quality of management and maintenance of rented property in London, particularly as regards the level of vacancy and the physical condition of the property.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 7 July 1987]: Under our policies, council tenants will be able to judge for themselves which landlord, council or other, offers them the best quality of housing management and maintenance services and to act accordingly.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to submit for further review the price agreed by the London Docklands Development Corporation and the developers of Canary wharf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: I shall answer this question shortly.

SOCIAL SERVICES

NHS (Expenditure)

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the National Health Service per capita expenditure for each region of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Newton: National Health Service per capita expenditure for each of the English regional health authorities, including estimates of the expenditure on the family practitioner services in each region, is set out in the table. Expenditure in Scotland and Wales is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary for Wales.

Region	Expenditure per capita (£)
Northern	287·88
Yorkshire	284·10
Trent	264·82
East Anglian	267·88
North West Thames	300·15
North East Thames	328·44
South East Thames	308·83
South West Thames	291·97
Wessex	270·30
Oxford	244·08
South Western	286·68
West Midlands	278·18
Mersey	295·82
North Western	308·52
England total	292·28

Notes:

(1) Derived from the summarised accounts for 1985-86 of Regional Health Authorities, London Post-Graduate Special Health Authorities and Family Practitioner Committees.

(2) On basis of population estimates for mid-1985. (These population figures do not fully reflect relative need for health care in each Region).

Hospital Staffs (East Cumbria)

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the turnover in the number of domestic staff at the east Cumbria hospitals since these services were privatised; and what they were for the preceding year;

(2) what is the sickness rate for the domestic staff at the east Cumbria hospitals since these services were privatised; and what were the figures for the preceding year.

Mr. Newton: This information is not held centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of East Cumbria health authority for the information he requires.

NHS (Staff Recruitment)

Mr. Redwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consideration his Department has given to the effect of the boundaries for outer London weighting allowance on the recruitment of skilled staff for health service jobs elsewhere in the south-east.

Mr. Newton: The boundaries within which London weighting allowances are payable are a matter for negotiation between the Management and Staff Sides of the London weighting consortium of the General Whitley Council.

Induced Births

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about the proportion of births which are started by artificial induction and the proportion which are accelerated; and what are the current trends.

Mrs. Currie: The estimated proportions of deliveries in National Health Service hospitals which were artificially induced or in which labour was accelerated are given in the table. The information is derived from a nominal 10 per cent. sample of cases recorded by the Maternity Hospital In-Patient Enquiry.

Deliveries assisted by Artificial Induction or Accelerated Labour Percentages—England

Figures for 1981 are not available.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many married women have become eligible for invalid care allowance since Mrs. Jackie Drake won her case on this; and if he is satisfied with the rate of take-up.

Mr. Scott: The steps we have taken to publicise the extension of invalid care allowance to married women have produced a substantial response. At 3 July, the latest date for which information is available, over 118,500 claims had been received from married women, of which about 64,000 have been successful and some 34,000 are awaiting decision.

Out-of-School Provision

Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that the present level of out-of-school provision meets the need of working parents and their children.

Mrs. Currie: Out of school provision is primarily a matter for parents but many local authorities provide schemes. The Department has for many years recognised the needs of working parents and families under stress by providing funding to the National Out of School Alliance, a voluntary body which stimulates the development of out of school schemes.

Ante-natal Care and Confinement

Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to allow women the freedom to choose local facilities for ante-natal care and confinement.

Mrs. Currie: We have commended to health authorities the three reports from the Maternity Services Advisory Committee which offer advice on good practice in maternity care. The report on ante-natal care emphasises the need for careful assessment, reflecting the mother's views, needs and wishes in determining the plan for care at all stages in the pregnancy.

Maternity Facilities

Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards the nature and degree of centralisation of maternity facilities.

Mrs. Currie: The second Maternity Services Advisory Committee report encourages women to have their babies in a hospital offering the full range of services necessary to cope with any emergencies. It is for health authorities to determine locally how best to implement this policy.

Maternity Grant

Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women claimed maternity grant in the last month of availability in Bristol; and what is the best estimate of the number of women who have had social fund payments for maternity in the first month of availability in Bristol.

Mr. Portillo: The numbers of claims for maternity grant received at the Department's local offices in Bristol between 6 March 1987 and 5 April 1987 are as follows:

Office	Number
Bristol Central	70
Bristol East	180
Bristol Horfield	41
Bristol South	116
Bristol West	71

The numbers of Social Fund payments for maternity expenses made by Bristol local offices between 6 April 1987 and 5 May 1987 are as follows:

Office	Number
Bristol Central	16
Bristol East	24
Bristol Horfield	14
Bristol South	15
Bristol West	10

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many maternity grants were claimed and how many were awarded during the month of March.

Mr. Portillo: Information is not readily available in the precise form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Between 4 March 1987 and 31 March 1987, the Department's child benefit centre at Washington received, from local offices, 9,036 maternity grant claims.

During the same period 7,738 maternity grants were awarded but that figure will include some awards for claims received before 4 March 1987.

Benefit Fraud Investigation

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether one of the special benefit fraud investigation teams will be operating in Carlisle in the near future.

Mr. Portillo: There are no plans to deploy one of this Department's benefit fraud teams in the Carlisle area in the near future.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of abortions carried out in each year since the passing of the Abortion Act 1967 for the following reasons: (a) rape and (b) danger to the life of the mother.

Mr. Newton: The available information is shown in the table. Prior to 1987, it is not possible to identify reliably all those notifications of abortions which mention rape. Arrangements are being made in order to provide this information for current and future abortions.

Number of notifications of abortions carried out under the Abortion Act 1967, residents and non-residents, in emergency in order to save the life of the pregnant woman, England and Wales, 1968-1986

Health Education Authority

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many staff of the former Health Education Council are currently employed by the Health Education Authority, in numbers and as a proportion of total Health Education Authority staff.

Mrs. Currie: Forty-nine, representing 96 per cent. of the authority's permanent staff. The authority is currently recruiting additional staff to fill existing vacancies and in preparation for assuming control of the national health educational programme on AIDS.

Cancer Screening

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of local health authorities have an adequate recall system for smear testing.

Mrs. Currie: Ninety per cent. of health authorities report that they have adequate recall systems for cervical cancer screening. Several other authorities have systems covering part of the district. In the remaining areas a number of individual general practices operate their own recall system.

All health authorities should have implemented computerised call and recall systems by next spring.

Single Payments

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is the rate of awards of single payments per thousand claimants of (a) supplementary pensions and (b) supplementary allowances, both nationally and for each of the local offices of his Department in Stockton, Hartlepool, Middlesbrough, Eston and Redcar;

(2) what were the numbers of single payments claimed, and the numbers and value of single payments awarded, both nationally and for each of the offices of his Department in (a) Stockton, (b) Hartlepool, (c) Middlesbrough and (d) Eston and Redcar during each month from August 1985 and up to the latest month for which figures are available, under each of Regulation 7, Regulations 9 and 10, Regulation 12, Regulation 27 and Regulation 30 as shown by the "Annual Statistical Enquiry";

(3) what were the total numbers of single payment claims and the numbers and value of single payments awarded, both nationally and for each of the offices of his Department in (a) Stockton, (b) Hartlepool, (c) Middlesbrough and (d) Eston and Redcar, during each month from August 1985 up to the latest complete month for which figures are available;

(4) what is the average amount per single payment awarded to claimants of (a) supplementary pension and (b) supplementary allowances, both nationally and for each of the local offices of his Department in (i) Stockton, (ii) Hartlepool, (iii) Middlesbrough and (iv) Eston and Redcar.

Mr. Portillo: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many single payments under regulation 8 of the Supplementary Benefit Payment Regulations were claimed and how many were awarded during the month of March.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested is not available on a monthly basis and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what were the numbers and value of single payments awarded (a) nationally and (b) for each of the offices of his Department at (i) Stockton, (ii) Hartlepool, (iii) Middlesbrough and (iv) Eston and Redcar, under regulation 28 of the Supplementary Single Payment Regulations, during the 12-month period ended 11 August 1986.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Maternity Expenses (Claims)

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many social fund claims for maternity expenses were made and how many were awarded during the month of April.

Mr. Portillo: Figures are not available for April only. During the period 6 April 1987 to 5 May 1987, 16,148 claims for social fund maternity payments were made. During that same period, 11,249 awards were made.

Death Grant

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many death grants were claimed, and how many were awarded, during the month of March.

Mr. Portillo: Information on claims for death grant is reported on a strict four-weekly basis and not for calendar months.

The number of claims for death grant in the period which includes March is as follows:

Period	Number of Claims
11 February 1987—10 March 1987	51,472
11 March 1987—7 April 1987	48,554

Information is not reported on the number of death grants awarded.

Severe Weather Assistance

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to assist vulnerable people during periods of exceptionally severe weather once the present arrangements for severe weather payments are abolished in April 1988; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on 3 July at column 186.

State Pensions

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has for each European Economic Community country as to the percentage of average wages paid in state pensions; and what is the figure for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Scott: Most European Community countries pay pensions linked to an individual's own contributions and earnings between set limits. Pension levels may therefore vary widely from pensioner to pensioner, and no comparison with national average wages is feasible. Differences in social security schemes and in the availability of other forms of help for pensioners also mean that pension levels alone are an inadequate indicator of pensioner living standards in different countries. In the United Kingdom the basic pensions for a single person and a married couple at April 1987 were respectively worth 29·8 per cent. and 45·3 per cent. of net average male manual earnings (1). Receipt of graduated pension and state earnings-related pension would increase that percentage. In terms of total net income, pensioners' incomes in 1985 (latest available date) were 60 per cent. of the total average net income of those in full-time work.
(1) provisional figures

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the amount paid in sterling equivalent in state pension to the retired in the other European Economic Community countries; and what is the amount currently paid out in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on 7 July.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has as to the percentage increase which has taken place in other European Economic Community countries in the last eight years in the married and single person's state retirement pensions.

Mr. Scott: Most European Community countries adjust state retirement pensions in line with the movement in prices. The percentage increase in pension rates paid therefore depends largely on the rate of inflation in each country. For more detailed information on the uprating method and timetable used in individual countries, I refer the hon. Member to section IV of the Department's publication, "Tables of Social Benefit Systems in the European Communities (Position at 1 January 1986)", a copy of which is in the Library.

Nurse Training

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much was spent on nurse training in the past four years; how much he estimates will be spent in the year 1987-88; and what are the corresponding figures at constant prices.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Organ Transplants

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on his policy on infant organ transplants.

Mrs. Currie: The Conference of Royal Colleges and their Faculties in Great Britain is producing guidance on transplantation from and into neonates. Pending the establishment of valid guidelines, the conference recommended an immediate moratorium on all transplants from and into infants up to the age of one month. On 10 February 1987 the Department's chief medical officer wrote to all regional medical officers endorsing this recommendation and asking that it be brought to the attention of cardiac surgeons and other clinicians with an interest.

Family Income Supplement

Mr. Sayeed asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many civil servants are in receipt of family income supplement.

Mr. Scott: Some 2,000 non-industrial civil servants (0·4 per cent. of the total work force) are currently estimated to be receiving family income supplement, of whom fewer than 300 are employed by this Department.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Insider Dealing

4. Mrs. Ann Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action he has taken on information so far received from the inspector appointed by him to inquire into insider dealing at the Department of Trade and Industry.

Mr. Maude: Inspectors were appointed last December to investigate possible unlawful insider dealing involving information relating to the exercise of functions under the Fair Trading Act 1973 of the Secretary of State, the Director General of Fair Trading or the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

My Department is keeping the Director of Public Prosecutions, who would be responsible for any prosecution in this case, informed of its progress, but has not taken any other action on information received from the inspectors.

North Devon

15. Mr. Speller asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will seek powers to enable him to restore development or assisted area status to north Devon; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I am not persuaded that there is a case for change in the boundaries of the assisted areas map which were established only two and a half years ago.

Manufacturing Industry

16. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the deficit on manufacturing trade with European Economic Community countries in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; and what was the export-import ratio in manufactures in that period.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the 12 months to March the deficit was £9·7 billion on the balance of payments basis. The ratio of exports to imports was 72 per cent.

19. Mr. Loyden asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he next intends to meet the Trades Union Congress to discuss investment in manufacturing industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no present plans for a meeting with the TUC on this subject. But I will study with interest any views on investment in manufacturing industry which it lets me have.

21. Mr. Caborn asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much was invested in manufacturing industry in Yorkshire and Humberside in 1986-87.

Mr. Atkins: The data for 1986 and 1987 are not available. Manufacturing investment in Yorkshire and Humberside in 1985 is estimated to be £680 million.

23. Mr. Knox asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the most recent figure for output in manufacturing industry; and how this compares with the figure for the same month 13 years ago.

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend will appreciate that monthly data can be erratic especially when comparisons are made with 1974 when output was affected by the three-day week. However, since the trough of the recession in 1981, manufacturing output has increased by over 16 per cent. to reach a level of 108·1 in April 1987, based on 1980 equal to 100. This was about 6 per cent. lower than the level of output in April 1974.

26. Mr. Morgan asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he next intends to meet the Confederation of British Industry to discuss the trade deficit in manufactured goods.

Mr. Alan Clark: My colleagues and I meet the CBI from time to time. I have no plans for a special meeting on this subject.

36. Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much was invested in manufacturing industry in (a) Wales and (b) England in 1986-87.

Mr. Atkins: The requested investment data for Wales and England for 1986 and 1987 are not available. The latest available data are for 1985. For this year net capital expenditure[1] in manufacturing industry in Wales is estimated to be £563 million. The corresponding figure for England is £7,111 million.

[1] Excludes expenditure on assets leased from the financial industries.

37. Mr. Cryer asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give the current balance of trade in manufactured goods between the United Kingdom and the rest of the world.

43. Mr Morley asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the size of the current deficit in the balance of trade in manufactured goods.

52. Mr. Blair asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the current level of the deficit on manufactured trade.

Mr. Alan Clark: In the first four months of 1987 there was a deficit on trade in manufactures of £1·2 billion.

38. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action he intends taking to support manufacturing industry.

Mr. Atkins: We shall continue to pursue policies conducive to enterprise and expansion through lower inflation and sustained economic growth. We are also implementing a range of policies designed to help industry become more flexible and competitive, including the promotion of competition, including a reduction in the role of the state through privatisation; the reduction in the amount of red tape facing business; an emphasis on training and improving the links between industry and education and selective financial support to encourage industrial competitiveness, innovation and exports.

61. Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans his Department has to review manufacturing industry in the inner cities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are continuing to develop the measure outlined before the election, including my Department's inner cities initiative, for targeting assistance more effectively on the problems of the inner city. I shall ensure that my Department's programmes take proper account of the need to encourage the establishment and revitalisation of businesses in the inner city areas.

63. Mr. Hardy asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps he is taking to ensure that manufacturing industry is developed within the South Yorkshire area.

Mr. Atkins: The Government are applying measures to create the right climate in which industry generally can prosper. Under the Government's regional policy, the whole of south Yorkshire has assisted area status. This provides access to a range of regional incentives for industrial development from both the United Kingdom Government and the European Community.

7. Mr. Pike asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what five sectors of the manufacturing industries have suffered the worst deterioration in balance of trade since 1979.

Mr. Alan Clark [pursuant to his oral reply, 8 July 1987]: Following are the five best sectors, excluding oil extraction and financial services:

SIC Group
364	Aerospace Equipment
251	Basic Industrial Chemicals
257	Pharmaceutical Products
256	Special Industrial and Agricultural Products
424	Spirit Distilling

Brittany Ferries (Ferry Order)

17. Mr. Millan asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the outcome of his representations to the European Commission on the placing of a ferry order by Brittany Ferries with a French shipbuilding yard.

Mr. Atkins: The European Commission is actively investigating offers of aid made to secure this order. As a result of our representations, the Commission has informed the French authorities that any aid for the Brittany Ferries order must comply with the new shipbuilding directive and that no aid may be given without the Commission's approval.

Northern Region

18. Mr. Fallon asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will estimate the amount of industrial support given to the northern region since 1983.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The amount of industrial support given to the northern region by way of regional grant and assistance from my Department since 1983 is £625 million. Industry in the region has also received support directly and indirectly from many other Government programmes.

46. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster which industrial sectors he estimates as the major growth areas in the northern region.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Over the ten-year period 1975 to 1985, the industrial sectors which have grown faster than any others in the northern region have been financial and business services, and distribution, hotels and catering. Their contributions to the region's total output during the period grew from 6·2 per cent. and 11·3 per cent. respectively in 1975 to 9·5 per cent. and 12·1 per cent. in 1985.

Japan

20. Mr. Fry asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has been able to obtain from Japanese Government sources the size of individual quotas granted to Japanese importers of British leather and leather goods; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: No, we have not. We regard the operation of the Japanese quota system for leather and leather goods as highly unsatisfactory, and the European Commission has recently agreed to take up the matter with the Japanese Government.

24. Mr. Cox asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on future trade policy with Japan.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government remain seriously concerned at Japan's low propensity to import. We will continue to press Japan bilaterally and through the Community to open her markets further and to implement overdue structural and macro economic changes.

40. Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on progress in ensuring United Kingdom goods and services have equal access into Japan as Japanese goods and services into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Alan Clark: We are continuing to press for better access to Japan for British goods and services. In the financial area, the recent bilateral consultations on access made good progress. But in all sectors, we still look to Japan for further measures to make her markets as open as those of the United Kingdom.

53. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on trade with Japan.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government remain concerned at Japan's low propensity to import. We will continue to press Japan bilaterally and through the Community to open her market further and to implement overdue structural and macro economic changes.

59. Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will take steps to discuss with the Japanese Government the level of tax levied on imports of Scotch whisky.

Mr. Alan Clark: As a result of United Kingdom pressure the European Community has, after unsatisfactory negotiations with the Japanese Government, taken Japan's discriminatory tax and duties on alcoholic drinks to the GATT. We expect the GATT panel's report towards the end of August.

Research and Development

22. Mr. Michael asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the current level of research and development funding by his Department.

28. Mr. Darling asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the current extent of research and development funding by his Department.

31. Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his latest estimate of the likely level of expenditure on research by his Department in the current financial year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: In this financial year my Department expects to spend £412 million on support for R and D. This represents an increase of 70 per cent. on the spend incurred in 1979-80.

54. Dr. Bray asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the Government will now agree to the European Community framework programme of research and development.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made in the House by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 1 July and the answer provided by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 1 July at column 108, as amended at columns 160-161 on 2 July. In order not to hinder work on agreed programmes, we have agreed that spending could continue at present levels over the five years of the framework programme.

Insurance Brokers Registration Council

25. Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has received any recent communication from the Insurance Brokers Registration Council.

Mr. Maude: Last month the Department received a copy of the council's 1986 audited accounts together with a copy of its draft report for that year.

Regional Aid

27. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his Department's total budget for regional aid to industry for the current financial year; and what was the corresponding sum for 1979-80 at current prices.

Mr. Atkins: In the Department's budget for 1987-88 £208 million gross is provided for regional aid to industry in England. Expenditure in 1979-80 for regional aid in England amounted to £517 million at 1987 prices.

Responsibility for regional aid to industry in Wales falls to the Welsh Office.

Mr. Forth asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give, for each region of the United Kingdom, for each of the last 10 years, the expenditure on regional aid and assistance.

Mr. Atkins: The information requested is as follows:

Expenditure at current prices

£ million

Region	1977-78	1978-79	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	[4]1986-87

Notes:

[1] All figures are gross and include payments to nationalised industries.

[2] The Great Britain total does not always equal the sum of the component parts due to the inclusion of items which cannot be broken down to the regional level and to rounding.

[3] The figures relate to expenditure in the TTWAs designated as assisted areas on 29 November 1984. Expenditure totalling £400,000 in the period 1977-78 to 1982-83 is included in the figures for east midlands in respect of Oswestry TTWA which ceased to be an assisted area on 1 August 1982.

[4] Figures for 1986-87 are provisional estimates.

The items included in the expenditure are regional development grants and regional selective assistance, expenditure on land and factories by the English Industrial Estates Corporation, the Scottish and Welsh Development Agencies, the Development Board for Rural Wales, and the Highlands and Islands Development Board. Northern Ireland has a different range of financial incentives available and the items included in the expenditure have been restricted to aids similar to the main forms of regional preferential assistance; these are selective financial assistance currently payable under part III of the Industries Development (Northern Ireland) Order 1982, general assistance (capital) grants payable under part IV of the order, and land and factories expenditure.

National Economic Development Council

29. Mr. McAllion asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he next intends to meet the National Economic Development Council to discuss research and development funding.

Mr. Butcher: I have at present no plans to do so.

Plymouth and Cornwall

30. Mr. Robert Hicks asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what proposals he intends making to stimulate job creation in the Plymouth and south-east Cornwall area designed to offset employment opportunity losses at Her Majesty's dockyard, Devonport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: In recognition of the problems existing in the area, the Government have proposed to the European Commission that the Plymouth travel-to-work area should retain the intermediate area status agreed by the Commission for the three-year period to November 1987.

Inner Cities

32. Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what new proposals he intends to institute in order to encourage private sector investment in the inner cities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Government are continuing to develop the measures outlined before the election, including my Department's inner cities initiative, for targeting assistance more effectively on the problems of the inner city. I shall ensure that my Department's programmes take proper account of the need to encourage private sector investment in the inner city.

Queen's Speech

33. Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has received about proposals in the Queen's Speech for which he has responsibility; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have received a large number of representations on the inner cities and these I am considering in relation to my Department's developing policy responsibilities. The Bill to reform the law of copyright and other intellectual property will be based on the proposals in the 1986 White Paper "Intellectual property and Innovation" (Cmnd. 9712). It will reflect our consideration of representations made on the White Paper and on the departmental committee report and the three Green Papers which preceded it.

HOTOL

34. Mr. Atkinson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement of progress on the development of HOTOL.

Mr. Butcher: The current proof-of-concept studies on HOTOL are expected to continue into 1988. It is too early to predict the conclusions of these studies, but both companies have recently been able to report promising progress on both the revoluntary engine concept and on the vehicle design.

Industrial Development

35. Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what steps are taken to ensure adequate regional balance in the pattern of industrial development; and if he will seek to amend the Industry Acts in order to provide greater incentives for balanced regional development of new manufacturng industry.

Mr. Atkins: I refer the hon. Member to the White Paper "Regional Industrial Development" (Cmnd. 9111) which sets out the Government's policy towards the regions, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Electronics and Information Technology

39. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made of the adequacy of Government funded research and development support in relation to targets for eliminating United Kingdom trade deficits in the electronics and information technology industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Our R and D support for the United Kingdom electronics and IT industries is directed to improving its technological capacities and international competitiveness, and not towards specific targets for trade performance.

Rover Group

41. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he plans to sell the Rover Group to the private sector.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The long-term aim of both the Rover Group board and the Government is to return the company to full private ownership, but we have no specific plans at present.

Regional Development Grant

42. Mr. McWilliam asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what sum was spent on regional development grant in 1986-87 in the north; and what sum he expects to spend in 1987-88.

Mr. Atkins: Provisional figures for payments of regional development grant in the northern region in 1986-87 are £102·1 million, of which £79·5 million was for outstanding payments under the old RDGI scheme and £22·6 million for payments under the new RDGII scheme.

Estimates for future expenditure are not broken down by region: the actual distribution will depend on the level of demand. The 1987-88 provision for RDGs in England, as set out in the Supply Estimates, is £108·5 million in gross terms, of which £43·2 million is for RDGI payments and £65·3 million for RDGII.

60. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what sum was spent on regional development grant in 1986-87 in Yorkshire and Humberside; and what sum he expects to spend in 1987-88.

Mr. Atkins: Provisional figures for payments of regional development grant in the Yorkshire and Humberside region in 1986-87 are £27·1 million, of which £18·2 million was for outstanding payments under the old RDGI scheme and £8·9 million for payments under the new RDGII scheme.

Estimates for future expenditure are not broken down by region: the actual distribution will depend on the level of demand. The 1987-88 provision for RDGs in England, as set out in the Supply Estimates, is £108·5 million in gross terms, of which £43·2 million is for RDGI payments and £65·3 million for RDGII.

62. Mr. John Evans asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what sum was spent on regional development grant in 1986-87 in the north-west; and what sum he expects to spend in 1987-88.

Mr. Atkins: Provisional figures for payments of regional development grant in the north-west region in 1986-87 are £101·3 million, of which £82·9 million was for outstanding payments under the old RDGI scheme and £18·4 million for payments under the new RDGII scheme.

Estimates for future expenditure are not broken down by region: the actual distribution will depend on the level of demand. The 1987-88 provision for RDGs in England, as set out in the Supply Estimates, is £108·5 million in gross terms, of which £43·2 million is for RDGI payments and £65·3 million for RDGII.

Merseyside

44. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what action he plans to take to prevent further factory closures in Merseyside.

Mr. Atkins: We shall continue the policy of providing the climate in which industry can prosper. This is the control of inflation and measures to achieve a more flexible and competitive economy.

British Shipbuilders Ltd.

45. Dr. Godman asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what recent discussions have taken place between his Department and British Shipbuilders Ltd. regarding orders for new vessels.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We continue to work closely with British Shipbuilders in its quest for new orders.

Balance of Payments

47. Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is his latest forecast for the outturn of the balance of payments for 1987.

Mr. Alan Clark: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his financial statement and Budget report forecast a deficit on current account of £2½ billion in 1987. In fact the figures for the first four months show a surplus on the current account of £0·8 billion. A new forecast will be contained in the autumn statement.

Business Overheads

Mr. Favell asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what information he has as to how business overheads in the north compare with those in the south.

Mr. Atkins: Information is not available to permit a comparison in the form requested.

Generating Set Equipment

49. Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he last held a meeting with representatives of the manufacturers of generating set equipment; and what action has been taken as a result.

Mr. Atkins: I have not met representatives of the manufacturers of generating set equipment but am aware of their concerns, about which I have written to my hon. Friend.

Inner-city Programme

50. Mr. George Howarth asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how much more will be spent in 1987-88 on his inner-city programme in the north-west.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: During 1986-87 only one inner city task force was operational in the north-west, in the Moss Side and Hulme area of Manchester, but I announced new task forces in Preston and Rochdale in April. Expenditure by the three north-west task forces in 1987-88 will depend upon the timing, scale and quality of the projects which come forward. These and other task forces will also build on the initiative's success in attracting private sector resources and in improving the effect of Government programmes on the skills motivation and job opportunities of inner-city residents.

High Technology

51. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to assist United Kingdom high technology companies to compete more effectively aganst overseas competitors.

Mr. Butcher: My Department provides support for both the application and the development of high technology and in 1987-88 plans to spend £412 million in support of industrial research and development and the promotion of innovation, collaboration, technology transfer and best practice.

Merchant Shipping (Intervention Fund)

55. Mr. Robert Hughes asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will now review the criteria for qualification for intervention fund support for merchant shipping orders.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Our policy towards yards privatised as naval yards is that intervention fund assistance for merchant orders will be considered only in exceptional circumstances based on the necessary maintenance of defence capacity. I am not persuaded that this policy should be modified in any way. The whole purpose of intervention fund assistance has been to ease the gradual reduction of excess capacity in merchant shipbuilding in this country. As the remaining merchant shipyards are still facing huge difficulties in finding new orders, I see no reason to subsidise an increase in capacity in the merchant sector.

Textile Industry

56. Mr. Madden asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to meet the Trade Union Congress textile committee to discuss the state of the textile industry.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have no plans to do so at present, but my hon. Friend the Minister for Trade has agreed to a request for a meeting with members of the TUC economic committee and textiles, clothing and footwear committee in connection with the GATT multilateral trade negotiations.

Privatisation

57. Mr. Nellist asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many officials in his Department are currently working on privatisation proposals.

Mr. Butcher: About 24; but most of these spend more time on other work.

Motor Vehicles and Components

58. Mr. Hoyle asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has to reduce the deficit on trade in motor vehicles and auto components.

Mr. Atkins: We intend to continue with our policies to improve the international competitiveness of the United Kingdom motor industry. In particular, we are encouraging the multinational manufacturers to continue to improve their sourcing of vehicles and components from within the United Kingdom.

Pit Bull Terriers

64. Miss Fookes asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will take steps to ban the import of pit bull terriers in the light of information already supplied to him by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Drake.

Mr. Alan Clark: No. Because of the difficulties in distinguishing between bull terriers specifically bred for fighting and other bull terriers it would not be possible to enforce an import embargo. Furthermore, such action would be contrary to our international trading obligations, unless the domestic sale and commercial breeding of like dogs was similarly controlled.

Space Policy

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the Government's response to proposals received from the British National Space Centre relating to future United Kingdom space policy.

Mr. Butcher: The Government are considering the proposals received from the British National Space Centre on future United Kingdom space policy and hope to come to a decision soon.

Trade Statistics

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the latest annual figures for each of 1970, 1975, 1980, 1985 and 1986 for the (a) deficit in manufactured trade between Britain and Japan, (b) deficit in manufactured trade between Britain and the European Economic Community, (c) deficit in manufactured trade between members of the European Community and Japan and (d) deficit in manufactured trade between West Germany and Britain, expressed in £ sterling.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is in the following table:

Balance of Trade in Manufactures[1]

£ billion

	United Kingdom Trade with			EC (12) Trade with
	Japan	EC (12)	Federal Republic of Germany	Japan
1970		0·6	−0·1	−0·3

Manchester Airport (Rail Link)

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what reply he is sending to the recent approach made to him by the chairman of the Greater Manchester passenger transport authority concerning both the rail link to Manchester airport and light rapid transport project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins [pursuant to the reply, 7 July 1987, c. 79]: These are both projects which are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. He will be taking the lead in replying. I understand that before reaching any decision on either of the projects he will, amongst other considerations, be taking account of any benefits they will produce towards inner city regeneration and regional development in consultation with my Department and others concerned.

SCOTLAND

Council Houses

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the number of local authority homes in each Scottish local authority area which were considered to be in need of repair in each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: The information requested is not held centrally. However, the 1986 housing plan checklists include figures for the numbers of local authority houses requiring major repairs, which, for this purpose, comprise works like extensive repairs to the structure or fabric of dwellings to overcome problems such as structural instability, water penetration, inadequate thermal or sound insulation or condensation. The figures are shown in the table.

NHS (Waiting Lists)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the total number of people on National Health Service waiting lists in each specialty and in each health board in Scotland for each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: I refer the hon. Member to section 6 of the 1979-85 editions of "Scottish Health Statistics", copies of which are available in the Library. Estimated data for Shetland health board for the years 1979 to 1983 (which were not included in the published tables) are shown in table I. Information relating to 1986 is shown in table II. The increases in 1982 and 1983 reflect the effect of industrial action. Lists tend to overstate the numbers of patients waiting for treatment since they include duplicated entries and patients who no longer need treatment.

Form ISD (5)I

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) the total average waiting time for National Health Service in-patient treatment in each specialty in Scotland in each year since 1979 and (b) the average waiting time for all specialties in Scotland in each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: The mean waiting times (in days) for all in-patient treatment up to 1985 (the latest year for which statistics are available) were as follows:

Specialty	Year of Discharge 1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985

Community Charge

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the estimated level of the personal community charge in each regional and district council area in Scotland that would be required in the current financial year if the Abolition of Domestic Rates (Scotland) Act were in force.

Mr. Rifkind: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received from churches about the implications of the community charge for their finances; and whether he has any plans to exempt churches from the community charge.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received 32 representations from church organisations and individual churches about the implications of the community charge for churches and their finances.

As an essential element of the Government's proposals to replace domestic rates by a community charge system, ministers of religion and their adult families, like other adults aged 18 and over, will be required to pay the personal community charge. The present reliefs available to churches in respect of non-domestic rates will continue.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) how many individuals have written to him to express reservations about, or opposition to, the implementation of the community charge in Scotland in 1989;

(2) if he will list in the Official Report the names of all organisations which have written to him to advise him of reservations about, or opposition to, the implementation of the community charge in Scotland in 1989.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend has received 966 representations from individuals and 240 from organisations on rating reform since the publication of the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714). Many representations include comments in favour of some of the proposals and against others. It is not therefore possible to provide the information in the form requested. The following organisations have commented on the proposals.

Prison Population

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the average daily population of Scottish prisons in each year since 1979.

Mr. Rifkind: The figures are as follows:

Average Daily Population in Penal Establishments: Scotland

Year	Number
1979	4,585
1980	4,860
1981	4,518
1982	4,891
1983	5,052
1984	4,753
1985	5,273
1986	5,588

Rates

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail the percentage contributed to total non-domestic rates for Scotland from (a) commercial properties, (b) industrial properties and (c) other premises.

Mr. Lang: The figures show the percentage contributed to total non-domestic rates for Scotland for 1987-88 from commercial properties, industrial properties (including freight transport) and other premises.

	Per cent.
Commercial	46
Industrial and Freight Transport	19
Other	35

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average non-domestic rate poundage in Scotland for 1987-88; and if he will list those local authorities with (a) the highest and (b) the lowest rate poundages in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The average non-domestic rate poundage in Scotland in 1987-88 in 76p. The authority with the highest rate poundage is Glasgow city (91·5p) and that with the lowest is Kincardine and Deeside (51·2p).

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated receipts from non-domestic rates in Scotland for 1987-88.

Mr. Lang: £1,260 million.

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the estimated 1987-88 total annual receipts for rates net of rebates in Scotland; and what percentage this represents of forecast local government expenditure for 1987-88.

Mr. Lang: The estimated 1987-88 total receipts for rates net of rebates in Scotland are £1,835·6 million. This represents 44 per cent. of forecast local government expenditure for 1987-88.

Salmon and Sea Trout (Poaching)

Mrs. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what success he has had in eliminating the organised poaching of salmon and sea trout; what further measures he intends to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A great deal of effort is devoted to the enforcement of salmon and sea fisheries legislation by the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland, district salmon fishery boards, water bailiffs and the police. Fishery protection vessels, fixed wing aircraft, helicopters and shore-based staff equipped with two-way radio telephones are deployed, with considerable success, to curb the activities of those who fish illegally. In the period from 1 January 1985 to 31 December 1985, the latest year for which figures are available at present, there were 59 and 400 prosecutions respectively for salmon poaching in the sea and in fresh water.

Fishing for salmon by drift nets set from a boat is prohibited in Scottish waters and on 31 March 1986 orders came into effect under sections 1 and 2 of the Inshore Fishing (Scotland) Act 1984 prohibiting fishing for salmon or sea trout with a gill net in a specified sea area off the coast of Scotland and prohibiting the carriage of monofilament gill nets in British fishing boats in Scottish inshore waters.

The Salmon Act 1986 introduced the new offence of being in possession of salmon in circumstances where the possessor believes, or it would have been reasonable for him to suspect, that the salmon had been illegally taken. The Act also provides for the licensing of salmon dealers in Scotland, as well as in England and Wales. These provisions represent important new anti-poaching measures.

Prisons

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what amount was spent in each Scottish prison on training, educational and cultural activity for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information relating to each establishment is not readily available and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The totals for the Scottish Prison Service as a whole for the years in question are as follows.

The heading "Education and Cultural Activity" includes the salaries of teachers employed by local authorities and working in prisons and the purchases of educational materials and items for sport and recreation; training includes materials and equipment for vocational training courses but not the salaries of departmental instructors, the comparison of whose costs is not readily available.

	Education and cultural activity[1]	Training
1982-83	526,000	323,000
1983-84	498,000	340,000
1984-85	684,000	357,000
1985-86	607,000	352,000
1986-87	717,000	413,000

[1] Reductions in expenditure in some years reflect variations in the invoicing for teachers salaries by local authorities and not reductions in the level of service.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the numbers employed in the medical services in Scottish prisons for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is as follows at 1 April in each year:

Year	Medical Officers		Prison Officer Nursing Staff	Nursing Sisters
	Full-time	Part-Time
1982	2	20	90	2
1983	3	20	89	1
1984	3	21	88	1
1985	3	21	91	1
1986	3	22	89	1

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the numbers employed in administration in the Scottish prison system for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The annual report of the Scottish Prison Service, "Prisons in Scotland", gives details of staff numbers at penal establishments in the categories of governor grades, chaplains and visiting chaplains, medical officers, office and store staff; prison officers and others. Staff at the more senior grade have roles which are both administrative and operational. The latest published report covers the year to 31 December 1985. At 31 December 1986 the equivalent numbers were:

	Number
Governor Grades	90
Chaplains	57
Medical Officers	26
Office and Store	205
Officers	2,640
Others	231

Policy and general oversight of penal establishments is exercised by SHHD prisons group. The number of staff in post in the years 1982 to 1986 at 31 December was:

	Number
1982	137
1983	126·5
1984	130·5
1985	141·5
1986	139

Prison Officers

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what were the numbers employed as prison officers in Scotland for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The number employed as prison officers in Scotland at 31 December in each of the years since 1982 were as follows:

	Number
1982	2,352
1983	2,366
1984	2,466
1985	2,574
1986	2,750

"Prison Officers" include those employed on discipline, nursing, catering, works, clerical and instructing duties.

Crossroads Schemes

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the level and nature of support that is available from his Department for Crossroads schemes; and what is his policy towards voluntary efforts in this field.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Funding of local Crossroads schemes by my Department is limited to two projects forming part of a wider programme embodying different examples of community care. A total of £38,630 is being paid in grant to these schemes in the present financial year, the last of the three years for which grant has been provided. An additional £21,425 is being paid this year to Crossroads (Scotland), which provides direction and support for local Crossroads projects.

We warmly endorse the objectives underlying Crossroads schemes and the contribution they make to the provision of care in the community. Such schemes do not however fall within the established priorities for the main programme of centrally funded grants in the social work field. Some 40 Crossroads schemes are currently receiving support either from the Manpower Services Commission, from local authorities or from health boards under support finance arrangements.

Unemployment

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the latest level of unemployment in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: Since January seasonally adjusted unemployment in Scotland has fallen by over 12,000, and in May 1987 stood at 337,100, some 2,000 lower than the previous May. Had it not been for the adverse effects of the oil price fall on oil-related activity in Scotland, the fall over the past year would have been greater.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to reduce unemployment in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: There has been a fall of over 12,000 in seasonally adjusted unemployment in Scotland so far this year. The Government will continue to pursue the policies of sound financial management designed to reduce inflation, and to promote investment, enterprise and increased employment. Scotland will receive her full share of places on the various national employment, enterprise and training schemes. Economic development and job creation in Scotland will also benefit from the operation of regional incentives and the activities of the Scottish Development Agency and the Highlands and Islands Development Board.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons under 21 years of age were unemployed in Scotland at the most recent date.

Mr. Lang: The information is not available in the precise form requested. On 9 April 1987 (the latest date for which information is available) there were 57,540 unemployed claimants in Scotland aged 19 and under and 74,132 aged 20 to 24.

This information is available in the Library.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of long-term unemployed in Scotland at the latest date.

Mr. Lang: On 9 April 1987 (the latest date for which information is available) there were 146,701 claimants in Scotland who had been unemployed for more than one year.

This information is available in the Library.

A1 (Musselborough Bypass)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make it his policy to erect a barrier in the central reservation of the dual carriageway on the Musselborough bypass section of the A1 trunk road.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Our policy is to provide safety barriers in the central reservations of all dual carriageway trunk roads and motorways in Scotland as funds permit. Priority is being given to provision on motorways.

Nurses

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much was spent on nurse training in the last four years; how much he estimates will be spent in the year 1987-88; and what are the corresponding figures at constant prices.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:

Year	Actual Expenditure £ million	Constant Price[3] £ million
1983-84	47·1	53·8
1984-85	50·6	55·4
1985-86	50·7	52·2
1986-87	[1]54·1	54·1
1987-88	[2]57·6	55·1

[1] Provisional.
[2] Estimated.
[3] Expenditure is expressed in constant 1986-87 prices using the GDP deflator.

The figures include the salaries, national insurance and superannuation costs for learners paid by health boards, the salaries and so on of nurse teachers and support staff at colleges of nursing and midwifery and the administrative and salary costs of staff of the National Board for Nursing, Midwifery and Health Visiting for Scotland. The salary costs do not take into account the service contribution made by students during training, which varies according to the course and particular college of nursing.

A74 (Maintenance)

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many stretches of the A74 were under repair on 1 July; and if he will state the length in each case.

Mr. Rifkind: The following sections of the A74 were under repair on 1 July:

	Kilometres
Strathclyde
Northbound carriageway, Paddy's Rickle Bridge	3
Northbound carriageway, Glengonnar	1
Dumfries and Galloway
Southbound carriageway, Beattock Village	3
Southbound carriageway, south of Lockerbie	3

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he will take to reduce the inconvenience through road repairs to motorists on the A74; and if he will return the road to normality by the Glasgow Fair.

Mr. Rifkind: My Department aims to minimise disruption to traffic on the A74 by timing repair work to avoid the Glasgow Fair, and it is hoped that the four major repair schemes currently under way will be completed by 20 July. There will, however, be some unavoidable traffic delays in the Millbank area arising from the M74 extension.

ENERGY

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Parkinson: Civil servants are employed in my Department as follows:

Region	Number of staff employed	Budgeted running costs for the current year £000
London and the South-East	836	17,650
The South-West	6	100
The Midlands	42	670
The North of England	27	330

EMPLOYMENT

Health and Safety Executive

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Employment what additional amount of money has been allocated to the Health and Safety Executive in order to enable it to carry out additional duties imposed by the Food and Environment Protection Act.

Mr. Cope: For 1987-88 Parliament has voted grant-in-aid for the Health and Safety Executive of £1 million more than was shown as planned provision in the public expenditure White Paper, Cm. 56 and this provision was intended to include the costs of the additional duties imposed by the FEPA. Planned provision for future years is currently under consideration.

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects the extra 12 agricultural inspectors required for the Health and Safety Executive to carry out responsibilities under the Food and Environment Protection Act to be appointed.

Mr. Cope: The Health and Safety Executive intends to meet its responsibilities for enforcing the Food and Environment Protection Act from within existing staff resources through a re-arrangement of priorities. It is hoped that further recruitment to the agricultural inspectorate will take place later in the year.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish in the Official Report the latest unemployment figures for Erith and Crayford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Lee: The following information is in the Library. On 14 May 1987 the number of unemployed claimants in the Erith and Crayford parliamentary constituency was 3,650.

Parental Leave

Ms. Quin asked the Secretary of State for Employment what estimates he has of the cost to employers of implementing the European Economic Community proposed directive on parental leave.

Mr. Nicholls: There are no precise estimates available, but clearly the directive would be bound to add significantly to employers' costs.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether he will consider widening the definition of parental leave to include family leave when implementing the European Community draft directive on parental leave; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects the United Kingdom to comply with the provision of the European Community draft directive on parental leave; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government are opposed in principle to this directive, but as it is still at the draft stage no question of implementation or compliance arises.

Maternity Leave

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will extend the rights to maternity leave to women working for firms with fewer than 10 employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no specific statutory right to maternity leave. However, an employee can earn an entitlement to statutory maternity payments for a period of up to 18 weeks for her maternity absence and, separately, a right to return to her former job.

There is no exemption for small firms in the statutory maternity pay provisions. Firms with fewer than six employees are exempt from the obligations to reinstate, but only if it is not reasonably practicable for them to take the employee back. There are no plans to remove this exemption.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether his Department has assessed the effects of the implementation of the White Paper, "Building Businesses—Not Barriers," on the rights to maternity leave of women employed at establishments with 10 or fewer employees; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: There is no specific statutory right to maternity leave. However, an employee can earn an entitlement to statutory maternity payments for a period of up to 18 weeks, of her maternity absence and, separately, a right to return to her former job.

The proposals in the White Paper would affect the right of women working in firms with fewer than 10 employees to return to work, but not their entitlement to statutory maternity pay.

It is difficult to estimate how many expectant mothers would subsequently fail to qualify for the right to return to work if these proposals were implemented. However, it is likely to be few as only a small proportion of those who leave work to have a baby seek to return to their former job.

The proposals in the White Paper are still under consideration.

Wages (Arrears)

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases the wages inspectorate took to court in 1985, 1986 and to date in 1987 in respect of arrears of wages; what was the age and sex of the low-paid employees in each case; and how many cases are in hand.

Mr. Nicholls: No civil proceedings were taken by the inspectorate for the recovery of arrears of wages in 1985. In 1986 two cases were taken, the first in respect of two female workers and the second for one female worker. So far in 1987, one case involving a female worker has been taken and three other cases are in hand.

Records are not kept of the ages of workers for whom proceedings action is taken.

Employment Rights

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) whether his Department has any plans to seek to change the number of hours which must be worked by employees in order to qualify for current statutory employment rights; and if he will make a statement;

(2) whether his Department has any plans to require applicants to industrial tribunals to pay a fee; and if he will make a statement;

(3) whether his Department has any plans to seek to change the qualifying period of employment for the legal right of a statement of the reasons for dismissal; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether his Department has any plans to change the regulations regarding rights of employees to time off for trades union duties; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: Proposals or suggestions on these matters were set out in the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" (Cmnd. 9794). They are still under consideration.

"Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers"

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether his Department has assessed the effect of the implementation of the proposals of the White Paper, "Building Businesses — Not Barriers," on those employees at present working less than 20 hours per week; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The proposals are still under consideration. The position of existing employees will be taken into account when detailed proposals are drawn up.

Job Splitting

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether his Department has considered what effect the implementation of the proposals of the White Paper, "Building Businesses Not Barriers", will have on the practice of job splitting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nicholls: The Government continue to be committed to removing those unnecessary regulations which serve only to hinder and stifle the enterprise that creates jobs. We believe that firms that are able to concentrate their energies on running their businesses efficiently and competitively, with fewer administrative burdens, will be much better placed to provide more employment opportunities, whether full or part time.

Specific proposals of the White Paper are still under consideration.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline the measures introduced by his Department to encourage job splitting; and what further measures he is considering implementing to encourage this practice.

Mr. Lee: The job-splitting scheme was introduced in January 1983 to help employers create more part-time job opportunities for people who would otherwise be unemployed. The scheme was improved and relaunched with the effect from 1 April this year. The main changes were:

—to increase the grant available to employers from £840 to £1,000, payable in three instalments of £500, £200, and £300;

—part-time employee places to be open to anyone claiming benefits at an unemployment benefit office;

—to change the name of the scheme to jobshare, a title which more accurately reflects the principle behind the provision and the name most commonly used by the public when describing the job splitting scheme.

As with all our programmes, jobshare will be kept under review during the coming year.

TRANSPORT

Light Dues

Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the rates of light dues in each financial year since 1974, the percentage increase in each year and the reasons for the increases in the present financial year.

Mr. David Mitchell: The following are the light dues charges per voyage for each 10 tons net registered tonnage in the years concerned, respectively for home trade and foreign-going vessels:

	Home Trade	Per cent. change (rounded)	Foreign-going	Per cent. change (rounded)
1974	57p	+ 10	104p	+ 10
1975 April	64p	[1] + 12	128p	+ 23
1975 December	90p	+ 40	180p	+ 40
1977	104p	[2] + 15	208p	[2] + 15
1980	128p	+ 23	256p	+ 23

	Home Trade	Per cent change (rounded)	Foreign-going	Per cent change (rounded)
1981	160p	+ 25	320p	+ 25
1983	144p	− 10	288p	− 10
1986	152p	+ 5	304p	+ 5
1987	173p	+ 14	346p	+ 14

[1] The maximum annual number of voyages on which light dues were payable by home trade ships was also raised from 10 to 12.
[2] The maximum annual number of voyages on which light dues were payable were also raised from 12 to 14 voyages for home trade ships, and from six to seven voyages for foreign-going ships.

The increase in 1987 was needed to bring revenue into line with current operating costs and particularly to meet a new requirement to make provision for the costs of operating the United Kingdom transmitters of the Racal-Decca navigator system. This followed a long period in which light dues had been held well below the rate of inflation by drawing on the cash reserves in the general lighthouse fund.

North-West Region (Road Accidents)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Transport to what factors his department attributes the north-west region's high child road accident victim rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We do not know why the overall numbers of child casualties per 100,000 population has been higher in the north-west in recent years than in other regions outside London.

We shall continue in consultation with local authorities to develop initiatives which will help to protect vulnerable road users including children, throughout the country.

Davenham Bypass

Mr. Goodlad asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to commence on the Davenham bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The A533 Davenham bypass is a non-trunk road proposal for which Cheshire county council is responsible. The Department's involvement would be limited to considering confirmation of any statutory orders and any bid by the council for transport supplementary grant support.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will issue separate statistics for traffic or road accidents in which horses are affected; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. Horses involved in personal injury accidents will continue to be recorded with animals other than dogs. Such accidents account for only ½ per cent. of all personal injury accidents.

A41 (Banbury)

Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects work to begin on the Warwick road, Ruscote avenue, Orchard way roundabout on the A41 at Banbury.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to complete the outstanding statutory procedures for the A41 Ruscote avenue Orchard way improvement this autumn. This should enable work to start by about the end of the year.

Trunk Road Schemes

Mr. Roy Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in the light of amended criteria for cost benefit analysis, his Department has looked again at trunk road schemes which had failed to achieve a net present value.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There were 14 COBA negative schemes in the trunk road programme. So far only one scheme has been reassessed following the new value of leisure time and casualty costs. This scheme (Louth) has been reassessed as positive. The others will all be reassessed in due course at the point where decisions concerning their development have to be made.

Schemes for which decisions have already been announced will not be reassessed.

Roads

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of the total road length in each of the English regions is (a) trunk road, (b) dual carriageway and (c) urban motorway standard.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is as follows:

Percentages of Road Length for each English Region: 1 April 1986

	All-purpose trunk roads	Motorways	Dual carriageways (excluding motorways)
Eastern	3·3	0·8	1·8
East Midlands	4·4	0·7	1·3
Greater London	2·3	0·5	1·7
Northern	2·8	0·4	2·4
North Western	2·6	1·8	1·8
South Eastern	2·6	1·4	2·0
South Western	2·3	0·7	1·2
West Midlands	3·4	1·1	1·8
Yorkshire and Humberside	2·8	1·1	1·6
England	2·9	1·0	1·7

Urban motorways are not identified separately, but principal road motorways, which tend to be in urban areas, constitute only 0·04 of 1 per cent. of total road length.

Bradford

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the grants made for the installation of railway sidings under section 8 of the Transport Act 1974 in the Bradford area since 1979; how many of these are still in use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: No applications have been received, hence no grants awarded towards the cost of work on this type of facility in the Bradford area since 1979.

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a grant aid available for the construction of a standard railway link between the Bradford interchange and Bradford Forster Square station site; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand that the West Yorkshire passenger transport authority is currently examining the feasibility of such a link, but I have received no application from the authority for grant for the project.

Airedale Route

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the reply to the hon. Member for Bradford, South of 30 June, Official Report, column 53, on what estimate of rail costs he based his judgment that road-borne materials would be cheaper than rail for the construction of the Airedale route.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Officials had discussions with British Rail about the delivery of fly ash to the site of the Kildwick to Beechcliffe section of the Airedale route. Even with an existing railhead available at source, the overall cost markedly exceeded that of supply by road.

Officials also had discussions with British Rail about the delivery of bulk materials to the site of the Victoria Park to Crossflatts section of the route. There was high additional cost. Qualifications attached to the use of the railway would have had further—and incalculable—cost implications.

It was decided that the circumstances did not justify incorporating conditions in either contract about the use of railway for delivey materials.

East Coast Mainline

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with British Rail on whether the east coast route to Glasgow from King's Cross should go via Edinburgh-Linlithgow-Polmont-Falkirk or Edinburgh-Fauldhouse-South.

Mr. David Mitchell: None.

M25 (Iver)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to make an announcement about the M25 service area at Iver.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I hope to make an announcement shortly.

Road Safety

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport, following the implementation of low cost high return engineering schemes which do not qualify for transport supplementary grant on local authority roads, what proportion of each accident cost saved is of more than local significance in terms of expenditure; and what proportion is of only local significance.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We do not have this information. Such schemes are the responsibility of the appropriate local highway authority.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish an annual report to Parliament giving details of all road accident remedial works implemented primarily for road safety reasons on roads for which he has responsibility.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department publishes regular reports about the motorway and trunk road programme. The most recent is the White Paper, "Policy for Roads in England 1987" (Cmnd. 125). Safety is a major objective of the whole road programme ranging from bypasses of busy urban areas to minor local improvements. I shall be happy to consider what further detailed information on road safety might usefully be included in future reports.

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport if a national definition of a hazardous location is available to agent authorities in planning accident investigation and prevention work.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Any location where vehicles and people conflict is potentially hazardous. The Department's accident investigation and prevention manual, its series of advice notes and leaflets and its programme of seminars in every region all seek to assist every local authority to be as alert and skilled as possible in planning accident investigation and prevention work.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will introduce an amendment to the Disabled Persons (Badges for Motor Vehicles) Regulations 1982 to make it possible for people whose difficulty in walking is not regarded as being permanent to qualify for exemption from restrictions relating to the use of motor vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This is one of many possible changes to the scheme that have been aired during our recent consultation. We hope to make an announcement shortly.

Newbury Bypass

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects the public inquiry into the route for the Newbury bypass to start.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to start the inquiry in the first half of next year. Consideration of the representations and objections is taking longer than expected.

Vehicle Test Certificates

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Transport what action he is taking to ensure that the issue of Ministry of Transport test certificates is not being abused by unscrupulous secondhand car dealers.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The vehicle inspectorate of the Department of Transport closely monitors the issue of MOT certificates and withdraws garages' authorisation where there is malpractice. Following a recent joint exercise with trading standards department they have identified a number of cases where disciplinary action is being considered against the garages concerned. Buyers of secondhand vehicles must themselves be careful. If they have any doubts about the condition of a vehicle they should have it examined by an independent expert before agreeing to buy it.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Lord Rothschild

Mr. Dalyell asked the Attorney-General when he expects to make a decision on the possible prosecution of Lord Rothschild in relation to the Wright case.

The Attorney-General: Allegations made against Lord Rothschild and also against Mr. Chapman Pincher have been investigated by the police. The Director of Public Prosecutions has now decided that the investigation has not disclosed evidence justifying the bringing of proceedings against either Lord Rothschild or Mr. Chapman Pincher. The director has consulted me and I have agreed with his decision.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General if he will make it his policy to arrange for the substantive answers to questions from hon. Members relating to policy and statistics on the Crown Prosecution Service to be published in the Official Report and not by way of letter to the hon. Member concerned.

The Attorney-General: That is and will continue to be my normal practice.

PRIME MINISTER

Dufftown

Q21. Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Prime Minister if she will pay an official visit to Dufftown.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Strathclyde

Q37. Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to visit Strathclyde region.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Cabinet Committees

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she will now publish the names and numbers of Cabinet commitees and sub-committees.

The Prime Minister: There continue to be four standing committees of the Cabinet: a defence and overseas policy committee and an economic strategy committee under my chairmanship; a home and social affairs committee under the chairmanship of my right hon. and noble Friend the Lord President of the Council; and a legislation committee under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Lord Privy Seal. Attendance at these committees will vary according to the subject under discussion. Sub-committees of the standing committees will be continued or established as appropriate. Membership and terms of reference of the standing committees and their sub-committees will remain confidential.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister whether she will make it her policy to publish the names and numbers of special ad hoc committees and sub-committees of the Cabinet as they are established.

The Prime Minister: No.

Venice Conference

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister if she will give the total cost of her recent visit to the Venice conference and the number of hours she spent there.

The Prime Minister: The estimated cost of my visit to the world economic summit conference in Venice with the official party from my office is £5,500. I spent 17½ hours in Venice.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Prime Minister what proposals she made at Venice for concerted action to bring down unemployment; and what action was agreed upon to monitor and combat unemployment.

The Prime Minister: The Venice summit conference confirmed the need for sound finance to support non-inflationary growth. Those are the policies which in the United Kingdom have helped create the conditions for six years of growth averaging nearly 3 per cent. a year, more than a million new jobs since 1983 and, for the past 11 months, falling unemployment. I was also encouraged that the Venice summit agreed on the need for surplus and deficit countries to take action to correct their imbalances.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop asked the Prime Minister whether she will repeat her instruction that, to preserve the confidentiality of hon. Members' correspondence with Ministers, acknowledgement cards will not be sent out naked, but enclosed in an envelope.

The Prime Minister: I am aware of the hon. Member's concern. I am looking into the matter and will reply as soon as possible.

Engagements

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 July.

Mr. Stern asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 July.

Mr. Parry asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 July.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 9 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with a delegation from the Arab League.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent contacts

he has had with the Secretary-General of the United Nations over the Cyprus issue; what progress is being made to bring about a lasting solution to that island's problems; what part Her Majesty's Government are prepared to play in bringing about a just settlement; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: My right hon. and learned Friend last discussed Cyprus with the United Nations' Secretary-General in September last year. We also have frequent contacts with the United Nations at official level to discuss Cyprus. The Secretary-General's latest proposals have not yet been accepted by both sides, but he is persisting with his efforts to bring the two sides together. We believe that the Secretary-General is best placed to find a solution to the Cyprus problem, and we shall continue to give active support to his mission of good offices.

Diplomatic Relations

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in the Official Report the countries which do not have diplomatic relations with the United Kingdom.

Mr. Eggar: We do not have diplomatic relations with the following countries:

Albania
Argentina
Cambodia
Libya
Syria.

We do not have diplomatic relations with the Kingdom of Bhutan but maintain friendly contacts and conduct official business with its embassy in New Delhi.

We have only consular relations with the following countries:

Andorra
San Marino
Monaco
Liechtenstein.

Blood Supplies (Overseas Citizens)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements have been made to make supplies of non-contaminated blood supplies for British citizens travelling abroad; and if these arrangements are being co-ordinated by British embassies abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: In January this year we asked our posts overseas to consider, in the light of local circumstances, establishing a list of voluntary blood donors for use of local British residents and visitors in an emergency. A number of posts now have such a list and others may be drawn up if the situation requires it. This facility is entirely at the risk of those who use it.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he intends to take to publicise the availability of non-contaminated blood supplies for British citizens travelling abroad; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The travel inquiry unit in the consular department of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office can provide telephone callers with information, provided by posts abroad, about local arrangements for screening blood for HIV. Posts will also on request provide British visitors with names of local doctors, dentists and hospitals, and information about the availability of non-contaminated blood.

Members' Correspondence

Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why a letter was not sent by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch until 2 July concerning the application of Mrs. Chacadben Patel for entry clearance to attend a wedding in Hackney on 27 June.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Member will recall that he first wrote to me about Mrs. Patel's application for entry clearance on 5 May 1987, received in my office on 12 May. It was necessary to consult the post concerned and a substantive reply to that letter was sent in my absence, by my office on 10 June, in view of the wedding date. The hon. Member wrote again on 18 June. I replied on 2 July reiterating the position set out in the earlier reply of 10 June.

EC Directives

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the number of European Economic Community directives which have been applied in the United Kingdom in each year from 1979 to 1986 and 1987 to the most recent practicable date.

Mrs. Chalker: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Dogs

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions there were, during the most recent period for which figures are available, in the United Kingdom, of dog owners who allowed their dogs to foul the pavement or other prohibited areas.

Mr. John Patten: Prosecutions for dog fouling offences cannot be separately distinguished in the information collected centrally. The readily available data, which may be affected by variations in the completeness of reporting, relate to all offences covering dogs under local Acts and byelaws and show 69 persons proceeded against in England and Wales for such offences in 1985, and 176 in Scotland. Comparable information is not available for Northern Ireland.

Immigration (Carriers Liability) Act 1987

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department which airlines or shipping companies have been fined under the Immigration Carriers (Liability) Act; and what are the sums of money and numbers of passengers involved.

Mr. Renton: Since 5 March a substantial number of airlines and shipping companies have incurred liability under the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act. A comprehensive list is not readily available, their cases are still being processed. The total number of passengers involved, at 26 June 1987, was about 1,500; this number will be reduced if carriers are able to show that the charge should not be imposed in particular cases. In each case the sum is £1000 per passenger.

Women Prisoners

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male warders now supervise women in prisons (a) nationally and (b) in Holloway; and what safeguards against sexual harrassment exist in view of the vulnerability of the women prisoners.

Mr. John Patten: The table shows the number of male prison officers, up to the rank of principal officer, currently serving in Holloway and other female establishments. These officers are deployed within establishments in such a way that their presence does not compromise privacy and propriety.

Male Prison Officer grades serving in female establishments

	Holloway	Other female establishments
Discipline:
Principle Officers	—	—
Senior Officers	7	—
Officers	—	—
Specialists[1]:
Principal Officers	2	5
Senior Officers	2	4
Officers	9	10

[1] Includes: Works, Catering and Physical Education Officer.

Prisoners (Discipline)

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number and proportion of prisoners appearing on disciplinary charges before boards of visitors in each year since the Tarrant judgment who applied for and were granted legal representation.

Mr. John Patten: This information cannot be provided in the form requested. Since the Tarrant judgment in November 1983 legal representation is known to have been granted to over 300 prisoners appearing on disciplinary charges before boards of visitors.

Postal Voting

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the light of the experience of the recent general election and the many complaints of hon. Members, he will review the whole operation of postal voting, with a view to introducing legislative improvements.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I said in reply to the Adjournment debate on 3 July at columns 809-16, that we were reviewing the absent voting provisions in consultation with electoral registration officers and the political parties, with a view to amending the Representation of the People Regulations.

Television Licences

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total number of 5p concessionary television licences issued in the last year for which figures are available; and what proportion of those licences are held by pensioners.

Mr. Renton: At the end of May 1987, 690,629 people benefited from concessionary licences, which are known as accommodation for residential care licences. Separate records are not kept showing how many are retirement pensioners or physically disabled or mentally disordered people, but the great majority are believed to be retirement pensioners.

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many black and white and colour television licences have been issued each year in Northern Ireland during the past five years; and how many successful prosecutions there have been in each year against licence fee evaders.

Mr. Renton: The available information relates to the number of general form television licences in force at the end of March in each of the years mentioned, and to the number of convictions in each year to that date:

Year	Monochrome	Colour	Total	Convictions
March 1983	90,174	183,758	273,932	341
March 1984	83,818	192,553	276,371	574
March 1985	79,357	199,055	278,412	645
March 1986	75,724	194,941	270,665	736
March 1987	74,061	196,539	270,600	818

Mr. McCusker asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many successful prosecutions against television licence evaders in Northern Ireland during the past five years have been taken as a result of information obtained from (a) detector vans and (b) search warrants;

(2) how many search warrants have been sought during the past 12 months in Northern Ireland to detect television licence evasion.

Mr. Renton: Detector van equipment has not been used in Northern Ireland. One conviction for licence evasion has been obtained in the last five years as a result of a search warrant; this was one of four sought in the last 12 months.

South African Embassy (Policing)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis regarding the conduct of the policing of the round-the-clock picket of the South African embassy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The policing of the demonstration outside the South African embassy is an operational matter which is the responsibility of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current number of officers in the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The strength of the Metropolitan police on 30 June was 27,105.

Police (Entry and Search)

Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester as to the reasons why the police have refrained from arresting Mr. Virji Mendis in the church buildings which he is currently occupying; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he intends to issue any guidance to chief constables concerning their practice towards the arrest of suspects or persons who have committed offences and who remain upon church property in an attempt to avoid arrest; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he has any plans to introduce legislation to recreate a right of sanctuary from arrest in Church buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Police may enter and search any premises for the purposes of making an arrest, including those used for religious purposes, in accordance with the provisions of section 17 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984. The decision whether or not to use this power in the circumstances of a particular case is an operational matter for the judgment of the appropriate chief officer of police who will take account of all the factors which he considers to be relevant. We have no plans to call for a report from the chief constable of Greater Manchester or to introduce legislation to create a right of sanctuary or to issue guidance to chief officers.

South African Embassy

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what authority individuals have been prevented from peaceful demonstrations immediately outside the South African embassy; and why this was done.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that the Commissioner directed that the demonstration be moved from outside the South African embassy to Duncannon street following an incident on 6 May when the embassy building was attacked and damaged. This direction was made under the Metropolitan Police Act 1839.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the total cost of police services outside the South African embassy in each of the past three years; and what has been the cost since 6 May.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that the additional cost to the Metropolitan Police of policing demonstrations outside South Africa House between 6 May and 5 July was about £10,000. Information for the past three years is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions his Department has had with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis concerning policing arrangements outside the South African embassy.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Officials have discussions as necessary with the Metropolitan Police about the arrangements for the policing and protection of diplomatic missions, including the South African embassy.

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests have been made outside the South African embassy since 6 May; and what charges have been brought.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that since 6 May a total of 172 arrests have been made. Those arrested have been charged with a variety of public order and other offences, including criminal damage, assault on police occasioning actual bodily harm, breach of bail conditions and obstruction.

Embassies and High Commissions

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers on average are involved in policing duties outside embassies and high commissions in London.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: There are a small number of officers permanently deployed on duties concerned with the security of diplomatic missions. Others are deployed as necessary. Their number will depend on various factors, including the size and nature of any demonstrations.

Crime Prevention Schemes

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is satisfied with the progress made with crime prevention schemes in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are satisfied that good progress is being made in building up a wide range of crime prevention schemes and initiatives throughout England and Wales. The variety of bodies and organisations now actively engaged in crime prevention schemes both nationally and locally has never been broader. From members of the public who have now joined together in over 35,000 neighbourhood watch schemes through to an increasing number of authorities, organisations, companies and groups across all sectors there has come a welcome recognition that much crime is preventable and that the responsibility for preventing it does not only rest with the police. Local crime prevention initiatives which have taken a variety of forms have already proved their worth and we look forward to a further expansion in their numbers and their influence.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the crime prevention schemes set up in Wales.

Mr. John Patten: There are 588 places on 27 community programme crime prevention initiative projects in various parts of Wales. There are 18 local Crime Prevention Panels, 1,666 neighbourhood watch schemes spread over the four police areas. In addition, one of the local crime prevention projects which make up the "Five Towns" initiative is based on the Penlan Estate in Swansea: I understand that the project will shortly extend its activity to other areas of Swansea. I am aware that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has also introduced a number of other initiatives.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the level of funding from his Department for each crime prevention scheme; and whether such schemes are directly funded from his Department or are funded through agencies.

Mr. John Patten: Local crime prevention schemes may receive funding or support in kind from a variety of sources, but, as a general rule, they do not receive Home Office funding either directly or indirectly. However, from the beginning of January 1986 the Home Office has met in full the salaries and related expenses of the co-ordinators of the five local crime prevention projects in Croydon, Bolton, north Tyneside, Swansea and Wellingborough which together made up our five towns crime prevention initiative. The Home Office has also provided some financial support for local publicity for these projects. We estimate that when the five towns initiative ends in October this year, Home Office funding for these projects will have amounted to about £170,000.

TV Licence Fee

Mr. Budgen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Deartment what conclusions he has reached on the proposal, contained in the report of the committee chaired by professor Peacock on the financing of the BBC, that the television licence fee should be replaced by a system of subscription; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: In announcing my response to Professor Peacock's report, I said that I would be engaging independent consultants to examine the technical and economic feasibility of this proposal. Communications Studies and Planning International Limited, who are now merged with Booz Allen and Hamilton International (UK) Limited, were appointed to undertake this study, which they completed in May. I have today published their report and a copy has been placed in the Library. The findings of the report are those of the consultants, and do not necessarily reflect the direction of present Government policy. We would welcome comments on the analysis and conclusions contained in the study, and we have invited comments to be sent to the Home Office by 30 September 1987. Any decisions will be taken in the light of these comments.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Labour Statistics

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of unemployed under 21 years of age in the Province at the latest date.

Mr. Viggers: The number is 22,106 as at 14 May 1987.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of long-term unemployed in the Province at the latest date.

Mr. Viggers: At 14 May 1987, 65,313 claimants had been continuously unemployed for more than one year in Northern Ireland, representing 51·8 per cent. of unemployed claimants in the Province on that date.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to reduce unemployment in the Province.

Mr. Viggers: The Government continue to pursue a series of measures designed to reduce unemployment. These include the substantial measures to secure new jobs in Northern Ireland through the Industrial Development Board, the Local Enterprise Development Unit and through a unique framework of financial assistance distributed to that end. They also include an extensive programme of employment and training measures which include Action for Community Employment, Enterprise Ulster, the new workers scheme, jobclubs, restart, the new job training programme, the enterprise allowance scheme and the youth training programme.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the latest unemployment figures in the Province.

Mr. Viggers: At 14 May 1987 there were 126,105 unemployed claimants in Northern Ireland, representing 18·4 per cent. of the working population.

The Government recognise the seriousness of the unemployment problem in the Province and continues to give a high priority to employment, training and enterprise programmes. Besides having a direct impact on the unemployment situation these programmes should also help to improve the conditions for economic growth in the Province.

WALES

Labour Statistics

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the number of persons employed in the electrical and electronic industry in Wales at the most recent date; how this compares with the figure in September 1984 and in September 1981, respectively; and if he will make a statement on the significance of any changes.

Mr. Peter Walker: The latest estimate of people employed in electrical and electronic industries in Wales was 34,400 in mid-1986. This compares with 33,800 in mid-1984 and 32,900 in mid-1981.

Public Bodies (Membership)

Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the names of all chairmen and members of public bodies in Wales for whose appointment he is responsible.

Mr. Peter Walker: I will write to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Roads

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many miles of trunk roads there are in each of the counties of Wales; what proportions of those roads are dual carriageway; and of those what proportion is of urban motorway standard.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The information requested is as follows:

County	Trunk road mileage (including motorway)	Percentage of trunk roads and motorways that is dual carriageway	Percentage of dual carriageway that is motorway
Clwyd	125·7	n a	n a
Dyfed	238·0	7·6	17·0
Gwent	108·0	58·3	39·2
Gwynedd	208·8	4·9	0·0
Mid Glamorgan	55·6	65·9	45·6
Powys	263·8	1·5	0·0
South Glamorgan	17·2	100·0	74·7
West Glamorgan	39·5	68·5	61·3

n/a Not yet available.

The above figures are as at 1 April 1987 and are provisional.
Urban motorways are not identified separately.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the total road length in Wales is (a) trunk road, (b) dual carriageway and (c) urban motorway standard.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Provisional figures as at 1 April 1987 show that of the total road length in Wales (a) 5·2 per cent. was trunk road (including motorway), (b) 0·9 per cent. was dual carriageway (excluding Clwyd for whom no figures are available), and (c) 0·4 per cent. was motorway.

No data are available for lengths of roads of urban motorway standard.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what plans he has for the improvement of the A5 road from the Welsh border to Holyhead; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what plans he has for the improvement of road links between north and south Wales between (a) Bangor and Carmarthen and (b) Wrexham and Cardiff; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: "Roads in Wales 1985" contains details of planned improvements to these routes. In drawing up the road programme for the 1990s consideration is being given to further schemes to be added to the programme.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for further improvements to the A55 Chester to Bangor road; what is the projected expenditure on each of the stages of improvement; and when he expects them to be completed.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Three schemes (the Conwy crossing; Penmaenbach-Dwygyfylchi; Penmaenmawr bypass) are at present under construction at a total estimated cost of £230 million. The following schemes are in preparation:

Estimated Gross cost at November 1986 prices

	£ million
1. Northop Bypass	11·328
2. Llanfairfechan Bypass	18·936
3. Traveller's Inn Improvement	3·789
4. Pen-y-Clip tunnels	28·174
5. Rhuallt Hill Improvement	8·312
6. Aber Improvement	7·850

The upgrading of the A55 is expected to be complete around the turn of the decade.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total expenditure of his Department on roads in Wales at outturn and current prices in each year since 1977-78; and what is the projected expenditure for 1987-88, 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Details of expenditure since 1977-78 are as follows:

Year	Outturn Expenditure on Trunk Roads and Motorways	Expenditure on Trunk Roads and Motorways at 1986-87 Prices[1]
1977-78	52,964	113,969
1978-79	61,351	119,284
1979-80	73,747	122,695
1980-81	92,251	129,391
1981-82	107,815	137,702
1982-83	118,707	141,362
1983-84	148,310	169,075
1984-85	104,913	114,684
1985-86	101,630	104,687
1986-87	114,461	114,461

[1] The figures at 1986-87 prices have been calculated by the application of the GDP Deflator at market prices.

Provision for trunk roads and motorways for 1987-88 is £124 million. It is currently estimated that in each of the years 1988-89 and 1989-90 expenditure will be in the region of £140 million. No firm decisions have however yet been taken on the apportionment of the Welsh block expenditure to individual services for the years beyond 1987-88. Planned provision for 1990-91 will be announced in the 1988 Public Expenditure White Paper.

Integrated Operations Programme

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to support the recent submission of Gwynedd, Dyfed and Powys county councils to the European Community under the integrated operations programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I understand that the local authorities concerned have yet to complete their work on the preparation of an integrated operations programme for this area but that a submission is expected shortly. Once the programme is submitted I, and my officials who are already in consultation with the local authorities on the initiative, will of course give it full and early consideration.

Transport Supplementary Grant

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales which road improvement schemes in Wales, in each year since 1979, qualified for the transport supplementary grant.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Until 1982-83 transport supplementary grant was paid on local authority programmes of capital and current expenditure and from 1982-83 to 1984-85 on programmes of capital expenditure. Information on all individual schemes is not available.

Since 1985-86 the only new expenditure accepted for TSG relates to schemes estimated to cost £5 million or more. The following have been accepted for grant:

Year of Acceptance and Scheme	County
1985-86
A534 Holt Farndon By-Pass	Clwyd
A484 Loughor Bridge and Approaches	Dyfed West Glamorgan[1]
A4119 Mid Rhondda Access Road	Mid Glamorgan
1986-87
Bridge over Wrexham-Bidston Railway	Clwyd
A467 Abertillery-Brynmawr Improvement	Gwent
Cardiff Central Link	South Glamorgan
Neath Urban Inner By-Pass	West Glamorgan
A4067 Glais-Pontardawe Improvement	West Glamorgan
1987-88
Cardiff Butetown Link	South Glamorgan

[1] Joint project.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will make it his policy to lower the qualifying threshold for transport supplementary grants in order to make some trunk roads eligible; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Transport supplementary grant is payable only on local authority road schemes. The trunk road programme is wholly funded by the Government.

ADAS

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are employed by the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in Wales at present; and what was the corresponding figure in 1979.

Mr. Peter Walker The number of ADAS staff in post in Wales on 1 April 1987 was 356 and the number in post on the corresponding date in 1979 was 493. These figures include staff at the experimental husbandry farms and ADAS headquarters staff outstationed in Wales.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total budget of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in Wales in each financial year since 1978-79.

Mr. Peter Walker It is not possible to extract this information in the form requested.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether his Department has any plans for changes in the operations of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in Wales; and if he will make a statement on the future of the service.

Mr. Peter Walker: The future organisation of ADAS in Wales is being discussed by my Department and MAFF in the light of the reorganisation which MAFF is currently implementing.

European Regional Development Fund

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales which schemes for road improvements in each of the counties of Wales have received assistance from the European regional development fund since its inception.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: To date total ERDF assistance to road improvement schemes in each county in Wales is as follows:

Clwyd	30,568,451·90
Dyfed	17,570,954·10
Gwent	25,756,626·00
Gwynedd	7,278,806·40
Mid Glamorgan	25,226,911·36
Powys	1,328,674·50
South Glamorgan	31,321,242·70
West Glamorgan[1]	14,853,374·00
Total Wales	153,905,040·96

[1] includes a joint scheme with Dyfed CC.

I will write to the hon. Gentleman in due course with details of the schemes involved and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Welsh Language

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects to be able to announce the result of his Department's consultation on the need for new Welsh language legislation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave to the hon. Gentleman on 26 February at column 349.

County Hospital, Panteg

Mr. Paul Murphy asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will meet the Gwent health authority to discuss the future of the County hospital, Panteg.

Mr. Ian Grist: The future of County hospital is a matter for Gwent health authority in the first instance. Any proposals to vary substantially the service provided at County hospital would be subject to extensive consultation. Should local agreement not be reached, the proposals would be submitted to my right hon. Friend for a decision. It would therefore be inappropriate for my right hon. Friend or me to enter into discussions with the authority which might prejudice any future role in this matter.

Sheep Monitoring

Mr. Raffan asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest results of sheep monitoring in north Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: Monitoring shows that some sheep within the present restricted area continue to have readings above the action level. In addition a number of sheep with readings above this level have been found in an area of about 10 sq. miles to the west of Llanuwchllyn immediately outside the restricted area. In the light of these results I have today made an Order to re-introduce restrictions on the movement and slaughter of sheep from this area. Some 17 producers and around 10,000 sheep are affected and will qualify for compensation arrangements under the existing schemes. Monitoring of sheep inside and adjoining the restricted area boundaries will continue and any action needed to protect public health and maintain market confidence will be taken if necessary.

The monitoring results are being published and a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Stray Dogs

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle, sheep or other animals were killed or seriously injured by stray dogs worrying them in the last year for which figures are available; and what was the estimated cost of the damage.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Records of the numbers of farm animals killed or injured by dogs in Great Britain have not been collected centrally since 1978 because collection was considered to be an undue burden on the local constabularies, who were responsible for gathering the data. The statistics for 1978 based on police returns to local authorities, were as follows:

Species	Killed	Injured
Sheep	3,951	2,805
Poultry	1,760	245
Cattle	11	78
Pigs	12	8
Goats	2	7
Domestic rabbits	1	—
Horses/ponies	1	1
TOTAL	5,738	3,144

These figures exclude West Yorkshire, where returns were discontinued earlier.

There is no estimate available of the cost of the damage resulting from these attacks.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much has been spent on maintaining European Economic Community food intervention stores in London by borough in each of the past four years.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Farm Bankruptcies

Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the estimated number of farm bankruptcies in (a) the United Kingdom, (b) Scotland, (c) Wales, (d) England, (e) Northern Ireland, (f) Dyfed and (g) Pembrokeshire, in each of the years 1980 to 1986, inclusive.

Mr. Maude: I have been asked to reply.

The information that is available for the agriculture and horticulture industry is given in the table. I regret that no industrial analysis is available for sequestrations in Scotland (equivalent to bankruptcies) or for company liquidations in Northern Ireland. No area analysis of company liquidations is available. For bankruptcies in England and Wales, although an area analysis of the total is available, there is no analysis of the area figures by industry.

Insolvencies in Agriculture and Horticulture 1980-1986

Number

	Bankruptcies[1]		Company liquidations[2]
	England and Wales	Northern Ireland	England and Wales	Scotland
1980	50	2	34	3
1981	70	11	56	8
1982	78	2	55	8
1983	98	9	74	5
1984	155	8	77	7
1985	[3]136	7	102	4
1986	n/a	9	128	6

[1] Bankruptcies are of unincorporated businesses classified to agriculture and horticulture, deeds of arrangement are included.

[2] Compulsory and creditors' voluntary liquidations.

[3] Discontinuity in serious because of changes to monetary limits on petitions.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Schools (Open Enrolment)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the Government's plans to provide for more open enrolment to schools.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I intend to bring forward legislation to change the present arrangements for admissions to schools so that local education authorities and governing bodies, depending on who is responsible for admissions policy at any particular school, would be required to admit pupils up to the limit of that school's available capacity.

I am today publishing a consultation document which develops the proposal I first announced in a public speech on 1 May. I shall be inviting comments by 16 September 1987. Copies of the document have been placed in the Library.

ENVIRONMENT

House of Commons

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what tendering procedures works under the House of Commons maintenance allocation in the Supply Estimates which are carried out by private contractors or sub-contractors are subject to; and if he will publish the guidelines covering the awarding of maintenance work either in house or to outside contractors.

Mr. Chope: The parliamentary works office is responsible for the care and maintenance of the Palace of Westminster, including the parliamentary outbuildings. As part of the Property Services Agency it conforms to the rules of Government contracting designed to ensure the proper use of public money and to obtain good value for the funds expended. For maintenance schemes a variety of tendering methods are available, according to the type of service required.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Ridley: On 1 June 1987 my Department employed 6,486 staff in the Department of the Environment (central) and 19,012 in the Property Services Agency. My Department's estimates for 1987-88 include provision for £147·7 million running costs expenditure by the Department of the Environment (central) and £333·7 million by the Property Services Agency. The regional breakdown of the totals is:

Region	Department of the Environment (Central)		Property Services Agency
	Staff Employed	Running costs provision	Staff employed	Running costs provision
		£ Million		£Million
London and the South East	5,225	119.7	12,205	213.6
The South West	595	13.5	2,463	43.4
The Midlands	210	4.8	1,490	26.7
The North of England	426	9.7	2,854	50.0
Total	6,486	147.7	19,012	333.7

Note: The running costs provision for each region is calculated pro rata to staff numbers.

Landlord and Tenant Act 1987

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when it is intended to bring into effect the provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1987.

Mr. Waldegrave: I hope that it will be possible to do so during the autumn as soon as the necessary supporting orders and regulations have been made.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Ms. Gordon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he has given to the London Docklands Development Corporation concerning public access to riverside land when giving consent to planning applications; and if he will instruct the London Docklands Development Corporation, when it considers planning applications, to provide for continuing public access to the river bank as part of development schemes.

Mr. Trippier: No guidance from my right hon. Friend is necessary. Development control in the docklands is guided by the provisions of the Greater London development plan, in which development control authorities are urged to give special attention to, inter alia, the creation of better public access with new and improved riverside walks, open spaces and viewpoints. The London Docklands Development Corporation, in its planning briefs on individual sites, aims to provide for greater public access to the river bank.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what costs have been incurred on the site of South Killingholme since the announcement that the Government were not going to use shallow tunnel disposal of nuclear waste;

(2) what costs have been incurred on the site of Elstow since the announcement that the Government were not going to use shallow tunnel disposal of nuclear waste;

(3) what costs have been incurred on the site of Bradwell since the announcement that the Government were not going to use shallow tunnel disposal of nuclear waste;

(4) what costs have been incurred on the site of Fullback since the announcement that the Government were not going to use shallow tunnel disposal of nuclear waste.

Mr. Moynihan £5 million is the estimated total of the costs that will be incurred at all four sites from the announcement on 1 May until the final reinstatement of the sites.

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the contracts between NIREX and various contractors for the exploration of sites considered for nuclear dumping include penalty clauses if the contract is cancelled by either side.

Mr. Moynihan: No.

Empty Dwellings (Copeland)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of empty dwellings, as at 1 April 1986, in the Copeland constituency, owned by (a) the local authority, (b) the private sector, (c) housing associations, (d) the Ministry of Defence, (e) the Home Office and (f) others in the public sector.

Mr. Ridley: The information available to my Department is for vacant housing within the borough of Copeland at 1 April 1986, provided in the council's 1986 housing investment programme return, which is in the Library. Any vacant housing owned by Government Departments is included in the category "other public sector".

Community Charge

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the (a) number and (b) proportion of those living in metropolitan borough councils who will be liable to pay only the minimum 20 per cent. of the proposed community charge.

Mr. Howard: There are approximately 8·5 million adults living in the metropolitan areas. Of these, it is estimated that about 1·3 million, or 15 per cent. could receive the benefit of 80 per cent. rebates of their community charge.

Housing Act 1985

Mr. Bidwell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the working of the Housing Act 1985 as it relates to allegations of racial harassment and attacks.

Mr. Waldegrave: My reply of 3 July to the Hon. Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) referred to the circumstances in which councils may seek orders for possession under grounds laid down in the Housing Acts 1980 and 1985. The Department is monitoring the operation of the provisions, but there has been little experience to date of their use in the courts in cases of racial harassment.

Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent by his Department on (a) ministerial hospitality and (b) other official hospitality in 1985-86 and 1986-87.

Mr. Ridley: Expenditure on hospitality in my Department was:

	1985-86 £	1986-87 £
Ministerial	14,740	13,650
DOE(C) Official	16,560	17,470
PSA Official	10,520	19,920
Total	41,820	51,040

Transport Museum (Low Moor)

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the grant aid available for the development of a transport museum at Low Moor in Bradford; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The site of the proposed West Yorkshire Transport Museum at Low Moor, Bradford, was reclaimed with the help of derelict land grant.

Additional funds may be available through the urban programme, but the Department is able to consider grant assistance only on those projects which local authorities are minded to support.

Assistance may be available from the European regional development fund, provided the scheme meets Commission requirements and domestic practices relating to trusts and scheme eligibility. The scheme must also have the support of the regional and English tourist boards.

Contributions to museums and museum projects are also made through the Manpower Services Commission and organisations such as English Heritage and the English tourist board. Grants may also be available from the Musuem and Galleries Commission and the Yorkshire and Humberside Museums Council.

House Building (Slaley, Northumberland)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will call in for public inquiry the planning application to build 65 permanent houses in the green belt at Slaley in Northumberland.

Mr. Waldegrave: The planning application made to Tynedale district council has been advertised by it as a departure from the development plan because it involves residential development in the green belt. If the local planning authority is minded to approve the application, it may refer it to the Secretary of State under the Town and Country Planning (Development Plans) (England) Direction 1981. The Secretary of State will then consider the merits of the proposal before reaching any decision.

Housing (Green Belt)

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what studies his Department is undertaking into the prospects for new housing in the green belt in each of the standard regions of England, respectively.

Mr. Waldegrave: None. Green belt policy remains as set out in circular 14/84 and there must continue to be a general presumption against inappropriate development within green belts.

Parrots

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the Uruguayan proposal for a complete suspension of the international commerce in wild caught parrots for the pet trade, to be raised at the sixth meeting of the parties to the convention on international trade in endangered species in Ottawa in July; and who will be representing the United Kingdom at the meeting.

Mr. Moynihan: The Department has not been notified by the secretariat of the convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora of any such Uruguayan proposal. The United Kingdom delegation will decide whether to support any proposal of this sort after considering the details of the proposal and in the light of the debate. The United Kingdom's general view is that, provided the species in question can sustain the trade, commercial trade in wild taken animals should not be banned.

The United Kingdom delegation to the conference will comprise the head of the Department's wildlife division, the head of the endangered species branch and representatives from the Department's scientific advisers — the Nature Conservancy Council and the Royal Botanic Gardens, Kew—the British high commission in Ottawa and the Cayman Islands and Hong Kong Governments.

Local Government Expenditure

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has considered further the recommendation of the Widdicombe committee for an interim doubling of the limit on expenditure under section 137 of the Local Government Act 1972 for metropolitan district and London borough councils.

Mr. Howard: We are continuing our consideration of the Widdicombe committee's recommendations on discretionary spending by local authorities. I have, however, already reached the conclusion that this recommendation of the Widdicombe committee did not pay sufficient regard to the wide range of the other discretionary powers available to those local authorities. In many cases, not least in the area of economic development activity, expenditure attributed to section 137 should properly come under another power; and, in particular, section 48 of the Local Government Act 1985 gives a wide new power to metropolitan district and London borough councils, outside the section 137 limit, for grants to voluntary organisations. I do not therefore consider that there should be a change to section 137 of the kind recommended by the Widdicombe committee.

Rate Support Grant

Mr. Hayes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when the second rate support grant supplementary report 1986-87 will be published.

Mr. Ridley: I have laid this report before the House today.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education announced to the House on 2 March his proposals for teachers' pay under the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987. He promised that the Exchequer would make a significant contribution through RSG towards the extra cost that would result in 1986-87 and the current financial year.

On 5 May the House approved of the first Supplementary Report 1987-88, which increased the expenditure provision by £460 million and block grant by £183 million to cover the extra cost of school teachers' pay in the current financial year. The purpose of this second supplementary report for 1986-87 is to honour the undertaking to make a contribution towards the cost in 1986-87. It will increase the expenditure provision for local authorities by a £111 million and block grant by £5 million. As usual, the report will make a number of changes to grant related expenditure assessments, and take account of the latest information available from authorities on total expenditure.

Copies of the report and tables showing exemplifications of likely revised grant entitlements are being sent to all local authorities and the local authority associations. Copies are being placed in the Library and in the Vote Office.

Local Authority Employees

Mr. Michael Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has considered what action he should take following the High Court judgment in the case of Oliver v Northampton Borough Council that any information which a local authority held about its employees' personal affairs was open to public scrutiny at the time of audit.

Mr. Chope: I have today placed in the Library a paper which is being sent to the local authority associations, the Audit Commission, and other interested parties inviting comments on a proposal that at the next convenient opportunity amending legislation should be introduced so that all information which an authority holds about its employees would be excluded from public inspection, except information about gross pay, allowances, bonuses and overtime payments which would continue to be open to inspection at the time of audit.

LDDC (Canary Wharf)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to submit for further review the price agreed by the London Docklands Development Corporation and the developers of Canary wharf; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1987]: When the LDDC sells land it is required to obtain a certificate from an independent valuer that the land is not below current market value and, if that is unobtainable, it needs specific consent from the Department to the disposal of its land at a lower price. The Department is keeping the terms of the whole agreement, including the land price, under continuing review as negotiations proceed with the aid of independent financial and legal advice.

Derelict Land Grant

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the environment if he will list the amount of derelict land grant made available to individual local authorities for each year since 1979, and where appropriate, split these into class A and class B grants.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 55]

Amounts of derelict land grant paid to individual authorities for each year since 1979 are given in the following table. Figures are not yet available for 1986-87, nor is it possible to split the figures between category A and category B projects. In any event, this categorisation has not been applied to schemes approved since 1985.

SCOTLAND

National Health Service (Waiting Times)

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the total average waiting time for National Health Service in-patient treatment in each surgical specialty in each hospital in Scotland for 1986.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information for 1986 is not yet available. The table gives the mean waiting time (in days) for patients admitted from the waiting list and discharged from surgical specialties during 1985. The figures do not include emergency admissions; those in brackets are based on less than five cases.

Prison Population

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average age of the prison population for each Scottish penal establishment for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information could not be provided without disproportionate cost.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the average prison population for each Scottish prison for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The 1986 figures are set out in the table. Figures for the earlier years have been published in Appendix 1 of the annual reports "Prisons in Scotland", of which copies are available in the Library.

Female Prisoners

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of women committed to Scottish prison systems for each year since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Following is the information:

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the numbers of mentally-handicapped or mentally-ill persons at present in Scottish prisons.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In 1986 medical attention was required for 3,434 inmates suffering from various forms of neurosis or mental disorder. Only 63 inmates, however, were diagnosed as suffering from psychosis and five inmates found to be mentally handicapped.

Traffic Flows

Mr. Andrew Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies his Department has made of the effects of slow moving local traffic flows daily crossing dual carriageway roads which carry fast moving inter-city traffic; what effects this situation is estimated to have on accident rates; and what is his policy with regard to avoiding such situations in new dual carriageway construction.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Studies have been undertaken over many years by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory and the Department of Transport on the aspects of design which influence the capacity and safety of junctions. The benefit of this research is contained in a technical memorandum (SH/82) used by roads authorities.

All trunk road manoeuvres create some hazard. Excessive speed of traffic on the trunk road and inexperienced drivers, who have difficulty in negotiating junctions, are the main causes of accidents. Accident rates on new stretches of road tend to drop once drivers have become used to the junctions.

In the design of new dual carriageways the policy adopted is to minimise the frequency of junctions and, where possible, to concentrate traffic crossing, joining and leaving the dual carriageway at the minimum number of locations.

Stracathro Hospital

Mr. Andrew Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for the latest year for which figures are available the number of reported accidents and fatalities on the road at Stracathro hospital; and what safety measures have so far been taken.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Between January and December 1986 1 fatal and 1 serious accident occurred on the relevant stretch of the A94. Between January and May of this year there has been 1 fatal accident.

Safety measures already taken include additional advance direction signs at half mile distance on both carriageways, together with the blue "H" hospital sign; on the hatching within the junction two arrows have been painted on the carriageway indicating the path to follow; and further warning signs have been provided indicating "dual carriageway ahead" on the exit from the hospital.

Prisoners (Educational Qualifications)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list educational qualifications gained by prisoners who began their studies in prison, in each Scottish prison for each year since 1982, including SCE awards, GCE awards and Open University awards, and so on.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally and can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Education Statistics

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing (a) the total number of pupils on school rolls and (b) the pupil-teacher ratio for primary and secondary schools in each islands council area in Scotland for each academic year since 1979.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information for local authority schools is set out in the tables:

Health Care

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the revised document setting out priorities for health care in Scotland will be published.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The report of the working group set up to review health authorities' priorities for the eighties and nineties (the SHARPEN report) was received by the Scottish Health Service Planning Council at its meeting on 10 June. I understand that the council considered it desirable to seek comments from interested bodies on the report's recommendations before itself forming conclusions. I expect to receive the council's proposals shortly.

Leukaemia

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when the final conclusions of the study by the Information Services Division of the Common Services Agency for the Scottish Health Service into the incidence of leukaemia in Scotland will be published.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The full results of the study have been published in the May edition of the health bulletin issued by the Chief Medical Officer of the Scottish Home and Health Department (Vol. 45 No 3). I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library. The results have been referred to the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Radiation in the Environment for guidance on the need for further investigation.

DEFENCE

Departmental Land

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how much defence land has been sold, or returned to former owners since 1979; how much land has been acquired; how defence land holdings compare today with holdings 10 and 20 years ago; and what proposals there are for extra acquisition of land for the Department.

Mr. Freeman: Records are not held in a form which would allow sales and acquisitions to be readily identified in the form requested without disproportionate cost. However, on 1 April 1979 defence estate holdings stood at 621,118 acres. By 1 April 1987 this had fallen to 591,376 acres. Comparative figures for 1 April 1967 were 654,274 acres and for 1 April 1977 625,583 acres. The Department's main acquisition proposals concern the purchase of land for training purposes. There are also a number of other proposals designed to meet specific requirements.

Warrant Officer Ross

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for Defence on what basis Warrant Officer Ross, serving in the British Army, was involved in the training of private persons in shooting at a privately-organised training exercise held at an Army shooting range in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: Former Warrant Officer Ross retired from the Royal Marines in 1984. It appears that while on 28 days terminal leave, and acting in a private capacity, he helped arrange for a security firm to hire the Bisley range, which is managed by the National Rifle Association. The last 28 days of service may be taken up in civilian employment under MOD regulations.

Nuclear Defence Policy

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will conduct a review of the Government's nuclear defence policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: No. Her Majesty's Government remain committed to the policies of successive Governments in maintaining an independent nuclear deterrent and supporting NATO strategy. The Government believe that possession by the United Kingdom of an independent nuclear deterrent will remain fundamental to the maintenance of this country's security for the foreseeable future.

Browning Ammunition

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for defence what is his policy with respect to the supply of 0·5" Browning ammunition from (a) United Kingdom suppliers and (b) foreign suppliers.

Mr. Sainsbury: Our policy is to secure the best long-term value for money on a national basis in procuring the equipment that the armed forces need. We buy British whenever it is sensible, economic and consistent with our international obligations to do so and acquire from overseas only when the advantages of cost, performance and timescale outweigh the longer term benefits of procuring the British alternative. We have recently invited bids from five companies, two of them British for the supply of this ammunition in the quantities required.

Nuclear Submarines (Waste)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Defence what exploratory work is now in progress, and where, to find sites for the dumping of waste from nuclear submarines.

Mr. Sainsbury No exploratory work is in progress to identify sites for the disposal of reactor compartments for decommissioned nuclear submarines.

Mr. Richard Branson (Rescue Costs)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated cost to public funds of the armed forces' rescue of balloonist Richard Branson and his pilot; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost to public funds of the recent support and rescue operation for Mr. R. Branson and his balloon pilot; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The armed forces stand ready to provide assistance when required if there is immediate danger to life. The Virgin Flyer rescue was such an example. The estimated cost is £34,000, which covers the rescue of Mr. Richard Branson and his pilot and the recovery of the Virgin Flyer from the sea.

Trident

Mr. William Powell asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement about progress with development of the Clyde submarine base required in support of Trident.

Mr. Freeman: The Property Services Agency of the Department of the Environment, which acts on behalf of the Secretary of State in matters of design and construction, is today letting a major contract for construction of a shiplift, berthing and other support facilities at Faslane. This is a very significant step in the development of facilities to support Trident, and it marks the beginning of the main construction phase at Faslane, where site preparation and advance works have been under way for some 18 months.

By the late autumn we expect to have let three more large construction contracts for Trident facilities at the armament depot at Coulport, the PSA will have invited tenders for the floating explosives handling jetty. When that contract, too, is awarded the great bulk of the development of the Clyde submarine base will be under way.

The contract announced today is worth some £120 million, but with further work for sub-contractors still to be settled the value of the overall package will rise to around £150 million. Construction of the shiplift brings with it some 600 jobs to the west of Scotland as well as important orders for suppliers of equipment and materials in other parts of Britain.

THE ARTS

Objects in Lieu of Tax

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will specify the allocations made to public institutions in the United Kingdom during the half-year ended 30 June of individual works of art and museum objects pre-eminent for national, scientific, historic or artistic interest which have been accepted in satisfaction of inheritance tax or capital transfer tax, together with information, where applicable, as to conditions or wishes expressed by testators or executors in the matter of allocation; whether he will list the works of art or museum objects which are still awaiting allocation, with the respective date of their acceptance in satisfaction of inheritance tax or capital transfer tax; and whether the customary press notice will be issued from the Office of Arts and Libraries covering the information given in his reply.

Mr. Luce: The information is as follows:

Works of Art (Exports)

Mr. Faulds asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will list the items for which the issuing of export licences was withheld on the recommendation of the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art during the half-year ended 30 June, specifying in each case the valuation and whether an item was eventually exported or retained, with particulars in the latter event of the acquiring institution; whether he will list any items for which licences have been withheld but the final disposal of which is not yet decided, specifying in each case (a) the valuation and (b) the relevant time limit; and whether a press notice will be issued from the Office of Arts and Libraries covering the comprehensive information given in his reply, in accordance with established practice.

Mr. Luce: The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry accepted my recommendation following consideration by the Reviewing Committee on the Export of Works of Art to defer making for a specified period a decision on an export licence application in respect of the items listed. Details of the items listed were given in press notices issued at the time the Secretary of State decided to accept the recommendation; however a further press notice will be issued.

Description of Item	Valuation £	Outcome
A painting, "La Rue Mosnier aux Paveurs", by Edouard Manet	7,805,000	Decision deferred for six months until 2 September 1987. Licence granted following a review of the situation after six weeks.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Rates

8. Dr. Bray asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information he has on the current level of real short-term interest rates in the United Kingdom by comparison with those in the United States, the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan.

Mr. Lawson: Real short-term interest rates in the United Kingdom are currently about ½ per cent. higher than the average of the seven major industrial countries.

20. Dr. Godman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of interest rates.

Mr. Lilley: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave earlier to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald).

Privatisation

10. Mr. Stott asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of receipts from privatisation for the year 1987-88.

Mr. Major: £5 billion.

38. Dr. Twinn asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many companies, with how many employees, have been transferred from the public sector to the private sector since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given earlier today by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon (Mr. Coombs).

62. Mr. Hardy asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his estimate of the sums which will be received as a result of the sale of public assets during the present and in each of the next five financial years.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As shown in the 1987 public expenditure White Paper (Cm. 56-I), the estimate of receipts from the privatisation programme in each of the years 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 is £5 billion. No estimate has been made of proceeds in later financial years.

Economic Growth

14. Mr. Wilkinson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the growth of economic output in the United Kingdom since 1983 compares with that of other major industrialised countries.

Mr. Major: Since 1983 output in the United Kingdom has grown faster than in any other major European economy.

27. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the growth of economic output in the United Kingdom since 1983 compares with that of other major industrialised countries in the same period.

49. Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the growth of economic output in the United Kingdom since 1983 compares with that of other major industrialised countries in the same period.

Mr. Lilley: I refer my hon. Friends to the answer my right hon. Friend the Chancellor gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip - Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson).

44. Mr. John Hunt asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the growth of the output in the economy.

56. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the growth of output in the economy.

Mr. Major: Measured at 1980 prices, the average estimate of gross domestic product at factor cost is provisionally estimated to have risen by 3½ per cent. in the year to the first quarter of 1987.

Manufacturing Industry

19. Mr. Bruce asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current projected deficit in manufactured goods compared with the estimates at the time of the last Budget.

Mr. Major: The performance so far in 1987 has been better than implied at Budget time; in the four months to April the trade deficit in manufactures fell by £1·1 billion compared to the last four months of 1986. A new forecast will be published in the usual way at the time of the autumn statement.

43. Mr. Gregory asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the most recent statistics for the growth of manufacturing industry productivity in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

59. Mr. Summerson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the growth of manufacturing productivity in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley: I refer my hon. friends to the answer my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North. (Mr. Thompson)

Non-North Sea Companies

21. Mr. Colvin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest figure for the net real rate of return for non-North sea companies in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lilley: 8 per cent.

Public Expenditure

22. Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of general Government expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product.

26. Mr. Couchman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of general Government expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product.

Mr. Major: General government expenditure represented just under 43 per cent. of gross domestic product in 1986-87.

54. Mr. Rowe asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of central Government expenditure as a proportion of gross domestic product.

Mr. Major: The normal measure for assessing trends in public spending is general government expenditure as a percentage of GDP. The latest estimate for that in 1986-87 is 43 per cent. The figure for central Government expenditure is 32 per cent.

Self-employment

Mr. Brandon-Bravo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how much self-employment has grown in the United Kingdom since 1979.

Mr. Lilley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend, the Member for New Forest (Mr. McNair-Wilson).

Oil Prices

24. Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his Department's current assessment of the impact of lower oil prices on the United Kingdom's economy.

Mr. Major: Individuals and companies are benefiting from lower fuel costs and the manufacturing sector is already responding to the competitiveness gains which have occurred.

EC (Finance Ministers)

25. Dr. Marek asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will next meet the Finance Ministers of the European Economic Community.

Mr. Brooke: The next meeting of European Community Economic and Finance Ministers is scheduled for 13 July.

Personal Taxation

28. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, what representations he has received regarding the reform of personal taxation.

Mr. Lamont: Following the publication of the Green Paper "The Reform of Personal Taxation" responses were received from around 70 organisations and about 400 individuals. Although a majority of those who expressed a preference favoured the introduction of a system of independent taxation of husband and wife with transferable allowances, the total number responding was low. In these circumstances we did not yet feel there was sufficient support to go ahead with so far-reaching a reform. We are exploring the possibility of finding a halfway house to the Green Paper approach. Ministers continue to receive correspondence on the issues discussed in the Green Paper.

Value Added Tax

29. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to introduce value added tax on children's clothes; and if he will make a statement.

53. Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has for changes in the scope of value added tax.

Mr. Brooke: I refer the hon. Members to the reply I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones).

34. Mr. Wallace asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to introduce value added tax on books, and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend has no such plans.

40. Mr. Madden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about extensions of value added tax paid in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. Friend received a number of representations in the run-up to the election urging him not to extend value added tax to various items currently zero-rated.

42. Mr. Alex Carlile asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the effect of the Civil Service dispute on value added tax refunds affecting small businesses.

50. Mrs. Gorman asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps he is taking to mitigate the effects on traders of the current value added tax dispute; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) on 2 July at column 167.

46. Mr. David Nicholson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new company value added tax registrations there were in 1986.

Mr. Baldry askd the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new company value added tax registrations there were in 1986.

Mr. Brooke: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon).

47. Mr. Nicholas Brown asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement regarding the operation of recent changes in the regulations governing the collection of value added tax by the Customs and Excise.

Mr. Brooke: Regulations about the implementation of the default surcharge and the repayment supplement were effective from 1 October 1986. Their operation, together with other value added tax measures arising from the Keith Committee recommendations enacted in the 1985 Finance Act, will be reviewed before the 1988 budget. More recently, the Finance Act 1987 provided authority for schemes of cash and annual accounting. A copy of the draft regulations for the Cash Accounting scheme was placed in the Library on 24 April. Draft regulations for Annual Accounting will be provided, on the same way, closer to the mid-1988 date of introduction.

Unemployment Costs

30. Mr. Nigel Griffiths asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will provide an estimate of the cost of unemployment in Scotland.

Mr. Major: I regret that regional figures for benefit expenditure on the unemployed are not available.

Public Sector Borrowing Requirement

31. Mr. Yeo asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest forecast for the public sector borrowing requirement for 1987-88.

Mr. Major: The figure is £3·9 billion, or 1 per cent. of GDP as published in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" for 1987-88.

Budget Proposals

32. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what further representations he has received on his Budget.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The proposals in my right hon. Friend's Budget have been widely welcomed.

Inflation

33. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the level of inflation.

55. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current level of inflation.

Mr. Lilley: The increase in retail prices for the 12 months ending May 1987 was 4·1 per cent.

Overseas Assets

35. Mr. Quentin Davies asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of net United Kingdom assets overseas.

45. Mr. Hannam asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the present level of net United Kingdom assets overseas.

Mr. Major: Net United Kingdom overseas assets are estimated to have increased from about £80 billion at the end of 1985 to about £110 billion at the end of 1986. This is equivalent to 28 per cent. of GDP, the highest recorded level since the war.

Credit Cards

36. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received seeking regulations of the credit card industry.

Mr. Lilley: Very few. Credit card agreements are subject to the Consumer Credit Act which is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Director General of Fair Trading has asked the Monopolies and Mergers Commission to investigate credit card services.

Shareholders

37. Mr. Charles Wardle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figure on the number of shareholders in the United Kingdom.

51. Mr. Ashby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figure of the number of shareholders in the United Kingdom.

58. Mr. Butler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the latest figure on the number of shareholders in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The joint Treasury and Stock Exchange survey carried out in January and February this year estimated that there were 8½ million shareholders, 19½ per cent. of the adult population, roughly three times the equivalent figure for 1979.

European Monetary System

39. Mr. Robert Hicks asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he next proposes to have discussions with the European Community Council of Ministers about the United Kingdom joining the exchange rate mechanism of the European monetary system; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend discusses aspects of the European monetary system with his European colleagues from time to time.

Greenhouses (Capital Allowances)

41. Mr. Hind asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to change capital allowances for owners of greenhouses in the nursery industry.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Industrial Production

48. Miss Emma Nicholson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the level of industrial production.

Mr. Major: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor).

Unit Labour Costs

52. Sir Anthony Meyer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest figures for the growth of unit labour costs.

Mr. Major: In the fourth quarter of 1986, wages and salaries per unit of output in the whole economy were 5·2 per cent. above the corresponding period of 1985. In the manufacturing sector, in the three months to April 1987, wages and salaries per unit of output were 0·9 per cent. above the corresponding period a year earlier.

Personal Incomes

57. Mr. Shersby asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the present level of real take-home pay of a married man on average earnings with two children compared with 1978-79.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Real take-home pay is estimated to have risen by 21·6 per cent. between 1978-79 and 1987-88 for a married man on average male earnings with two children.

Third World Debt

60. Mr. Skinner asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what recent discussions he has had with the Governor of the Bank of England regarding Third world debt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer regularly meets the Governor of the Bank of England and international economic issues, including developing country debt, are amongst the topics they discuss.

EC (Financial Contributions)

Mr. Cryer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the net financial contribution made by the United Kingdom to the European Economic Community in each year from 1979 to 1986.

Mr. Brooke: I refer to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) on 22 April 1987 at columns 577-78.

Museums (Grant Aid)

Mr. Cryer asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the grant aid, showing the amount in each case, given to museums and museum projects in Yorkshire and Humberside in 1985, 1986 and 1987 to the most recent practicable date.

Mr. Luce: I have been asked to reply.

Central Government supported expenditure on museums and museum projects in Yorkshire and Humberside are included in the table.

Contributions to museums and museum projects are also made from central Government funds through museums and galleries commission local museum purchase grants, the Manpower Services Commission and organisations such as English Heritage and tourist boards.

Tax Law (Repeal)

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the cost to the Exchequer of repealing section 37 of the Income Tax and Corporation Taxes Act 1970.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 7 July 1987, c. 83]: This would depend on the levels of allowances available to husbands and wives, the rules of distinguishing a wife's income from that of her husband, and any transitional provisions following the change.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Maternity Grant

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women claimed maternity grant in the last month of availability (a) nationally and (b) in Preston; and how many women have had social fund payments for maternity in the first month of availability (i) nationally and (ii) in Preston.

Mr. Portillo: Information on the numbers of maternity grant claims made in Great Britain in the calendar month immediately preceding 6 April 1987 is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Between 4 March 1987 and 31 March 1987, the Department's child benefit centre at Washington received, from local offices, 9036 maternity grant claims. The numbers of maternity grant claims received at the Department's local offices at Preston, North and Preston, South between 6 March 1987 and 5 April 1987 were 113 and 227 respectively.

Between 6 April 1987 and 5 May 1987, Social Fund payments for maternity expenses in Great Britain numbered 11,248 including 65 at Preston, North and 38 at Preston, South local offices.

Drugs (Prices)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the prices negotiated for National Health Service drugs include an allowance for the risk of drug damage for which the company would have to pay compensation.

Mr. Newton: Costs of pharmaceutical companies accepted for the purposes of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme, and thus reflected in National Health Service medicine prices, would include a due share of the cost of a company's product liability insurance premiums.

Drugs (Clinical Trials)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what rules are laid down by the Committee on Safety of Medicines in respect of the inclusion of old people in clinical trials for drugs which will be used extensively by old people.

Mr. Newton: The current guidelines are given in annex IVB of "Guidance Notes on Applications for Product Licences (MAL 2)", a copy of which is in the Library. These guidelines are issued by the licensing authority after taking into consideration the advice of the Committee on Safety of Medicines.

Eli Lilly

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many drugs are supplied to the National Health Service by the firm Eli Lilly; and if he will list them.

Mr. Newton: This company produces a wide range of branded medicinal products, details of which may be found under the names of Dista Products Limited and Eli Lilly & Company Limited, in the Association of the British Pharmaceutical Industry data sheet compendium 1986-87. A copy of the compendium is held as a reference volume in the Scientific and Defence Section of the Library. Doctors may prescribe any of the products mentioned for National Health Service patients, apart from any which appear in schedule 3A of the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Amendment Regulations, 1985.

Drugs (Adverse Reactions)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in what way, and to what extent, his Department checks the warnings given by drug manufacturers about the risk of adverse reactions.

Mr. Newton: Any medicinal product which is promoted to doctors must be accompanied by a data sheet, which must be consistent with the product licence and must include an accurate account of the uses of the drug and its contra-indications and warnings. Data sheets submitted with licence applications are scrutinised to ensure that they reflect the data supporting the application.

The Committee on Safety of Medicines promote and monitor the reporting of adverse drug reactions. The adverse reactions group of CSM's sub-committee on safety (ARGOS), operates a prospective monitoring scheme to look every month at recently reported adverse reactions to selected new drugs. In addition, a team of doctors in the Department with appropriate experience carries out a fortnightly surveillance of all recently-received individual patient reports. The international published literature on adverse drug reactions is scrutinised by the Department and by ARGOS. The aim in each case is to identify new or increased hazards. As fresh information about adverse reactions becomes apparent officers of the Department may discuss revisions to the data sheet with the licence holder, or the CSM may advise the licensing authority on courses of action including measures to secure compulsory variation of a data sheet.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what severity of reaction is understood by his Department to be indicated where a pharmaceutical company warns of a mild adverse reaction; and whether such a reaction is understood to include photosensitivity;

Mr. Newton: In the medical sense, mild carries the same connotations as in lay usage. It specifically excludes all reactions which are fatal, life-threatening, disabling, incapacitating or which result in or prolong hospitalisation. Photosensitivity can be mild, moderate or severe.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what approximate period of time is understood by his Department to be referred to where a pharmaceutical company warns of a transient adverse reaction in connection with a drug.

Mr. Newton: In the medical sense, transient carries the same connotations as in lay usage. However, the significance of a transient reaction can be considered only in relationship to the drug and reaction in question.

Opren

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people are estimated to be still suffering from photosensitivity as a result of taking Opren; and how many people are estimated to be suffering from a liver condition as a result of taking the drug;

(2) what information he has as to how many people aged over 65 years took part in the clinical trials for Opren, and as to the average length of time that such people took part in the trial;

(3) how many people are estimated to have taken the drug Opren; and how many of these were aged over 65 years;

(4) if he or his officials have had any discussions with Eli Lilly about the possibility of the company establishing a structured compensation scheme for the alleged victims of the drug Opren;

(5) how many people are estimated to have died as a result of taking Opren.

Mr. Newton: These questions concern matters contained in current legal actions before the High Court against both the licensing authority and the Committee on Safety of Medicines. I am advised that they are therefore sub-judice.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services in each calendar year since Opren received a product licence, how many adverse reaction cards relating to it have been received by the Committee on Safety of Medicines; and how many in each year indicated a death.

Mr. Newton: The figures are not readily available in the form requested. I refer the right hon. Member to the debate in the House on 27 January 1983, at columns 1098-1122 and to the Committee on Safety of Medicines' update in the British Medical Journal of 3 May 1986 volume 292 pages 1190-1191.

Drugs (Damage)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will examine the possibility of making it a condition of a pharmaceutical company receiving a contract to supply drugs to the National Health Service that, in the event of that company paying any compensation for drug damage, British citizens would receive equal treatment.

Mr. Newton: Compensation questions fall to be determined between the parties or failing that by the courts in the light of the circumstances of the case. We have no plans to associate compensation arrangements with the supply of medicines to the NHS.

Benefits

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children, on the latest available figures, are now living in households dependent on social security benefits in (a) the Leeds Central constituency and (b) the Leeds metropolitan district council area.

Mr. Portillo: It is not possible to provide statistically valid estimates of the number of children living in families receiving supplementary benefit in Leeds Central constituency.

The Department's quarterly administrative statistics for February 1987 indicate that in the Leeds Metropolitan District, some 32,000 dependant children lived in families where the head was receiving supplementary benefit.

Geriatric Wards (Women)

Ms. Gordon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he has given to regional or district health authorities concerning the practice of placing patients of both sexes in overnight geriatric wards in mental hospitals; and what safeguards exist against physical harassment of vulnerable women patients.

Mrs. Currie: The principles which should govern the provision of mixed sex wards were conveyed to area health authority chairmen, at a meeting in 1980 chaired by the then Secretary of State, to the effect that patients' dignity and privacy must be respected, any arrangements whereby men and women share bedrooms is unsatisfactory, and sanitary facilities should give complete privacy. The desirability of a male and female nurse always being present in a mixed day area, and of nurses of both sexes being on call during the night was emphasised.

Mixed wards managed on this basis can be of positive therapeutic value to elderly people who are mentally ill. They can provide a setting for social contact, and may encourage improved social behaviour, personal hygiene and appearance.

Carers (Holidays)

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider plans to extend the opportunities of carers of elderly, handicapped or ill relatives to take holidays; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We recognise the value to family carers of relief from the burden of continual care and the part respite care services can play in this. However, responsibility for these services rests with local social services and health authorities. These authorities are best placed to assess local needs and to decide within the resources available what provision to make.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. D. E. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any plans to increase the value of invalid care allowances; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: We are pledged to maintain the value of invalid care allowance in line with the movement in prices and, since coming to office in 1979, we have more than done so. My right hon. Friend will be making the usual annual statement in the autumn about benefit upratings.

Nursing Services (Privatisation)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether it is his intention to privatise the provision of nursing services in National Health Service hospitals.

Mr. Newton: No.

NHS (Private Contractors)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information he has about difficulties experienced by hospital administrators or health authorities in enforcing the terms of contracts in respect of hospital cleaning services which have been granted to private contractors.

Mr. Newton: It is the responsibility of health authorities to monitor the performance of a contractor to ensure that the service delivered meets the standards specified in the contract. Day-to-day management information of the sort requested is not collected centrally.

Departmental Leaflets

Ms. Mahon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many complaints have been received from citizen's advice bureaux and other organisations over the last three years about difficulties and delays in obtaining departmental leaflets for distribution to the public;

(2) if he will give more resources to his departmental leaflets unit in order to reduce the problems presently experienced by citizens advice bureaux and their clients in obtaining such leaflets.

Mr. Portillo: The Department does not record the number of such complaints. Demand of departmental leaflets has recently increased sharply and regrettably there has been some delay in processing orders. I am considering a number of options to improve the situation.

Genetic Screening

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the funding of the investigation of genetic screening for common inherited diseases at Cardiff, Manchester and London.

Mrs. Currie: A special medical development at these locations has been funded by the Department for three years to enable a full evalution of the service implications of the application of DNA technology to genetic services. The current period of support ends in December 1987.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if additional funding is to be made available to regional health authorities for the investigation of genetic screening for common inherited diseases; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: It is for health authorities locally to determine the allocation of resources for genetic services within the overall resources available to them. We have no current plans to allocate resources to regional health authorities specifically for genetic services.

Primary Health Care

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he will be publishing a White Paper on primary health care following completion of discussions on his Green Paper (Cmnd. 9771), on the same subject.

Mr. Newton: We shall announce our conclusions on the primary health care review as soon as possible.

Organ Donors

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has received the report from Sir Raymond Hoffenberg and his committee about proposals to introduce a required request procedure in hospitals where organ donors arise.

Mrs. Currie: The working group, chaired by Sir Raymond Hoffenberg, the president of the Royal College of Physicians, is examing various ways of increasing the availability of donor organs for transplantation. The group has not yet submitted its report to the conference of royal medical colleges and their faculties. We understand that the report will be sent to the Department when it has been considered by the conference.

Hours of Work

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what is his Department's policy towards issuing guidelines to each health authority in England and Wales governing the hours to be worked by junior doctors in general hospitals;

(2) what guidelines his Department issued to area health authorities on the hours of work of working parties; and if he will make a statement on their future;

(3) whether his Department has reviewed rota arrangements for junior doctors, in view of the agreement reached between his Department and the British Medical Association in 1982; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: The issue of guidance to health authorities in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Departmental guidance to authorities in England on the hours of work of junior hospital doctors and dentists is contained in circulars PM(82)37, AL(MD)3 83 and PM(85)1, copies of which I have placed in the Library. This bans regular rotas requiring a practitioner to be on duty, on average, for more than one night and one weekend in two. It also asks authorities to aim for a target maximum commitment of one in three or better, where practicable, and to set up local professional working parties to recommend means of achieving this.

Following reviews undertaken in consultation with working parties betwen 1982 and 1985, it is estimated that the number of rotas more onerous than one in three fell or was planned to fall from 5,000 to 3,500, representing 18·4 per cent. of junior posts. In addition, the average weekly contracted hours of juniors have fallen in every year since 1979, from over 90 to 85·7, and surveys commissioned by the Review Body on Doctors' and Dentists' Remuneration show that the average weekly hours actually worked have also fallen, from 58·3 in 1981 to 57 in 1985. We expect authorities to keep the need for the remaining rotas more onerous than one in three under review, and it is open to them to convene working parties for that purpose.

The Department is currently collecting further information on practitioners' hours of work which it has undertaken to discuss with the profession's representatives.

Diseases Classification (Data)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to encourage regional health authorities to use the most recent version of the international classification of diseases code to improve the quality of HAA and HIPE data with a view to resolving current problems of inferior quality of data for record linkage purposes.

Mrs. Currie: All the regional health authorities used the most recent version of the international classification of diseases to code their hospital activity analysis data. We have not received any reports that the hospital activity analysis data are of inferior quality.

Abortions

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many abortions have been performed under the Abortion Act 1967 in each of the last five years for which figures are available on pregnancies of (a) under 20 weeks, (b) 20 weeks, (c) 21 weeks, (d) 22 weeks, (e) 23 weeks and (f) 24 weeks or more; and how many of the abortions in each case were performed under (i) ground 1 and (ii) ground 5 of the Act;

(2) how many abortions have been performed under the Abortion Act 1967 in the first quarter of 1987 and the first quarter of each of the five preceding years on pregnancies of (a) under 20 weeks, (b) 20 weeks, (c) 21 weeks, (d) 22 weeks, (e) 23 weeks and (f) 24 weeks or more; and how many of the abortions in each case were performed under (i) ground 1 and (ii) ground 5 of the Act.

Mr. Newton: The available information is given in the tables. Data for the first quarter of 1987 have not yet been processed fully.

Notes

Notifications with unknown gestation period are excluded.

Ground 1: the continuance of the pregnancy would involve risk to the life of the pregnant woman greater than if the pregnancy were terminated.

Ground 5: in emergency, to save the life of the pregnant woman.

Tabulation categories as in OPCS published data (series AB)

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of a nurse's take-home pay is related to accommodation costs; and whether he has given any consideration to assisting nurses with their housing costs in areas such as Berkshire where rents are generally higher than in other parts of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Newton: A nurse's take home pay depends on his or her individual circumstances, as does the proportion of that pay which is devoted to accommodation costs. Nurses' average earnings have risen by 30 per cent. since 1979, after allowing for movements in prices, including housing costs. The NHS Management Board is encouraging a number of experiments to develop schemes which could be used by health authorities in areas where housing costs are thought to be a contributory factor in staffing shortages.

Kidney Patients

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the planned annual rate of increase in treatment for new renal patients, regional health authority by regional health authority, for 1987-88.

Mrs. Currie I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Histopathology (Staff)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has received representations from the British Society for Clinical Cytology asking for further consultant histopathology posts to be created; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We are not aware of representations from the British Society for Clinical Cytology in this respect.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has estimated the number of new medical laboratory scientific officers who will be needed to deal with the extra work load created by the planned three-year recall cervical cytology programme.

Mrs. Currie: It is for the individual health authorities to estimate the type and number of staff they need in the light of their local arrangements for laboratory examination of cervical smears.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pathology laboratories in England and Wales undertake the processing of cervical cancer smears within the National Health Service; how many of these laboratories are equipped with a computer to assist them in the processing of smears; and how many of the laboratories have a computer linked directly with the FPC computer which issued the initial call.

Mrs. Currie: A total of 214 pathology laboratories in the National Health Service in England and Wales processed cervical smears in 1986. Information on the number of laboratories equipped with a computer and how many have computers linked with the family practitioner committee computer is not collected centrally.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which district health authorities are using private laboratories to process cervical cancer smears; and which companies are being used.

Mrs. Currie: It is for health authorities to decide how to obtain satisfactory processing of cervical smear tests. Some health authorities have sent cervical smears to private laboratories, particularly where backlogs arose following the sharp increase in the number of smears taken in the last two years. Comprehensive information on which district health authorities use private laboratories, and which companies are used, is not collected centrally.

Social Security Records (Police Access)

Mr. Wells asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out his policy on the disclosure of information from social security records to the police; and whether any measures have been taken in respect of the requirements of the Data Protection Act 1984.

Mr. Portillo: It is the long-standing policy of successive Governments that information may be disclosed on request to the police in a case which involves a serious crime or a missing person under age 18. The information is given orally and in confidence and in respect of specific named individuals only. The Department will also provide information, including a written statement, to the police where they are investigating alleged offences in which the Department has an interest, for example benefit fraud.

This policy will continue under the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984 when it comes fully into force in November 1987. In accordance with section 3(3)(d) of the Act, the police have been registered with the Data Protection Registrar as a body to whom we may wish to disclose personal data.

Mr. P. J. Johnson

Mr. Terry Fields asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when his Department intends to reply to correspondence from Mr. P. J. Johnson of 40 Gloucester road, Liverpool 6, a constituent of the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen, which was dispatched on 16 January; when his Department intends to reply to correspondence from Mr. P. J. Johnson which was dispatched by recorded delivery, on 18 May; and if he will return documents included in correspondence to Mr. P. J. Johnson; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Portillo [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 45]: A reply was sent to Mr. Johnson on 7 July enclosing the documents he requested.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

National Credit Registry

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any plans to create a national credit registry.

Mr. Maude: No. I consider that the existing credit reference agencies perform a valuable service and I welcome current moves to expand information on debtors into more comprehensive credit registers involving a wide range of lending institutions.

CS Gas

Mr. Greenway asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will take steps to prohibit the importation into the United Kingdom of CS gas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Clark: The possession, purchase, acquisition, manufacture, sale or transfer of CS gas canisters in Great Britain is already strictly controlled under section 5 of the Firearms Act 1968 and requires the special written authority of my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Home Department or the Secretary of State for Scotland as appropriate. Import licences are required before such goods may be imported and are granted only to those similarly authorised.

House of Fraser plc

Mr. Butterfill asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what instructions on reporting within a specific time limit he has given to the inspectors appointed to inquire into the acquisition of House of Fraser plc by the Fayeed Brothers.

Mr. Maude: Inspectors were appointed on 9 April 1987 under section 432(2) of the Companies Act 1985 to investigate and report on the affairs of House of Fraser Holdings plc. It is not the practice to instruct Companies Act inspectors to report by a specific date.

News International Ltd.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what occasions he has visited News International Ltd. at Wapping during the past three months.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I have never visited News International Ltd. at Wapping.

Mr. Rupert Murdoch

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what occasions he has met Mr. Rupert Murdoch on official business during the past three months.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: So far as I can recall, I have never met Mr. Rupert Murdoch on any occasion, official or private.

"Today" (Takeover)

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster at what time, and on what day, News

International Ltd. and Lonrho Ltd. deposited with his Department the financial and other information necessary for him to consider his responsibilities under section 58 of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Letters from News International Ltd. and Lonrho plc. were received by my officials at approximately 4.45 pm on 30 June and on behalf of News International Ltd. at approximately 11 am on 1 July. Further information was provided at a meeting between my officials and representatives of Lonrho plc. News (UK) Ltd. and its auditors at 11.30 am on 1 July, and shortly thereafter they supplied some additional information. What was important to the Secretary of State in reaching his decision was the nature to the information provided, not its timing.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster at what time, and on what day, he met representatives of (a) Lonrho Ltd. and (b) News International Ltd. to discuss the financial background to the takeover of the Today newspaper.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Neither the Secretary of State nor I personally met representatives of either Lonrho plc. or News International Ltd. at any time on any day to discuss the financial background to the takeover of the Today newspaper.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will deposit in the Library a memorandum of the financial and other material upon which he formed his judgment not to refer the takeover of the Today newspaper to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I will deposit in the Library such material as can be made available subject to the normal limits of commercial confidentiality and the requirements of the Fair Trading Act 1973.

Origin Marking

Mr. Cryer asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if, pursuant to his reply of 30 June, Official Report, column 58, to the hon. Member for Bradford, South, he will take steps to enable consumers to know when the criminal offence of misleading consumers about the origin of goods has taken place.

Mr. Maude: I have no plans to do so. However, as my predecessor indicated on 13 May during the passage of the Consumer Protection Act 1987, we believe that it will be possible to introduce a successor regime to the 1972 Trade Descriptions Act. This Act, which requires origin marking of imported goods where they are supplied in the United Kingdom bearing a United Kingdom name or mark, has to be repealed for reasons of Community law. We are now considering the terms of a draft order to provide for a successor regime.

The Trade Descriptions Act 1968 already prohibits the application to goods of false or misleading indications in respect of a number of characteristics of goods including their place of manufacture or production. Enforcement of the Act is a matter for local authority trading standards departments.

Written Answers to Questions

TRANSPORT

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Channon: The staff employed in the areas concerned, and their estimated budgeted salary and associated costs are

	Staff in post at 1 June 1987	Costs £ million
London and South East (including East Anglia)	4,961	106
South-West	1,018	22
Midlands	1,171	25
North	1,841	39
Total, England	8,991	192

The Department also employs 5,343 staff, at a cost of £114 million, in Scotland and Wales.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether there are currently any plans to extend the Docklands light railway to Thamesmead.

Mr. David Mitchell: At present LRT have no plans to extend the Docklands light railway to Thamesmead. The possibility of further extensions to the railway, including one to Thamesmead, is being considered in the context of a study of the future development of public transport in the Docklands, jointly commissioned by London Regional Transport and the London Docklands Development Corporation. We shall look closely at any proposals which emerge from this work.

East London River Crossing

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the inspector's report of the public inquiry into the east London river crossing.

Mr. Channon: Early in 1988.

Motorway Service Areas (Crime)

Mr. Raison asked the Secretary of State for Transport what evidence he has of the incidence and types of crime committed at motorway service areas.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No statistics are available of criminal offences committed at motorway service areas. The Department has not received any recent complaints about such offences. It would be for local police forces to respond to inquiries about offences at individual service areas. Police posts exist at most of them.

Cyclists

Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has any information about the incidence of injuries to pedestrians caused by cyclists riding on footpaths.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: No. The Stats 19 road accident report form does not identify incidences of cyclists riding on footpaths.

M1-A1 Link

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is in a position to report on the study undertaken to consider the road link from the M1 to A1 in the South Leeds area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to make an announcement during the autumn. This should end the present uncertainty.

Coach Safety

Mr. Butterfill asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he proposes to take to improve coach safety; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: New regulations, laid before Parliament today, will require all new single-decked coaches registered in Britain from 1 April 1990 to be built to a new European safety standard governing the strength of coach roofs to reduce the possibility of the roof collapsing in a roll-over accident.

From the same date, double-decked coaches will be required to be fitted with a means of escape in both halves of the upper deck. From 1 October 1988 seat belts will be required to be fitted on most front passenger seats and centre rear seats in coaches and to the front passenger seats of minibuses, ambulances and motor caravans. Seat belt anchorages will be required on the seats of heavy goods vehicles.

Drink-driving

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) disqualified excess alcohol offenders and (b) high risk offenders did not apply for a new driving licence within six months of the end of their disqualification period.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The information is not readily available.

Manchester Airport (Rail Link)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport when, pursuant to the answer of 29 June, Official Report, column 33, he expects a decision to be reached on the provision of a rail link to Manchester airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: I shall make a decision on the application for Government grant towards this project as soon as the necessary evaluations have been completed.

SCOTLAND

Sheep

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average size of sheep flocks in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The average size of the Scottish breeding ewe flock, as recorded at the June 1986 agricultural census, was 232 ewes. The average number of breeding ewes on full time specialist sheep farms in the less favoured areas was 969.

Lead Plumbing

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 36, why his Department does not hold information concerning properties with lead plumbing in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I assume the hon. Member is concerned with the health hazard arising from elevated levels of lead in drinking water. The presence of lead plumbing does not necessarily imply that the level of lead in the drinking water exceeds the current standard of 0·1mg/l laid down in the EC directive on the quality of water for human consumption. It is not clear that the considerable cost of surveys which would be required to collect fully comprehensive information of lead plumbing in Scotland would be justified. Water authorities are making good progress in reducing the plumbosolvency of water supplies by treatment processes or by pipe replacement as appropriate.

Loch Ness

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to who owns Loch Ness; and how the various rights in the loch are apportioned.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: At common law the solum of an inland loch in Scotland is owned by the riparian proprietors. There is nothing in the titles of the two estates which contain the major part of the shores of Loch Ness, Lovat estate and Foyers estate, to indicate any departure from the common law with respect to Loch Ness. The cost of a search to identify and examine the titles of all parties who might have an interest in the loch would be disproportionate to the results achieved. Such a search could not be guaranteed to be exhaustive because the land register of Scotland, which is map-based, has not yet been extended to the Highlands, and the Register of Sasines relies on verbal descriptions of land which are frequently not sufficiently detailed to permit accurate location of the land.

Salmon fishings can be owned separately from the land and held on a separate title. Other fishings cannot be separately owned, but can be let.

Loch Ness, of course, forms part of a navigable waterway and the rights of all parties having an interest in the loch are subject to rights of navigation.

Ballachulish Bridge

Sir Russell Johnston asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proportion of the capital cost of the Ballachulish bridge requires to be expended on regular maintenance; how frequently maintenance is required, and how this compares with the bridges at Kessock and Kylesku.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Over the last three years the equivalent of 5 per cent. of the capital cost of the bridge has been spent on maintenance work (involving surface treatment of the structure) but this is the first major outlay on the bridge since it was completed in 1975. As regards other bridges, Kessock bridge has had no significant expenditure on maintenance since opening in 1982; the Scottish Development Department does not hold information on the Kylesku bridge, which falls within the responsibility of Highland regional council.

Job Losses

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many closures have been reported in Renfrew, West and Inverclyde constituency in each year since 1979; and how many jobs have been involved.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Scottish Development Agency

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been spent by the Scottish Development Agency in each year since 1979 in Renfrew, West and Inverclyde constituency; and what proportion of all spending by the agency this figure represents.

Mr. Lang: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Lambs (Radiation)

Mr. Home Robertson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Dumfries on Tuesday 7 July, if he will list the areas and farms where his Department has identified elevated readings of radiation among lambs; and how many lambs are in the affected areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The order was made on 7 July designated three areas in Dumfries and Galloway region. These areas comprise seven farms in the parishes of Ruthwell, Kirkgunzeon and New Abbey. In all, about 6,000 sheep are affected. Testing continues in a few other hill areas to determine whether restrictions need to be introduced. Action will be taken as necessary to protect the consumer and the monitoring results will be published in full.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many are registered out of work at each benefit office in Renfrew West and Inverclyde constituency; and how many were registered out of work in June 1983.

Mr. Lang: The information is not readily available in the form requested. However, on 14 May 1987 (the latest date for which information is available) and 9 June 1983 the number of unemployed claimants in the Renfrew West and Inverclyde parliamentary constituency totalled 3,632 and 3,472 respectively. The figures are not comparable due to the changes which have taken place in the compilation of the statistics.

This information is available in the Library.

Rates

Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he intends to pursue action to reduce the rates of any Scottish local authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Rifkind: I am today laying before Parliament reports under section 5 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act 1966 setting out my proposals for reductions in the rates of Lothian regional council and Edinburgh district council of 3·9p and 2·8p respectively. Clackmannan district council has offered to reduce its rate by 1·8p and I have today written to the council accepting its proposal.

Oil Taxation

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what level of petroleum tax revenue is anticipated for the current financial year assuming that the present price of $19.20 for Brent crude is maintained; and how this figure compares with the previous financial year.

Mr. Lilley: North Sea tax revenues depend on other factors such as the exchange rate and oil production as well as on the dollar oil price. The sensitivity of oil revenue forecasts to various changes in the underlying assumptions is described in Chapter 6 of the "Financial Statement and Budget Report 1987-88." Total North Sea revenues in 1986-87 amounted to some £4.8 billion, and were forecast to be £3.9 billion in 1987-8 in the FSBR.

Urban Development Corporations

Sir Trevor Skeet asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if, as part of Her Majesty's Government policy to encourage the redevelopment of the inner cities, he proposes to extend to urban development corporations 100 per cent. allowances for corporation and income tax purposes for capital expenditure on industrial and commercial buildings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Privatisation (Shareholders)

Mrs. Elizabeth Peacock: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, what proprtion of shareholders now owning shares in companies privatised since 1979 are (a) current or (b) former employees of that company.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1987, c. 159]: In total, 430,000 employees have taken up shares when their companies have been privatised. Most have kept their shares.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Attorney-General what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activity; what is being done to identify and quantify these needs and to monitor implementation; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

The Attorney-General: The policies of the Lord Chancellor's Department are designed to meet the needs of men and women equally. The Department contributed to the "Review of the Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women" published by the Home Office on 29 April, a copy of which was placed in the Library, and especially to the section on Matrimonial and Family law. The only change since the review was drafted is that the Family Law Reform Bill mentioned in that section received the Royal Assent on 15 May. The Lord Chancellor and his officials consult regularly organisations with an interest in the work of the Department and are happy to hear from any organisation representing women. Equal opportunities, including those for women are discussed on management and other staff training courses including the panel interview and selection interviewing courses.

My own Department, the Law Officers' Department, has no policy making functions.

Persons in Custody

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General what proposals he has to instruct the legal aid authorities to ensure that persons detained in custody and transferred from their local remand prison are entitled to be visited by their solicitors and advisers so that their cases can be prepared for trial.

The Attorney-General: I am not aware of any problems concerning legal aid for solicitors to visit clients transferred away from their local remand prison. If the hon. Gentleman has a particular case in mind he should write to the Lord Chancellor.

Hon. Member for Torbay

Mr. Hind asked the Attorney-General when he expects to make a decision on the possible prosecution of the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) in relation to his alleged possession of certain security documents.

The Attorney-General: This matter has been invetigated by the police. The Director of Public prosecutions has now decide that the investigation has not disclosed evidence justifying the bringing of proceedings. The Director has consulted me and I have agreed with his decision.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

School Buildings and Education Standards

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assessment his Department has made of possible links between lack of maintenance and inadequate school buildings and education standards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: Many factors influence the standards attained in schools and there is no means of identifying the contribution made by any one alone. It is for LEAs to ensure that schools provide an appropriate physical environment for teaching and learning.

EC Nationals (Further and Higher Education)

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many United Kingdom further education places with free tuition are currently filled by European Community nationals.

Mr. Jackson: Under arrangements announced in Parliament on 1 July 1986, students from European Community (EC) countries attending courses designated for mandatory awards purposes in the United Kingdom are eligible to have their course fees reimbursed by the Government, if they satisfy conditions for eligibility corresponding to those which apply for United Kingdom students. Interim figures for the academic year 1986-87, the first year to which these arrangements apply, indicate that about 3,100 EC students at United Kingdom institutions have had their fees reimbursed.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) which European Community countries offer free tuition in higher education for members of other European Community countries;

(2) which European Community countries levy charges for fees for higher education students coming from other European Community countries.

Mr. Jackson: Drawing on the available information, my understanding of the situation in each member state is as follows:

Belgium
Fees are charged at the "home rate".
Denmark
No fees are charged.
France
All students pay a small subsidised fee plus some local fees relating to institution or subject of study. In addition, a social services contribution may be required.
Federal Republic of Germany
Students may have to pay a social services contribution.
Greece
No fees are charged.
Irish Republic
Fees are charged at the "home rate".
Italy
Fees are charged at the "home rate".
Luxembourg
Only one higher education institution levies a charge, for registration.
Netherlands
No charge is made for tuition but students may be liable for registration and examination fees.
Portugal
No charge is made for tuition or examination but a registration fee may be levied.
Spain
All students must pay a registration fee and may also be liable for tuition fees.
United Kingdom
Fees are reimbursed subject to satisfaction of eligibility conditions.

Consultative Committee on the Curriculum

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to increase the number of women members, from seven out of the total membership of 29, on his principal advisory body on the school curriculum, the consultative committee on the curriculum.

Mrs. Rumbold: This is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Three to five-year-olds

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of (a) three-year olds, (b) four-year olds and (c) rising five-year olds included in official calculations of the number of three to five-year-olds in education who attend primary school classes, in contrast to attending nursery schools specifically designed and staffed for the particular needs of three-to-five-year olds.

Mr. Dunn: The number of three-year-olds, four-year-olds and rising five-year-olds who attended maintained nursery schools, and nursery classes and infant classes in primary schools in England in January 1986 was as follows:

Pupils age[1]	Nursery Schools	Primary Schools
		Nursery Classes	Infant Classes
Three	33,376	155,960	2,350
Four[2]	8,777	48,780	233,517
Rising five[3]	48	1,153	192,376

[1] Full and part-time pupils. Ages at 31 August 1985.
[2] Excludes rising fives. (See note 3).
[3] Pupils aged four at 31 August 1985 who became five by 31 December 1985 and were, therefore of compulsory school age on the day of the census count in January 1986.

State Schools (Pupil Statistics)

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of children under the age of 16 years are educated in state schools.

Mr. Dunn: The proportion of children under the age of 16 who were educated in maintained schools in England in January 1986 was 94 per cent.

Polytechnics

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for changing the membership of governing bodies of polytechnics.

Mr. Jackson: We plan to re-establish polytechnics and other maintained colleges predominantly concerned with higher education as corporate bodies. The Boards of Governors will assume wide powers to determine the affairs of the institution. The membership of the boards will reflect the institutions' new status and the governors' new role. There will be a strong voice for employers and other lay representatives. We have sought views on the detailed composition of the Boards and are considering responses.

Undergraduates

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many students from Wales are at present studying as undergraduates at universities in England; and what proportion of all students from Wales studying as undergraduates in universities they represent.

Mr. Jackson: In 1985, there were 6,200 full-time students from Wales studying as undergraduates at universities in England. This represents 57 per cent. of all University undergraduates from Wales in Great Britain.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many students from Wales are studying as undergraduates in each of the constituent colleges of the University of Wales; and what proportion of the undergraduate students at each college they represent; (2) how many students from Scotland are studying as undergraduates in each of the Scottish universities; and what proportion of all undergraduates, at each university, they represent.

Mr. Jackson: The information is as follows:

Full-time undergraduates from Scotland at universities in Scotland, 1985

	Total	As per cent. of all undergraduates at each university
Aberdeen	3,700	76
Dundee	1,600	56
Edinburgh	5,100	59
Glasgow	7,900	86
Heriot-Watt	1,900	66
St. Andrews	1,100	34
Stirling	1,300	60
Strathclyde	5,300	86
Total Scotland	28,000	70

Full-time undergraduates from Wales at university colleges in Wales, 1985

	Total	As per cent. of all undergraduates at each university
Aberystwyth	700	29
Bangor	500	22
Cardiff	1,400	31
St. David's Lampeter	100	18
Swansea	700	20
University of Wales College of Medicine	300	46
University of Wales Institute of Science and Technology	500	22
Total Wales	4,500	28

Academic Posts

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) if he will state the total number of full-time staffed academic posts at each university in England; and if he will give the corresponding figures for each year since 1977-78;

(2) if he will state the total number of full-time staffed academic posts at each of the colleges of the University of Wales; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1977-78.

Mr. Jackson: The following table gives the numbers of full-time academic staff.

Total full time academic staff

Legislation (Green Papers)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out his timetable for consultation on his proposed Education Bill and education Green Papers.

Mrs. Rumbold: Consultation has already taken place on the proposed Universities Funding Council and the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council, which were announced in the White Paper "Higher Education: Meeting the Challenge" (Cm 114). Consultation papers have been issued this week on the arrangements for collective worship and on the Governmant's proposals for more open enrolement. Copies are available in the Library. Further consultation papers will be issued over the coming weeks on financial delegation to schools, grant-maintained schools, the national curriculum, the Government's proposals to allow inner London boroughs to take onthe responsibilities of local education authorities, and in due course probably certain other issues. Like those already issued, these further papers will seek comments by the early autumn. The Government also intend to publish a Green Paper on the structure of new permanent machinery for determining schoolteachers' pay and conditions, and to enter into detailed discussions with interested parties later in the year.

Special Educational Needs

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is his response to the recommendation that a national committee on special educational needs be established, made in the third report of the House of Commons Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts on "Special Educational Needs: Implementation of the Education Act 1981," HC201; 1986-87

Mr. Dunn: We are giving careful consideration to all the recommendations of the Select Committee report on special education needs. I do not wish to anticipate the response which my right hon. Friend will be making to the Committee later in the year.

National Curriculum

Mr. Ken Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he intends to set up working groups to recommend attainment targets and programmes of study for mathematics and science, within the framework of the Government's proposals for a national curriculum.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: I am grateful to Professor Roger Blin-Stoyle FRS for agreeing to take the chair of the mathematics working group; and to Professor Jeff Thompson for agreeing to take the chair of the science working group. Each group will have a small membership composed largely of professionals: head teachers, teachers, teacher trainers, academics, experts in assessment and Local Education Authority advisers. The groups will also have members from LEA administration and from the world of business.

The groups will advise, in their respective fields, on the knowledge, skills, understanding and aptitudes which pupils should be expected to have acquired at specific ages, taking account of differences in ability. The groups will also advise on the essential content which should be covered to enable pupils to reach agreed attainment targets.

The groups will start work immediately. I am asking them to give me interim advice within four months and their final advice within 12 months. My Department will be announcing details of the groups' formal terms of reference and membership later today, and copies of these will be placed in the Library.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lebanon (UNIFIL)

Mr. Temple-Morris asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the renewal by the United Nations of the UNIFIL mandate in the Lebanon as well as the implementation of United Nations resolution 425.

Mr. Mellor: We fully support UNIFIL and deplore its continued inability to carry out its full mandate. We should be prepared to consider sympathetically a proposal to renew its mandate, which expires on 31 July.

Departmental Manpower

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total number of persons in his Department for each year since 1984 (a) at home and (b) abroad.

Mr. Eggar: The provision for staff employed (at home and abroad) by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office (including the Overseas Development Administration) for each year since 1984 is as follows:

	Home	Abroad	Total
1984	7409	2802	10,211
1985	7109	2810	9,919
1986	7014	2716	9,730
1987	7070	2823	9,893

The provision for staff employed overseas in a locally engaged capacity is:

	Number
1984	6927
1985	6855
1986	6837
1987	7074

Departmental Computers

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) to which firms his Department has awarded contracts for computer hardware for each year since 1984; and what was the value of each contract;

(2) what his Department has spent on (a) computer hardware and (b) computer software for each year since 1984; and what is the projected expenditure for 1987.

Mr. Eggar: For reasons of commercial confidentiality, details of individual contracts cannot be given. However, total annual expenditure for financial years 1984-1985 to 1986-1987, and companies to whom contracts for hardware have been awarded, are shown in the attached tables, plus projected expenditure for 1987-1988.

Separate figures for hardware and software are not available.

Separate figures are given for purchase and maintenance of hardware and software.

The figures include expenditure by both the Diplomatic and Aid Wings of the FCO.

1984-85

Purchase of hardware and software: £2,530,624
Maintenance of hardware and software: £703,781

Peter Wright (Memoirs)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why, pursuant to his answer of 3 July, Official Report, column 189, his discussions with the United States on the publication of Peter Wright's memoirs are confidential.

Mr. Mellor: My anwer of 3 July related to discussions with other Governments generally. It is an essential principle of Government-to-Government exchanges that their confidentiality should be preserved.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Women

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department has made any provisions for the participation of local women in the preparation, implementation or evaluation of aid projects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Yes. ODA staff work on the basis of guidance designed to ensure that the scope for local women to participate in aid-funded projects is fully considered. I will send a copy of this guidance to the hon. Member.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ensure equal participation of women in all aspects of his Department's aid programme; if he will list the ways in which they are employed; how many women are involved in the programme; what percentage they are of the programme's work force; if he will assess whether the appraisal, monitoring and evaluations of his Department's programme have fully taken women into account; and if he will list the relevant reports and their dates in the Official Report.

Mr. Chris Patten: It is our policy to aim at equal opportunities for women's participation in the aid programme. We recognise the importance of taking women fully into account in all aid projects as both agents and beneficiaries of development. We wish to increase the involvement of women's groups in shaping and implementing change in developing countries and to see more women trained under the aid programme.

Figures are not available on the number of local women involved in projects and programmes financed by the aid programme. As a member of the DAC expert group on women and development we are considering how best to devise standard statistics for measuring women's participation. Of the ODA's own staff, 640 (42 per cent.) are women. Women also participate in the aid programme as technical co-operation officers, supplementees, associate professional officers, volunteers serving overseas and consultants. Gender differentiated statistics are available for the first four categories. At the end of 1986, 85 (4·81 per cent.) of technical co-operation officers and supplementees were women. Currently 20 (31 per cent.) of associate professional officers and 508 (48 per cent.) of VSOs are women. Women are also engaged in ODA-funded research. All major projects are assessed for their impact on women. We are currently seeking to improve our appraisal techniques to give fuller consideration to gender and we require evaluation studies to take account of the impact on women. In consultation with other members of the development assistance committee of the OECD we are continuing with further work to improve evaluation in this regard. A list of appraisal, monitoring and evaluation reports could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

ENERGY

Energy Prices

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his Department's current projections on energy prices.

Mr. Parkinson: Given the uncertainties associated with energy price projections, the Government's approach is to continue taking measures to stimulate competition and encourage efficiency. These measures, along with international market forces, have contributed to the fall in energy prices in real terms over recent years and offer the best chance of securing competitive and stable prices in the future.

Magnox Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether his Department has carried out studies into the efficiency of the filtration system for gaseous discharges from magnox nuclear reactors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy which magnox nuclear reactors have experienced pin loading problems and on which occasions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is an operational matter and falls within the responsibilities of the CEGB and BNFL. I have asked the respective chairmen to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy on which occasions since 1979 radioactive carbon dioxide has been discharged through leakage at Trawsfynydd magnox nuclear power station; what volumes were involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have asked the chairman of the CEGB to write to the hon. Member.

Power Stations (Cooling Ponds)

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy what methods are used to measure the activity in cooling ponds of (a) magnox nuclear power stations generally and (b) Trawsfynydd station.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have asked the chairman of the CEGB to write to the hon. Member.

Spent Nuclear Fuel

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will publish a table of the annual amount of spent nuclear fuel dispatches, by date and amount, for each year since 1979, including the first half of 1987 for the Trawsfynydd magnox nuclear station; and which local emergency planning authorities in Wales are given prior notice of spent fuel consignments transported through their area of responsibility from both the Trawsfynydd and Wylfa nuclear plants.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Plutonium

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) when he expects to be able to begin the publication of full information on civil plutonium production in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement;

(2) with whom his Department has held discussions on the publication of records relating to future plutonium production from United Kingdom civil nuclear reactors; and on what occasions such discussions have taken place.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Discussion are continuing, and I will make an announcement in due course.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy who is responsible to his Department for (a) information on the production of plutonium for defence purposes, (b) the safe operation of Calder Hall and Chapel Cross magnox nuclear reactors, (c) the safety of operation of the Sellafield nuclear complex and (d) the decommissioning of the Windscale piles at the Sellafield complex.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The supply of all materials for defence purposes is the responsibility of the Ministry of Defence. The safe operation of nuclear installations in the United Kingdom is the responsibility of the operator: BNFL, in the case of Calder Hall, Chapelcross and Sellafield. The responsibility for enforcing the licence conditions attached to those sites rests with the independent Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of the Health and Safety Executive.

The decommissioning of the Windscale piles will be undertaken by the UKAEA.

EMPLOYMENT

Community Programme

Ms Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for Employment why, and by how much, the budget for the community programme has been reduced; to what programmes the funds thus saved have been diverted; and what are his proposals for the future of the community programme.

Mr. Lee: We are providing £1,045 million for the community programme in 1987-88, broadly the same level of resources as last year. This will enable us to provide opportunities for 300,000 people over the year, the same as in 1986-87. As was announced in the House on 30 June we plan to improve the community programme in a number of ways. We intend that it should be full-time and that participants receive a premium over their benefit entitlement. This will make the programme much more attractive to unemployed people with family commitments. We also propose to enhance significantly the training and job search content of the programme.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Employment how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Chope: The number of established civil servants employed on 1 June 1987 in the Department of Employment group in the regions requested are:

	Number
(a) London and the South East	14,621
(b) South West	4,189
(c) Midlands	9,329
(d) North of England	12,653

Additionally there are nationally 300 civil servants working for the MSC's professional and executive recruitment service who cannot be allocated to regions. Because departmental boundaries are not always conterminous with standard regions, these figures are only approximate.

It is not possible to allocate Departmental expenditure by region by total national expenditure for 1987-88 is expected to be £4.141 million.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment when he expects the complete list of those bodies and organisations which have been contracted as managing agents for the job training scheme in each Manpower Services Commission area to be available; and if he will publish it in the Official Report.

Mr. Cope: The Manpower Services Commission is producing a directory of managing agents contracted to deliver the new job training scheme within the next few days.

I will send a copy of the directory to the hon. Member as soon as it is available, and a copy of it will be placed in the Library.

Wages Inspectorate

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he has any plans to decrease the strength of the wages inspectorate.

Mr. Nicholls: No.

European Social Fund

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total allocation from the European social fund to the United Kingdom in the current financial year; and how much the 20 per cent. reduction is in cash terms, on voluntary organisations.

Mr. Cope: The United Kingdom has been allocated £435 million from the European social fund in respect of operations beginning in 1987.

The total amount of the linear reduction of 20 per cent. on voluntary sector applications for projects for over 25-year-olds, is some £1·1 million.

The linear reduction on similar applications from other organisations is 50 per cent.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the linear reductions in the European social fund and the implications for voluntary sector schemes.

Mr. Cope: The European Commission has, this year, had to impose a sizeable linear reduction on applications to that part of the European social fund that is allocated to adult projects. The overall reduction that the Commission has imposed on the adult budget for adult projects is just under 50 per cent. The Government decided this year to impose a reduction of 20 per cent. on applications from the voluntary sector. Other organisations are bearing a reduction of 50 per cent.

The Commission also imposed a linear reduction of 0·5 per cent. on the budget for applications in respect of young people under 25, and this is being borne by all organisations.

House Building, Slaley, Northumberland

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions he has had with the English Tourist Board about its proposal to grant-aid to the amount of £500,000 a development scheme at Slaley in Northumberland involving the building of 65 houses in the green belt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: The English tourist board is currently discussing with my Department and the Treasury a proposal to offer grant assistance to aid the construction of a hotel with conference, golf and leisure facilities at Slaley hall. The developers are also in the process of seeking planning permission from the local authority to build residential houses on part of the estate.

PRIME MINISTER

Nicaragua and Afghanistan

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister, pursuant to her answer of 6 July, Official Report column 3, on what evidence she based her statement concerning the level of understanding of the public about the difference between the repective situations in Nicaragua and Afghanistan as they affect Her Majesty's Government's policy towards those countries; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: My statement was based on views expressed to me in many individual contacts.

WALES

Salmon and Sea Trout (Poaching)

Mrs. Golding asked the Secretary of State for Wales what success he has had in eliminating the organised poaching of salmon and sea trout; what further measures he intends to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply given to her today by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

National Museum of Wales

Mr. Faulds asked the Secretary of State for Wales what instructions have been given by his Department to the national museum of Wales about the circumstances in which permission should be sought from his Department to raise funds voted for museum purposes.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: I will reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Schools (Surplus Places)

Mr. Nicholas Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the estimated number of surplus places in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools in each Welsh county at the latest available date: and what is the estimated cost of these places in each Welsh county.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Up-to-date figures for the number of surplus places in individual counties are not available: the Department will be writing shortly to the counties to seek current information. The latest available estimate for Wales as a whole—based on pupil numbers at January 1986 and school places at January 1984—is that there are 87,000 surplus places in primary schools and 32,000 in secondary schools. The estimated cost is £10.4 million for primary places and £6.4 million for secondary.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many civil servants are employed in his Department; and what is its budgeted expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Peter Walker: At 1 July 1987 there were 2,239·5 staff in post; details of the budgeted expenditure for my Department are set out in the Supply Estimates 1987-88 booklet class XVII vote 9.

Sheep

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total amount paid under the sheep variable premium to farmers in Wales in each year since the inception of the scheme.

Mr. Peter Walker: Payments to producers in Wales under the sheep variable premium schemes are as follows:

Marketing Year	£ million
1980-81	7.5
1981-82	12.6
1982-83	25.0
1983-84	30.3
1984-85	21.4
1985-86	21.0
1986-87	22.8

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many agricultural holdings in each county in Wales engage in sheep rearing; and what proportion of the total number of holdings in each country each number represents.

Mr. Peter Walker: The number of holdings in each county in June 1986 with breeding ewes, and the proportions of the total number of holdings in each county that these represent are shown in the following table:

	Holdings with breeding sheep June 1986	Percentage of all holdings June 1986
Clwyd	2,192	56.7
Dyfed	4,582	40.2

	Holdings with breeding sheep June 1986	Percentage of all holdings June 1986
Gwent	1,094	50·5
Gwynedd	3,215	66·3
Mid Glamorgan	507	54·0
Powys	4,395	82·5
South Glamorgan	181	36·1
West Glamorgan	342	39·0

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many Welsh agricultural holdings have a sheep enterprise on the farm; and what proportion of the total number of holdings this represents.

Mr. Peter Walker: There were 16,900 holdings with sheep in Wales in June 1986, of which 16,500 had breeding sheep. These numbers represented 56 per cent. and 55 per cent. of all holdings in Wales respectively.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people are directly employed in sheep farming in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: It is not possible to quantify the number of persons employed solely in sheep farming in Wales. However, in June 1986, 39,800 people were employed on holdings which contained breeding sheep.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average size of sheep flocks in Wales.

Mr. Peter Walker: The size of the average sheep flock in Wales in June 1986 was 274 breeding ewes.

Agricultural Output

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the gross output of Welsh agriculture in the last year for which figures are available; and what proportion of the total was contributed by the sheep sector.

Mr. Peter Walker: Based on provisional figures, the gross output of Welsh agriculture in 1986 was £786·3 million: of which sheep and wool accounted for 18·8 per cent.

Agricultural Areas

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many agricultural holdings in areas designated as (a) marginal and (b) hill areas engaged in sheep rearing; and what proportion of the total number of holdings in such areas in Wales these numbers represent.

Mr. Peter Walker: The number of holdings in June 1986 with breeding ewes in areas classified as "severely disadvantaged" (which is closely synonymous with the hill and upland areas) was 10,390 or 74·4 per cent. of all holdings in those areas. The number of holdings in June 1986 with breeding ewes in areas classified as disadvantaged (which is closely synonymous with marginal land) was 3,111 or 54·6 per cent. of all holdings in disadvantaged areas.

Planning Appeals

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales on how many occasions planning permission has been granted for residential housing developments on appeal to his Department, in each district authority area in Wales, in each year since 1979; and, in each case, how many housing units were involved.

Mr. Grist: This information is not available centrally.

Lead Plumbing

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate the numbers of dwellings with lead plumbing by county and district in Wales.

Mr. Ian Grist: Informaton is not available on a district basis, but the Welsh house condition survey for 1981 estimated the numbers of dwellings with lead plumbing for each county in Wales as follows:

	Number
Clwyd	33,200
Dyfed	20,700
Gwent	42,600
Gwynedd	21,700
Mid Glamorgan	64,600
Powys	4,900
South Glamorgan	62,100
West Glamorgan	44,100

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales, pursuant to his answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 3, if he will provide further details of the Welsh water authority's programme to improve the quality of water in Wales with regard to lead content.

Mr. Grist: The details of the Welsh water authority's programme to reduce the lead content in drinking water is a matter for that authority. I have asked the chairman to write to you the hon. Member.

ENVIRONMENT

Water Industry

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effect the privatisation of the water industry will have on areas of natural beauty, on recreation on and by water, on bird-watching, on rambling and on other recreational activities.

Mr. Moynihan: Last year the Government published proposals to strengthen, at the time of privatisation, the statutory framework for protecting and enhancing the water environment. These include the retention of statutory duties towards nature conservation, access, recreation and amenity, the introduction of statutory river quality objectives, a policy for protection zones and the preparation of a statutory code of practice. Proposals for the establishment of a national rivers authority which will have an important role in this field, will be published in the near future.

South Africa (Sporting Links)

Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will press for the new select committee of the International Cricket Conference to introduce a test ban for players with sporting links with South Africa, in line with the principles of the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Moynihan: The possible introduction of a test ban for players with sporting links with South Africa is a matter for the Test and County Cricket Board and the International Cricket Conference. Both bodies are aware that the Government are fully committed to the Gleneagles agreement and take all practical steps to discourage sporting links with South Africa.

Olympic Games

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent discussions he has had with sporting authorities regarding the Olympic Games.

Mr. Moynihan: There have been no recent formal discussions but the Department and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office liaise regularly with the British Olympic Association about the winter and summer Olympic Games.

Rural Development Areas (Grants)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list (a) the Government support programmes or finance available to rural development areas and (b) the basic services that his Department treats as necessary for assessing grants to rural development areas.

Mr. Moynihan: (a) Government support and finance specifically available in rural development areas is channelled through the Development Commission which provides the following main programmes of support:

1. 100 per cent. financed advance factory building programme;
2. 50 per cent. financed factory building programme in partnership with local authorities;
3. 25 per cent. grants to the private sector for redundant building conversions;
4. technical, managerial and business advice to small firms and the provision of loans;
5. grants to help the establishment of local enterprise agencies;
6. grant aid for rural tourism projects;
7. grant aid towards special projects where there are clear employment benefits;
8. grants towards community development projects.

In addition grants offered by other bodies may be available in rural development areas.

(b) Requests for grants are considered on their merits through the rural development programmes which are drawn up for each rural development area.

Water Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the water boards and their ancillary companies which will be privatised.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government propose to transfer the water supply and sewerage responsibilities of the 10 existing water authorities in England and Wales to new public limited companies, which will be then be offered for sale.

Water Table, Birmingham

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about the effects on industry and housing of the rise in the water table in the Birmingham area.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is aware that there has been a significant rise in Birmingham's water table over the last few years as the extraction rate has declined. The effects of this appear, however, to be very localised and remedial action is being taken by those affected as necessary.

Council House Sales

Mr Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the reasons for delay in the purchase by Mrs. G. C. Mells of her council home at 6 Steen Way, East Dulwich Grove, S.E.22; and when he now expects Southwark council to complete the transaction.

Mr. Waldegrave: I understand that the purchase is held up pending a survey of the building. I am concerned over the delays suffered by tenants of Southwark borough council in exercising their right to buy and await the council's proposals for improving its performance.

Canary Wharf

Ms. Gordon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total amount of public funds (a) committed and (b) spent to date on or in connection with the proposed Canary wharf development, broken down by category of expenditure.

Mr. Trippier: I shall answer this question shortly.

Housing Associations

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing associations are operating in the area of (a) the Normanton constituency and (b) the Wakefield district council; and if he will list the names of the housing associations concerned.

Mr. Waldegrave: Anchor housing association and Castle Gate housing society operate in the Normanton consituency; the following 21 associations operate in the area of Wakefield district council:

Ackworth Almshouse, Anchor Housing Association, Bradford and Northern Housing Association, Castle Gate Housing Society, Charlesworth Charity, Church Housing Association, Consolidated Charities, Ebor Housing Association, Freeston and Sagars' Almshouse, Habinteg Housing Association, Harrisons Almshouse, Headrow Housing Group, Jephson Housing Association, Leeds and Yorkshire Housing Association, Major Barker's Homes, North British Housing Association, Northern Counties Housing Association, Royal British Legion, Stonham Housing Association, West Yorkshire Housing Association, Yorkshire Metropolitan Housing Association.

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many dwellings are operated by housing associations in the Normanton constituency; and if he will break down the number into categories and type of dwellings.

Mr. Waldegrave: I shall answer this question shortly.

Parrots

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to support the Uruguayan proposal for a complete suspension of international commerce in wild-caught parrots for the pet trade at the forthcoming convention on international trade in endangered species in Ottawa; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) on 9 July 1987.

House Building, Slaley, Northumberland

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Development Commission about the Development Commission's offer to grant-aid to the amount of £300,000 a development scheme at Slaley in Northumberland involving the building of 65 houses in the green belt; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Development Commission has received an application for grant aid for a development at Slaley in Northumberland. It has consulted the Department which is considering the proposal.

Rating Reform

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what impact the proposed community charge will have on those parish councils which have large industrial plants in their areas;

(2) what is the number of parish councils likely to be affected by loss of revenue as a result of the introduction of the community charge; and how many people live in these parishes in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Howard: Under the new local government finance system, parish councils will finance their expenditure by a precept on the community charge, levied as an equal amount per parish resident. Like other local authorities parish councils will cease to levy a variable non-domestic rate; instead, non-domestic rates will be levied at a uniform poundage, and pooled and redistributed as an equal amount per adult. This, together with central grant, will go towards reducing the cost to residents of the services provided by all tiers of local government, including parish councils.

Parish councils will neither gain nor lose from these arrangements. They will remain free to raise their income by precept on the rating authority. However, I remain ready to discuss particular problems with representatives of the National Association of Local Councils if they wish.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his reply of 29 June, Official Report, column 44, he will provide the averages for counties and standard regions of the figures contained in columns 1 to 7 of the tables placed in the Library relating to the community charge.

Mr. Ridley [pursuant to his reply, 29 June 1987]: I have today placed in the Library weighted average figures for counties and standard regions exemplifying community charges and non-domestic rates had the Government's proposals for the reform of local finance been fully in place in 1987-88.

I must repeat the warning given in my reply of 29 June that these figures are not a prediction of community charges. They are merely illustrative figures and should be treated as such.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assess the likely cost to Leeds city council of collecting a community charge as opposed to domestic rates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I shall answer this question shortly.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Salmon and Sea Trout

Mrs. Golding asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what success he has had in eliminating the organised poaching of salmon and sea trout; what further measures he intends to take; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Regulating fishing, and combating poaching, for salmon and migratory trout is the responsibility of the water authorities in England and Wales, working within the framework of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1975. In 1986, the authorities mounted a total of 781 prosecutions for offences concerning salmon and migratory trout. The water authorities' powers were strengthened this year by the coming into force of the Salmon Act 1986.

In order to combat trade in illegally caught fish it has been made an offence under the 1986 Act for a person to handle salmon or sea trout where he believes, or it would be reasonable for him to suspect, that the fish were caught illegally. Provision was made for the establishment of licensing schemes to regulate dealing in salmon and migratory trout and a licensing scheme is being developed and will be submitted for Parliamentary approval of the necessary order when consultations have been completed with affected interests. The 1986 Act also increased the penalties for illegal fishing.

When these new measures have been in force long enough to permit an assessment of their impact, it is the intention of Fisheries Ministers to invite the Salmon Advisory Committee to examine their effectiveness.

Sheep

Mr. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the gross output of the agriculture industry in each of the English regions in the last year for which figures are available was contributed by the sheep sector.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Based on provisional estimates of regional gross output in 1984, the latest year for which data are available, the proportion of gross agricultural output contributed by sheep and lambs was as follows:

Statistical region	Percentage
Northern	9·5
Yorkshire and Humberside	3·3
East Midlands	2·2
East Anglia	0·5
South East	1·7
South West	3·2
West Midlands	4·0
North West	2·3

These data exclude sheep premium and HLCA payments and returns from wool.

Mr. Thomas asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the average size of sheep flocks in each of the English regions and in England as a whole.

Mr. Donald Thompson: At June 1986, the average breeding flock sizes were as follows:

Average size of breeding flock

Statistical region
Northern	269
Yorkshire and Humberside	167
East Midlands	155
East Anglia	112
South East	171
South West	155
West Midlands	153
North West	132
England	174

HOME DEPARTMENT

Entry Visas

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have applied for visas to enter the United Kingdom from Sri Lanka in each of the last three years; how many were (a) refugees and asylum seekers, (b) for settlement and (c) as visitors; and how many applications in each category have been (i) granted, (ii) refused and (iii) are still being considered.

Mr. Renton: The information requested which is available centrally is given in the following table.

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Sri Lankan citizens have applied for visas to enter the United Kingdom from third world countries in each of the last three years; how many were (a) refugees and asylum seekers, (b) for settlement and (c) as visitors; and how many applications in each category have been (i) granted, (ii) refused and (iii) are still being considered.

Mr. Renton: I regret that the information requested is not available.

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons have applied for (a) single and (b) multiple entry visas to visit the United Kingdom from (i) Ghana, (ii) Nigeria, (iii) Bangladesh, (iv) India and (v) Pakistan since visas were introduced for those countries; and how many applications (1) have been refused and (2) are still being considered.

Mr. Renton: The information requested which is available centrally is given in the following table.

Refuge and Asylum Requests

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have applied for refugee and asylum status in the last 12 months at (a) British ports and (b) British posts overseas; from which countries these people came; and how many such applications were (i) granted, (ii) refused and (iii) given exceptional leave to remain.

Mr. Renton: The following table shows, for applications made in 1986 at United Kingdom ports or at diplomatic posts overseas, the nationality of the applicant and the outcome of the case where a decision has now been made.

Settlement Applications

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many outstanding applications for settlement there are at the present time; from which countries; and how many relate to (a) husbands, (b) wives (c) dependent children and (d) dependent parents.

Mr. Renton: The information which is available centrally relates only to the Indian subcontinent and is given in the following table.

Applications for settlement[1] awaiting a decision at 31 March 1987

Entry Applications

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people in the United Kingdom here before 1973 have applied for their spouses and children to join them; and how many applications have been (a) granted, (b) refused and (c) are still being considered;

(2) what are the countries of origin of all those people settled in the United Kingdom before 1973 who have applied to be joined by their spouses and children;

(3) how many persons settled in the United Kingdom before 1973 have outstanding applications for (a) their spouses and (b) their children to join them here; and what is his estimate of the number who cannot provide accommodation and means of support for them.

(4) how many persons settled in the United Kingdom before 1973 are entitled to be joined here by their spouses and children.

Mr. Renton: The available information relates to entry clearance applications granted and refused in the Indian subcontinent to wives and children of Commonwealth citizens (including British citizens) who were settled in the United Kingdom on 1 January 1973, ie persons covered by section 1(5) of the Immigration Act 1971, and is given in the following table. Such wives and children do not need to satisfy the maintenance and accommodation requirements of the immigration rules.

Split Families

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many families are split because wives domiciled in Britain are awaiting permission for their husbands to join them; and what are average waiting times;

(2) how many families are split because wives are awaiting entry permits to join their husbands in Britain; and if he will give details of waiting times.

Mr. Renton: Information is available only for persons in the Indian subcontinent applying for entry to the United Kingdom. At 31 March 1987, 5,110 wives in the subcontinent were awaiting a decision on their application for an entry clearance to, or a certificate of entitlement to the right of abode in, the United Kingdom. The corresponding number of husbands in the subcontinent awaiting a decision on their application for an entry clearance and information on waiting times to first interview are given in tables 9 and 10 respectively of the Home Office Statistical Bulleting "Control of Immigration: Statistics — First Quarter 1987" (Issue 14/87).

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north-east of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Hurd: At 1 June 1987 the following numbers of staff were employed in the prison department regions of the Home Office:

Region	Number
South-East	9,982·5
South-West	4,677
Midlands	5,613
North	7,888

The other Home Office staff in post on that date in England and Wales are not organised in comparable regions, but were located broadly as follows:

Region	Number
London/South-East	6,513
South-West	812
Midlands	718
North	1,230

Financial provision for the four prison department regions in the current financial year is set out in the Supply Estimates for 1987-88 (class XI, vote 2). Other Home Office expenditure is not broken down by regions.

Amusement Arcades

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from chief constables of police forces about the operation of amusement arcades; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Police forces have made some comments on this subject from time to time in recent years but have recognised that they have not been in a position to provide hard evidence of a problem requiring a change in the law. However, we have asked the Association of Chief Police Officers to provide information about their experience of amusement arcades as part of our review of the adequacy of the law.

Electoral Register

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what evidence is available to him on the basis of the recent general election of the extent of non-inclusion of eligible voters on the electoral register: and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: While we do know from correspondence and inquiries that some electors were unable to vote at the last general election because they were incorrectly omitted from the register we cannot provide an estimate of the number involved. We recently commissioned a survey into the effectiveness of electoral registration procedures, the report of which was published on 2 April, and we are now examining its findings and recommendations. In the meantime, we have reminded electoral registration officers of the need to review their procedures for compiling the register.

Queen's Speech

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about proposals in the Queen's Speech for which he has responsibility; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I have no doubt that the proposals in the Queen's Speech for which I am responsible are broadly welcomed by most people. The proposal to introduce legislation to give greater flexibility in licensing hours has been criticised in some letters received in my Department and supported in others.

Excess Alcohol (Convictions)

Mr. Sheerman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, how many excess alcohol convictions were recorded during the last three years; what percentage were high risk offences; what percentage were over 150 mg per cent.; what percentage were over 200 mg per cent.; and what percentage were second offences.

Mr. John Patten: The available information relates to findings of guilt for offences of driving and so on with alcohol above the prescribed limit and is published annually in "Offences Relating to Motor Vehicles, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables" (Table 15 of the issue for 1985). Information on level of alcohol is not always readily available to those collecting details of court proceedings for the Home Office and this will affect the accuracy of the figures; as from 1 January 1987, information on alcohol level is no longer being collected. Information on repeated convictions for drink driving offences is not available.

Prisons

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons he estimates will be detained in Her Majesty's prisons in England and Wales on (a) 31 July and (b) 31 August.

Mr. John Patten: Changes in the prison population vary considerably from month to month and it is not our practice to publish short-term projections which may quickly become out of date. On 3 July the population in custody including those held in police cells was 50,969.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proposals he has to deal with overcrowding in the prison system in the immediate future;

(2) if he proposes to use his powers of executive release to reduce prison overcrowding; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if, as measures to reduce prison overcrowding, he has any proposals to use (a) disused army camps and (b) former police stations;

(4) if he has any proposals to recruit further prison offices on (a) a permanent and (b) a temporary basis to deal with overcrowding.

Mr. John Patten: We are keeping the position under close and continuous review.

Remands in Custody

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many prisoners were on remand in custody awaiting trial on 30 June;

(2) how many of those remanded in custody awaiting trial on 30 June were held in (a) prisons, (b) police stations and (c) other places in (i) London and (ii) elsewhere in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: Complete figures for 30 June are not yet available but the number of untried prisoners in prison custody in England and Wales on 31 May was 9,283 of which 1,946 were held in London.

The number of prisoners (most of whom are likely to have been untried) held in police and court cells in England and Wales on 30 June was 326 in the Metropolitan police district and 117 in other areas. Figures available do not distinguish between prisoners held in police stations and those held in other locations.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many females were remanded in custody in police stations on 30 June in (a) London and (b) elsewhere in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: On 30 June the number of females (most of whom are likely to have been untried) in police or court cells was 75 in London and seven elsewhere in England and Wales.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals he has to ensure that prisoners in custody are brought to their court of trial or remand on the due date.

Mr. John Patten: We have in hand a number of measures to reduce the delays caused by the present heavy demands on prison escorts.

We are taking steps to reduce the number of occasions on which defendants have to be produced in different courts to face different charges by setting up close links with the Crown Prosecution Service. We are also taking forward the recommendation of the court escort scrutiny on the more efficient deployment of manpower. Furthermore, a clause in the Criminal Justice Bill provides for defendants to be remanded in custody for periods of up to 28 days, subject to an experiment in some areas. This too will reduce the escorting commitment.

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unconvicted adult prisoners are currently held on remand; if he will give comparative figures for the years 1980 to 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The information is given in the table:

Untried prisoners aged 21 or over held in Prison Department establishments in England and Wales at 31 May

1980	2,990
1981	3,450

Naturalisation

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 6 July, Official Report, column 49, if he will estimate the total cost of allowing Polish war veterans to apply for British citizenship without paying the naturalisation fee.

Mr. Renton: It is not possible to estimate the total cost since there is no way of knowing how many Polish war veterans might in future apply for naturalisation.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many men over the age of 65 years have applied for naturalisation in each of the past five years; and of those how many were from (a) eastern European countries, (b) Pakistan, (c) India and (d) Bangladesh.

Mr. Renton: This information is not available.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received representations from groups other than Polish war veterans wishing to have the naturalisation fee waived when applying for British citizenship; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: From time to time we have received such representations on behalf of a wide range of other groups including some other groups from Eastern Europe, refugees, retirement pensioners, those on low incomes and people who are in receipt of various social security benefits.

Air Attack Warning

Mr. Gow asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any changes are proposed in the arrangements for warning of air attacks on the United Kingdom and for monitoring the effects; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The Government attach a high priority to the maintenance of an effective air attack warning system which can quickly be brought into operation if needed. We pay tribute to the work of the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation and particularly its field force, the Royal Observer Corps, which is largely composed of volunteers who are trained to carry out warning and monitoring tasks in the event of hostilities. The UKWMO has been in existence for over 30 years and the Government have concluded that it would be timely to undertake a comprehensive review of warning and monitoring arrangements in the light of current planning assumptions and technological developments. Accordingly, a review is to be carried out with the following terms of reference:

"Review existing arrangements for warning of an air attack on the United Kingdom and monitoring its effects including the functions and facilities of the United Kingdom Warning and Monitoring Organisation, and its field force the Royal Observer Corps, and police responsibilities for the warning system. Taking account of current planning assumptions, including the possibility of conventional, chemical and nuclear attack, and in the light of emergency planning arrangements generally, make recommendations on:

(a) the aims and the operational requirements of a system for warning of air attack and for identifying, warning of and reporting on the effects;

(b) the functions, structure and organisation of agencies needed to operate the system, including accountability and management, and the roles of any supporting agencies; and

(c) requirements for equipment and facilities; and make assessments of:

(d) cost and effectiveness; and

(e) the application to any wider role in emergency planning arrangements."

Arrangements will be made to consult with members of the UKWMO, including the ROC, as well as the other agencies involved, and full account will be taken in the review of the long standing links between the corps and the RAF. The conclusions of the review are not expected to be known until 1988 but in due course we shall consider the extent to which they can be made available.

Women's Needs

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the main needs of women in the policy areas within the sphere of his Department's activities; what has been done to identify and quantify those needs and to monitor services delivery; what consultation is carried out with women to ensure their views are adequately represented; and what training is given to his staff to raise their appreciation of the needs of women.

Mr. John Patten [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 48]: Areas of particular concern to women within the sphere of Home Office activities are dealt with at paragraphs 121 to 127, 152 to 165 of the review by the ministerial group on women's issues which I chair of the Government's response to the Nairobi forward-looking strategies for the advancement of women (FLS), copies of which are in the Library. I would also identify the following issues:

(i) We seek to ensure that the criminal law in England and Wales is adequate to protect all members of society, women and men, and in addition to the measures referred to in the FLS Review we have included in the Criminal Justice Bill provisions providing anonymity for rape victims from the moment when an allegation of rape is made.

(ii) The leaflet referred to in paragraph 154 of the FLS Review has now been issued. Half a million copies have been printed and distributed so far.

(iii) We are aware of the problems women's organisations and groups experience in attracting financial support. The Voluntary Services Unit at the Home Office organised a seminar in January this year, which brought together funders from charitable trusts and Government, and representatives of women's organisations and groups. The Ministerial Group on Women's Issues have agreed that recommendations from the seminar should be pursued by an implementation group.

(iv) Grant under section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966 is paid to a number of local authorities which make additional provision to meet the special needs, mainly in education and social services, of women of Asian origin. Responsibility for identifying need for this purpose lies with the local authority.

(v) The special needs of female inmates of custodial establishments are recognised, as is made clear in paragraph 157 of the FLS Review. The Home Office division with general policy responsibility for women and girls in prison maintains close contact with female establishments to identify any policy issues which arise and the following areas are currently receiving attention:

(a) Age-Mixing: the mixing of female offenders under 21 with adult female offenders;

(b) Mothers and babies: the circumstances in which offenders should be eligible to have their babies with them in prison; and details of the regime that should apply in mother and baby units;

(c) New psychiatric unit at Holloway: the feasibility of such a unit and what form it might take.

Home Office Ministers and officials maintain contacts with voluntary organisations and groups and we are always prepared to receive their views on policy issues.

Home Office staff receive management training which stresses the importance of equal opportunities.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Dogs

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people received hospital treatment as a result of attacks by dogs; how many people died as a result of such attacks; and how many people received hospital treatment for dog-borne diseases, particularly toxocara canis, as a result of contact with dogs or dog excrement for the last year for which figures are available.

Mrs. Currie: The available information is given in the table.

Deaths registered in England and Wales during 1986	Number
Dog bite	4

In-patient cases treated in NHS hospitals in England during 1985	Estimated number
Dog-borne disease[1]	140
Dog bite	1,200

[1]The sample numbers held centrally are too small for reliable estimates to be made individually for rabies, toxocariasis, pasteurellosis and echinococcosis.

Female Gynaecologists

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what percentage of National Health Service consultants in gynaecology are women; what was the percentage 10 years previously; and what steps are being taken to improve this percentage.

Mrs. Currie: At 30 September 1986, 11·3 per cent. of consultants in obstetrics and gynaecology in England and Wales were women, compared with 11·7 per cent. 10 years earlier. The percentage can be expected to increase in future years as a result of the increasing proportion of women in the hospital training grades. Thus the proportion of women in the senior registrar grade (the most senior training grade) in obstetrics and gynaecology has increased from 12 per cent. to 24 per cent. in the same period. In addition, the Department has commissioned research in the factors which influence the career progress of women doctors, and will consider in the light of its findings whether any further action is needed to encourage women doctors to enter the specialty.

Cancer Screening

Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when funds will be made available to Bristol and Weston district health authority and the Bristol family practitioners committee to extend the computerised call and recall cervical cancer screening programme to women aged 20 years and over.

Mrs. Currie: I understand that Bristol and Weston, together with Frenchay and Southmead health authorities, already have facilities for extending the computerised call and recall cervical cancer screening programme to women aged 20 years and over.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the Midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Moore: The following table gives the information requested and also includes Wales and Scotland. All figures are rounded.

Region	Staff in Post	Salary Budgets Issued £ million
London and south-east	30,000	313
South West and Wales	9,300	83
Midlands	12,800	111
Northern England	38,000	336
Scotland	8,900	75

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will detail the latest information on the number of persons living in households drawing supplementary benefit.

Mr. Portillo: In February 1987, the latest date for which information is available, the total number of persons dependent on supplementary benefit was 8,350,000.
Source: DHSS quarterly statistical inquiry.

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many are in receipt of supplementary benefit at each Department of Health and Social Security office in the Renfrew, West and Inverclyde constituency area; and how many were in receipt of benefit in June 1983.

Mr. Scott: In 1983, the constituency of Renfew, West and Inverclyde was covered by the Department's offices at Paisley, Paisley, West, Port Glasgow and Greenock. However, in March 1984, Paisley, West became part of Johnstone local office. The local office and constituency boundaries are not conterminous.

The number of people receiving supplementary benefit from these offices on 5 May 1987, the latest date for which information is available, and on an equivalent date in 1983 is as follows:

	1987	1983
Paisley ILO	16,581	13,935
Paisley West AO		7,094
Johnstone ILO	7,941
Greenock ILO	12,065	9,822
Port Glasgow ILO	5,348	4,291
Totals	41,935	35,142

Hospitals (Liverpool)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many beds will be provided at the Liverpool royal infirmary following the relocation of services from St. Paul's eye hospital and The Seamen's Dispensary;

(2) how many hospital beds there are at present in St. Paul's eye hospital and The Seamen's Dispensary, Liverpool;

(3) how many beds there are at present in Liverpool maternity hospital, Mill road maternity hospital and the Liverpool women's hospital;

(4) what are the estimated savings to the Liverpool area health authority from the location of all obstetric and gynaecology services to the former Liverpool royal infirmary; and if he will make a statement;

(5) what will be the estimated cost of the re-location of the St. Paul's eye hospital and The Seamen's Dispensary to the Liverpool royal infirmary;

(6) what will be the estimated cost to the Liverpool area health authority of the re-location of all obstetrics and gynaecology services to the former Liverpool royal infirmary;

(7) how many beds will be provided at the Liverpool royal infirmary site following the location of all obstetric and gynaecology services.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Ambulance Service (London)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, pursuant to the reply concerning the London ambulance service 1 July, Official Report, column 120, if he will list the number of emergency ambulance shifts of eight hours which were lost due to constraints of finance for crew costs in each of the ambulance stations in the north-east division of the London ambulance service in each of the months of April, May and June.

Mrs. Currie: No emergency ambulance shifts were lost due to constraints of finance. When staff shortages occur senior managers assess the provision of services and take the action they consider appropriate to ensure the work load is covered.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultations he had with chairmen of the four thames regional health authorities and district health authorities, respectively, concerning funding of the London ambulance service from his Department; and if he will state the amount of the grant for the financial year 1987-88.

Mrs. Currie: We have had no such consultations. The South West Thames regional health authority which is responsible for managing the London ambulance service, issued a short-term programme earlier this year which gave details of the financial provision for the LAS. The programme was circulated to the other Thames regions and districts concerned for comment. The budget for the LAS for 1987-88 is £41,351,661.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he has made with the London ambulance service to provide it with sufficient funds for the year 1987-88 to enable it to respond to the annual pattern of emergency service demands for its services within the established standards of response times.

Mrs. Currie: We have made no arrangements direct with the London ambulance service. The South West Thames regional health authority is responsible for managing and funding the London ambulance service and will no doubt take into account the expected levels of emergency calls and the minimum response times that the Department recommends in setting the budget.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out in the Official Report the figures for the non-emergency patient journeys run under the auspices of the London ambulance service for each of the first two quarters of 1987 in the format of his reply of 5 March, Official Report, column 679, showing percentage change with the respective quarters in 1984.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Medical Appeal Tribunal (Glasgow)

Mr. Harry Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will issue immediate instructions to the medical appeal tribunal in Glasgow to the effect that doctors assessing the walking ability of claimants must stop the practice of taking the claimant outside to West Regent street where, in full view of the general public, they are asked to demonstrate their walking ability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The administration of medical appeals tribunals is the responsibility of the president of social security and medical appeal tribunals, his honour judge Byrt, QC, and the hon. Member may care to write to him about the conduct of medical appeal tribunal hearings in Glasgow.

Waiting Lists

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will enumerate those health authorities where waiting lists for in-patient treatment exceeded 18 per thousand in 1985 and 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will enumerate those health authorities where present waiting lists for in-patient treatment exceed 18 per thousand; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants received severe weather payments at each benefit office in Renfrew, West and Inverclyde constituency in the winter of 1986-87, and how much was paid out at each office.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the precise form requested. The parliamentary constituency of Renfrew, West and Inverclyde is dealt with by four local offices which also cover parts of other constituencies. The information which is available for these local offices is as follows:

Local Office	Number of £5 payments[1]	Total amount paid £
Greenock	7,891	39,455
Johnstone	5,621	28,105
Paisley	10,369	51,845
Port Glasgow	10,163	50,815

[1] Separate figures on the number of individuals receiving payments are not available, but the great majority of successful claimants in Renfrew, West and Inverclyde will have received a total of £15 in respect of the three weeks for which this help was made available

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many claimants received exceptionally severe weather payments at each benefit office in each constituency of Scotland in the winter of 1986-87; and how much was paid out at each office.

Mr. Scott: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply very shortly.

Renal Patients

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the planned annual rate of increase in treatment for new renal patients, regional health authority by regional health authority, for 1987-88.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 9 July 1987]: I regret that details of each region's plans for the treatment of new patients with end stage renal failure are not collected centrally. However, I am pleased to announce that provisional figures from the European Dialysis and Transplant Association for the acceptance of new patients for treatment in the United Kingdom show an increase from 43 patients per million population in 1985 to approximately 47 per million in 1986.

DEFENCE

RAF, Ynys Môn

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans his Department has for changes in the number of civilian employees at the Royal Air Force establishment in Ynys Môn; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have no immediate plans for any significant changes in the number of civilians employed at RAF Valley.

Army (Bullying)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be in a position to provide the hon. Member for Solihull with a copy of his constituent's statement in an alleged Army bullying case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I sent my hon. Friend a copy of the statement to which he refers on 30 June.

Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to visit Central Ordnance Depot, Donnington to receive representations on the proposed privatisation of depot services.

Mr. Sainsbury: My right hon. Friend has, at present, no plans to visit the Central Ordnance Depot at Donnington. A study has been conducted into the feasibility of contracting out a range of administrative functions at the Central Ordnance Depot and associated garrison and the report is currently being evaluated. We hope to make an announcement on the results of the study shortly and the work force and their representatives will have an opportunity to make representations, as part of the Ministry of Defence's normal consultative arrangements. I shall write to the hon. Member at the time of that announcement.

Export Sales

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now give the total value of defence exports sales contracts held by United Kingdom companies in 1986.

Mr. Sainsbury: The latest figure for United Kingdom defence export sales in 1986 is £5·8 billion.

Defence Exports Services Organisation

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will outline the role of the Defence Exports Services Organisation and its funding arrangements.

Mr. Sainsbury: The DESO exists to assist British defence industries to promote and sell their goods abroad in accordance with Her Majesty's Government's policy. In so doing it plays a significant part in increasing the country's trade and employment. Details of the funding arrangements for the Defence Export Services Organisation are contained in table 4 "Exports of defence equipment Votes 1 and 2" of the MOD Supply Estimates for 1987-88.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the Defence Exports Services Organisation operations for each of the years 1979 to 1986 including (a) the total number of staff of the Defence Exports Services Organisation and their gradings, (b) the countries visited by Defence Exports Services Organisation staff and the dates of the visits, (c) the equipment exports agreed and (d) the value of exports to each country expressed in constant 1986-87 prices.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is not the practice to give details of countries visited by Defence Export Services Organisation staff or of individual exports to particular countries. Statistics of United Kingdom defence sales by broad geographic regions are set out in volume 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates". Detailed figures of DESO staff are not available from 1979 and could only be provided at disproportionate time and effort. The total numbers at 1 April 1983 and 1 April 1987 were 353 and 251 respectively.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Sainsbury: On 1 April 1987, the latest date for which information is available, the number of civil servants, counting part-timers as half and excluding casual staff, was (a) 63,206 in London and the south-east, (b) 41,169 in the south-west, (c) 15,738·5 in the midlands (comprising the west midlands, east midlands and East Anglia economic planning regions) and (d) 12,256·5 in the north of England (comprising the Yorks and Humberside, north-west and north economic planning regions). Although expenditure is not budgeted by region, details of estimated procurement expenditure by economic planning region for 1985-86, the latest year for which figures are available to the nearest £0·1 billion are as follows:

	£ billion 1985-86
Yorkshire and Humberside	0·2
East Midlands	0·3
West Midlands	0·3
East Anglia	0·2
South-West	0·9
South-East	3·8
North-West	1·0
Scotland	0·4
Wales	0·2
Northern Ireland	0·1

Ship Design

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Defence if research on ship design by his Department is available to commercial shipbuilders and operators in so far as it is outwith the confines of security; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: If appropriate and if security considerations permit, the results of research on ship design are published in the technical press and through learned societies. My Department also makes results available to United Kingdom industry through its membership of several research groups and through the Defence Scientific Advisory Council. Advice is also given in response to specific inquiries and test facilities are made available. The end product of much research is embodied in a series of naval engineering standards, many of which are available for sale to industry.

Body Armour

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he still estimates that body armour will be introduced into general service with the British Army during 1989.

Mr. Sainsbury: Yes.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to place contracts with manufacturers for the production of suits of body armour needed for troop trials.

Mr. Sainsbury: Contracts for the manufacture of combat body armour for troop trials are expected to be placed later this year.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence wheter he estimates that extensive trials of body armour will take place during the current year; and when he expects these to commence.

Mr. Sainsbury: Extensive troop trials of combat body armour are expected to start at the turn of the year.

Infantry Sales Team

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the formation of the infantry sales team including (a) the reasons for and date of its formation, (b) cost to the taxpayer, (c) its relationship to the Defence Export Services Organisation and (d) the countries visited since its inception.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer to the question answered by my predecessor on 15 May last in which he stated that a small infantry sales team was established in 1986. In addition to its normal duties it holds itself ready, under the direction of the Defence Export Services Organisation, to assist United Kingdom manufacturers in the sale and promotion of British infantry equipment overseas. Apart from the pay and allowances of the team members, all other costs are borne by the commercial companies involved. Since 1986 the team has visited the following countries:

Indonesia
Luxembourg
United States of America
France
Canada
Saudi Arabia
Turkey
Jordan
Malaysia
Portugal
Pakistan

PRIME MINISTER

Arms Export Control Procedures

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister for what reason it is not the practice of Her Majesty's Government to answer parliamentary questions about the operation of arms export control procedures in relation to individual countries; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Successive Governments have agreed that it would not be in the public interest to disclose details of the operation of arms export control procedures.

British Telecom

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister if she will give the total cost to each public service and each department of British Telecom's decision to end free emergency fault repair cover and replace this by total care and prompt care schemes.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is not held centrally.

Inner-city Initiatives (Cabinet Office)

Dr. Cunningham asked the Prime Minister if she will publish in the Official Report the grades and estimated annual costs of the staff of the Cabinet Office dealing with inner-city initiatives, and show for each post whether the present occupant was (a) a member of the Cabinet Office staff on 11 June 1987, (b) in another Department on 11 June 1987 or (c) employed elsewhere and, in such cases, where.

The Prime Minister: Since the beginning of July, one official at grade 3, two at grade 7 and a senior personal secretary have been temporarily detached from their duties in other Departments and seconded to the Cabinet Office to work on urban policy issues. The annual costs of such officials are £98,524. In addition, a number of other officials in the Cabinet Office spend some of their time on matters relating to urban policy issues in the course of their regular duties.

Lebanon (Hostages)

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether she will make a statement on the action being taken by Her Majesty's Government to bring about the release of Mr. Terry Waite and other persons held captive by terrorist groups in Lebanon.

The Prime Minister: We are pursuing every reasonable lead, through our staff in Beirut and elsewhere and by maintaining close and regular contact with those concerned at Lambeth palace, to try to establish the whereabouts of Mr. Waite, as well as the fate of the other British hostages held in Lebanon.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Family Law

Mr. Ashley asked the Attorney-General when he intends to bring into force the Family Law Reform Act 1987.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor intends to bring the Family Law Reform Act 1987 into force when the necessary resources are available.

Legal Aid

Mr. Bermingham asked the Attorney-General on what basis the figure of 70 per cent. of households qualifying for legal aid, mentioned on page 9 of the recent White Paper on legal aid, was calculated; what proportion of households has been covered by the legal aid scheme for each year since 1979; and if the basis of calculation has been changed at any time over the past eight years.

The Attorney-General: It is not possible to calculate with precision the percentage of the population eligible for legal aid. The figure of 70 per cent., which has remained broadly constant throughout the past eight years, is an estimate only. It is based on a comparison between the qualifying levels of income for legal aid for different compositions of households and figures published by the Department of Employment for household incomes. This method has been used throughout the last eight years.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing Executive

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the policy of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive with regard to the repair or replacement of steel-framed windows in its houses.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that the information is not readily available; I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Warrenpoint Harbour Authority

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the plans of the Warrenpoint harbour authority with regard to the expansion or development of the harbour area in Warrenpoint.

Mr. Needham: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Action for Community Employment

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish the list of sponsors of action for community employment schemes which was made available to ACE sponsors in 1986 for the elections to the Northern Ireland Federation of ACE sponsors.

Mr. Viggers: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

Water Supplies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if he will publish a table showing the average household bill for water rates for each regional water authority in Northern Ireland for each year separately between 1979 and 1987;

(2) if he will publish a table showing the figures for the numbers of households where water supplies have been disconnected, showing, where possible, the reasons for disconnection for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Mr. Needham: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Butcher: The number of Department of Trade and Industry staff in post at 1 April 1987 were as follows:

	Number
London	8,669
South West	194
Midlands	442
North of England	865
Other (Wales and Scotland)	2,443
Total	12,593

Most of the Department's spending programmes are addressed to national objectives, and budgets are not therefore set on a regional basis. The Department's budget for regional support in the assisted areas in the current year is £230 million. Expenditure in the different regions will depend on their respective demand from eligible projects under the relevant schemes. Last year, such expenditure totalled £356 million. A regional breakdown of the bulk of this expenditure (regional development grants and the main programme of regional selective assistance) is as follows, on the basis of spend in DTI regions (aggregated where appropriate):

	£ million
London and the South East	—
South West	20·5
Midlands (East and West Midlands)	20·4
North of England (North East, North West and Yorks and Humberside)	277·9
Total	318·8

Textile and Carpet Companies (Aid)

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what discussions he has had with the European Commission about the grant of state aid in breach of the treaty of Rome to textile and carpet companies in other European Economic Community countries.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Government have made a number of respresentations to the European Commission concerning the fair and even-handed enforcement of the state aids rules in the textile sector.

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has yet received information on whether the Belgian Government have now complied with the Commission decision of 27 June 1984 and the European Court judgment of 9 April 1987 concerning the required repayment of aid of £3·7 million by a subsidiary of Deaulieu, a Belgian carpet manufacturer.

Mr. Alan Clark: No information has been received to date. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Electricity Safety (Exhibition)

Mr. Thurnham asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to safety with electricity to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Maude: Arrangements have been made for such an exhibition in the Upper Waiting Hall to take place from Monday 2 November to Friday 6 November 1987.

Regional Development Grant

Ms. Quin asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement as to the reasons for the decline in regional development grant assistance to the north-east of England, as detailed in the reply to the right hon. Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) on 2 February 1987, Official Report, column 501.

Mr. Atkins: I will reply to the hon. Lady as soon as possible.

Financial Services Act

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement about the implementation of the Financial Services Act; and, in particular, when he expects to exercise the functions of sections 119 and 120 of the Act.

Mr. Maude: Following transfer of the relevant powers, the SIB has received two applications, from the Financial Intermediaries, Managers and Brokers Regulatory Association and the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation, for recognition under section 9 of the Act. The SIB is in discussions with other potential applicants and further applications are expected shortly. Copies of the rules and supporting material submitted by FIMBRA and IMRO have been sent to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and forwarded to the Director General of Fair Trading. My right hon. Friend will consider whether to give leave under section 120 for the recognition of these SROs when he has received a request to do so from the SIB and the report on their rules from the Director General. Now that the power to grant recognition has been transferred to the SIB my right hon. Friend has no powers exerciseable under section 119 in advance of a recognition order being made.

Satellite Research (Surrey University)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on his funding of Surrey university satellite research.

Mr. Butcher: Surrey university has a good record of achievement in space research. My Department, through the British National Space Centre, is currently funding one research activity there in the field of high technology thermoplastic polymers for space structures. A number of other possibilities are under discussion.

Steel Industry (Redundancy Pay)

Mr. Cryer asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations have been made to the EEC Commission to ensure that applications under article 56 of the European Coal and Steel Community programme for payments to redundant steel workers are approved without delay.

Mr. Atkins: I will reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the members of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission giving their occupations and or professional background and their remuneration.

Mr. Maude: The information requested is as follows:

Members of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission as at 10 July 1987

Name	Position	Background	Salary £
Sir Godfray Le Quesne	Chairman	The Law	64,739

Mr. R. Young	Member	Industry (management)	9,128

Notes:

(1) Under the provisions of the Fair Trading Act 1973 the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is responsible for maintaining a panel from which additional members may be appointed to take part in any investigation into a newspaper merger.

(2) Similarly, under section 13(10) of the Telecommunications Act 1984 the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is required to appoint not less than three additional members to the Commission to assist in any investigation under the Act.

Mr. Wareing asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the cost of running the Monopolies and Mergers Commission; and whether he will itemise this over the past four years.

Mr. Maude: The cost of running the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in the current year and over the past four years is estimated to be:

		£'000s
1983-84	Outturn	1,879
1984-85	Outturn	2,029
1985-86	Outturn	3,404
1986-87	Provisional outturn	3,317
1987-88	Estimated provision	3,563

International Digital Communications (Merger)

Sir Geoffrey Pattie asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any information relating to the proposed merger between International Digital Communications and International Telecommunications of Japan; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Butcher: Her Majesty's Government understand that commercial discussions are still continuing in Japan. Her Majesty's Government have consistently made clear their expectation that the issues be given a fair and objective appraisal, and are continuing to watch the situation very closely.

Clydesdale Bank

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if, in view of the importance of the Clydesdale bank to the Scottish financial sector and the Scottish economy as a whole, he will refer its sale to the National Australia bank to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for investigation.

Mr. Maude: The proposed sale of the Clydesdale bank to the National Australia bank is being considered by the Director General of Fair Trading, who is responsible for advising my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the question of reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. It would not be appropriate for me to prejudge the Director General's advice by commenting further at this point.

Fire Retardant Upholstery

Mr. Stern asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he has any plans to introduce legislation to require that upholstery materials used in caravans and caravanettes manufactured in the United Kingdom be made of fire retardant materials.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have been asked to reply.

There are no current legal requirements for the flammability of upholstery materials in road vehicles. We are trying to get European agreement to a standard as a basis for introducing such requirements in coaches where large numbers of people could be at risk in the event of a rapidly spreading fire resulting from a road accident. There are no plans at present to extend such requirements to other types of road vehicle such as caravans and caravanettes.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Boys' Education

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has for initiatives to encourage boys into non-traditional fields of study and employment following the initiatives to encourage girls into the non-traditional fields of science and engineering.

Mrs. Rumbold: None.

Education (Finance)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table showing such information as he has about how the main cost of public education is financed; respectively, by central, state or local government in each European Economic Community member state.

Mrs. Rumbold: This information is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

ACCESS Courses

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the number of (a) women and (b) men registered on ACCESS courses.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected by my Department.

Assisted Places Scheme

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the latest cost per pupil of the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Dunn: The average cost to my Department per assisted place pupil is £1,759 for the 1986-87 school year.

Speech Therapy

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) how many posts for speech therapists remained unfilled at special schools in inner London at the most recent convenient date;

(2) how many special schools in inner London are currently estimated to be without an adequate level of speech therapy.

Mr. Dunn: The information is not available centrally.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what plans he has to increase the number of places available for the training of speech therapists; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: Registration to practise as a speech therapist follows study for a degree in a relevant discipline recognised for the purpose by the College of Speech Therapists. It would be for the National Health Service as principal employer of speech therapists to approach providing institutions if it were considered that numbers on appropriate courses were insufficient.

Educational Visits

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will issue guidelines to local education authorities as to the recommended ratio of adult escorts to school pupils during educational visits and school journeys; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: My right hon. Friend has no plans to issue such guidelines. It would be impracticable to lay down specific ratios since much depends on the nature of the particular visit, the pupils' previous experience, and the type of terrain to be encountered on individual journeys.

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many primary, secondary and special school pupils lost their lives during educational visits and school journeys in 1986.

Mr. Dunn: This information is not collected by my Department.

Birkbeck College

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will meet a delegation from the Association of Scientific, Technical and Managerial Staffs to discuss the future funding of Birkbeck college.

Mr. Jackson: I am ready to consider any requests to meet delegations. However, the funding of Birkbeck college within London University is a matter for the university itself which will, I understand, be reviewing the matter following various current inquiries.

TRANSPORT

Bus Routes

Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to review the operation of the Transport Act with particular regard to the operation of new bus routes along roads which have not previously been used for this purpose and where residents have objections.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984 and the Transport Act 1985 both provide remedies in cases where roads are unsuited to bus operation. The expansion of the bus services into new areas has been of great value to many people who do not have access to a car.

Air Passenger Safety (Smokehoods)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the Civil Aviation Authority expects to report on its research into the use of smokehoods to protect air passengers from smoke and fumes.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Civil Aviation Authority is wholly responsible for the regulation of aviation safety. I understand that it expects to issue a decision on the use of smokehoods by the end of the year when it has completed its current research and consultations.

Seat Belts

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will provide details of the latest research into the effectiveness of seat belt and child restraint use in reducing the severity of injury of children in cars;

(2) what information he has as to the proportion of children who are currently restrained in the rear of cars.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Surveys published by the Department's Transport and Road Research Laboratory show that between 1982 and 1986 the overall wearing rate for all child occupants in the rear of cars has increased from 26 per cent. to 31 per cent. The highest increase is for those under one year old. The results of the surveys were as follows:

	November 1982		June 1983		November 1984		July 1986
	[1]SS	[2]R	SS	R	SS	R	SS	R
		percent.		percent.		percent.		percent.
Rear seat
Baby (under 1 year)	213	30	648	45	423	49	429	55
Small Child (approx 1-4 years)	2,083	40	3,568	27	2,526	34	2,433	42
Medium Child (approx 5-9 years)	1,599	12	1,985	9	1,492	12	1,971	19
Large Child (approx 10-13 years)	405	2	517	3	582	6	732	12

[1] SS = Sample size ie Numbers of children observed.
[2] R = Proportion restrained.

Two other continuing studies by TRRL have highlighted the benefit of the use of child restraints in cars. An early study showed that the use of child restraints reduces the risk of overall injury by two thirds. The second study, which reported in May this year, showed that in the zero to four age group the use of child restraints reduces the risk of death by about three quarters.

Current wearing rates are likely to be higher following national and local publicity including the BBC "That's Life" campaign. The rates are likely to deteriorate unless parents of new born children are constantly reminded of the benefits of installing and using restraints.

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what information he has as to what proportion of registered cars have rear anchorage points but no rear seat belts;

(2) if he will introduce regulations requiring the retrospective fitment of rear seat belts for cars registered between January 1981 and April 1986.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: About half the cars currently registered have rear anchorage points but no rear seat belts. The great majority of these were first registered between April 1982—when rear anchorages became a mandatory requirement—and April 1987 when rear seat belts became a mandatory requirement. It is not planned to require the retrospective fitment of rear seat belts to these or earlier registered vehicles.

We do encourage the fitting and use of rear restraints for children and adults.

Accident Statistics

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many rear-seat passengers were injured in road accidents during 1986; and if he will provide details of injury severity and restraint use.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The position of vehicle occupants is recorded only for cars. Information for 1985, the latest year available, is as follows:

Rear car seat occupants by severity of injury and seat belt use: Great Britain: 1985

Severity of injury	Seat belt in use	Seat belt not in use	Seat belt not fitted	Child restraint in use	Child restraint not in use	Child restraint not fitted	Restraint unknown	Total

Serious	111	164	3,342	51	23	240	702	4,633
Slight	692	595	14,498	542	183	1,941	2,743	21,194
Total	810	769	18,080	597	206	2,195	3,503	26,160

Tactile Crossings

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Transport what kinds of tactile designs are used for tactile crossings to help the blind; and if he will take steps to standardise them.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: A tactile paving design specifically for use at pedestrian crossings has been developed by the Transport and Road Research Laboratory in close consultation with organisations representing disabled people, including those who are visually handicapped.

Advice on the design, purpose and layout of the tactile surface was issued to highway authorities in the Department's disability circular DU 1/86 of 13 October 1986. That advice emphasises that the surface recommended should remain distinct from those surfaces used for other purposes.

Woolwich Ferry

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he is satisfied with the current level of service on the Woolwich ferry; and what steps he is taking to improve it.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: As I said in my answer to the hon. Member on 23 June 1986 at column 61, Greenwich borough council is operating the Woolwich ferry as our agent and questions on its day-to-day operation should be addressed to the council.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he plans to publish the consultant's report on the future of the Woolwich ferry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I expect to receive the consultants' final report very soon now. I shall then decide what steps to take.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will meet representatives of the London borough of Greenwich and the staff of Woolwich ferry to discuss its future operations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: When I have considered the findings and recommendations of the consultants' final report I shall discuss these with the London borough of Greenwich. It is for Greenwich to have discussions with its work force.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport on how many days since 1 April the Woolwich ferry has been subject to disruption; and how many scheduled crossings have been lost.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Up to 8 July, disruption has occurred on 93 days. Around 6,600 crossings have been lost.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will indicate the numbers of staff employed on the Woolwich ferry in each grade at the most recent convenient date together with the comparative numbers at the same date in 1986, 1985 and 1984.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The staff are employed by the London borough of Greenwich. Questions about staff numbers should be addressed to the council.

We assumed responsibility for the ferry on 1 April 1986 at which date, Greenwich took over the following complement, which is still operative.

	Number

We have no comparative figures prior to abolition.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received about the current level of service on the Woolwich ferry; and what has been his response.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have received two letters from members of the public. Questions on the day-to-day operation of the ferry are a matter for the London borough of Greenwich as the Department's agent.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport what comments he has received from the London borough of Greenwich about the consultant's report on the future of the Woolwich ferry.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The London borough of Greenwich contributed to the review by consultants of the Woolwich ferry. We will discuss the final report with Greenwich.

M1 (Roadworks)

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what roadworks are currently being undertaken on the M1 motorway between London and Leicester; how long they are expected to last; what further roadworks are planned for this stretch of motorway; whether he will take steps to reduce the delay caused to motorists during the carrying out of such works; and whether he proposes to install any additional motorway lighting on the M1 between London and Leicester;

(2) what roadworks are currently being undertaken on the M1 motorway between Leicester and Scotland; how long they are expected to last; what further roadworks are planned on this stretch of motorway; whether he will take steps to reduce the delay caused to motorists during the carrying out of such works; and whether he proposes to install any additional motorway lighting on the M1 between Leicester and Scotland.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The following roadworks are currently being undertaken or planned for the remainder of 1987-88 on the M1 between London and Leeds (where M1 terminates).

Site	Scheme	Start—Finish dates
J4-5	Resurfacing	August 1987—October 1987
J10[1]	Overlay	May 1987—October 1987
J12-13[1]	Safety Fence and carriageway renewal	October 1987—January 1988
J14-15[1]	Reconstruction overlay	August 1987—January 1988
J16-17[1]	Central Reserve Reconstruction (Reserve Scheme)	February 1988—March 1988
J19[1]	Construction of Junction for M1-A1 link	Spring 1988—Autumn 1988
J23-24[1]	Reconstruction overlay	July 1987—September 1987
J24-R[1] Trent	Reconstruction overlay	October 1987—November 1987
J23[1]	Reconstruction overlay	February 1988—March 1988
J25[1]	Reconstruction overlay (Reserve Scheme)	February 1988—April 1988
J39-40	Carriageway renewal	September 1987—December 1987

[1] Lane Rental

Further work will take place in future years, with about 5 per cent. of the route renewed each year. Minor repairs and routine maintenance will also take place from time to time. All reasonable measures will be taken to reduce delays to the road user, including the use of lane rental contracts.

Additional lighting is proposed between the end of existing lighting near Newport Pagnell and the Buckinghamshire-Northamptonshire boundary to the north. There are no current proposals for lighting the M1 between Leicester and Leeds.

North Circular Road (Ealing)

Sir George Young asked the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he proposes to announce his decision on the public inquiry into the route of the north circular road through Ealing; and what is the reason for the delay;

(2) when he received the inspector's report on the local public inquiry held from December 1983 to June 1984 on proposed improvements to the north circular road from Pope's lane in Hounslow to Hanger lane in Ealing; when he expects to publish it; why publication has been delayed; and what representations he has received from the local population about this matter.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inspector's report was received in April 1985. It raised difficult issues which are taking some time to resolve and which my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for the Environment and for Transport are considering. I hope that an announcement can be made before too long, at which time the report will be published. I have not received representations about the delay from local people.

Sir Barney Hayhoe asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will publish the traffic count in respect of the section of the north circular road between Hanger lane and Chiswick roundabout and roads linking thereto in west London both before and after the opening of the M25, together with counts of traffic now using the M25 itself in the same sector; and what plans he has for updating counts of traffic flows since the opening of the M25.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I shall write to my right hon. Friend.

M42 (Northern Section)

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the northern section of the M42 is to be completed.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The M42 motorway is now complete and open to traffic from the M5 (southern turn) to Appleby Magna, Leicestershire. An extension northwards to the M1 near the east midlands airport will be a dual carriageway all-purpose trunk road, the A42.

Construction of the first section, the A42 Measham and Ashby bypass, will start on 3 August and take about two years to complete. Construction of the final section, the A42 Castle Donington north, will start in 1989, subject to the completion of the outstanding statutory procedures.

Remould Tyres

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for Transport how his Department obtained samples of remould tyres produced by Arvoland Ltd. referred to in his Department's Press Notice No. 51 dated 30 January 1987; and if he will make a statement on the current situation regarding the recall of remould tyres.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department obtained Arvoland tyres independently from three retail outlets and tested these at the Rubber and Plastics Research Association in August 1986. Further tyres were subsequently supplied directly to RAPRA by Arvoland, as part of a programme agreed with the Department to demonstrate improved product quality, between October and December when the firm went into receivership.

Arvoland and their receivers have co-operated with the Department in recalling or destroying remould tyres following the launch of a recall campaign in November 1986. It is believed that few, if any, tyres remain on sale.

Road Accident Statistics

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of fatal road accidents involved drink in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: In 1985, at least 1,400 road deaths — over one quarter — were associated with excess alcohol. In these accidents one or more road users were found to have a blood alcohol content over 80 milligrams per 100 millilitres, the legal limit for drivers. Further details will appear in "Road Accidents Great Britain" ("The Casualty Report") later this year.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of serious accidents involved drink in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We do not know. We do know that in 1985, 6·4 per cent. of serious accidents involved a driver who failed the breath test or failed to provide a sample. This figure does not include accidents where the driver was not tested. It does not include drivers who had consumed alcohol but were below the legal limit.

Burscough Curves Rail Extension (Southport)

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he is considering plans to reopen the Burscough curves rail extension to Southport.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received any representations on the reopening of the Burscough curves rail extension to Southport.

Mr. David Mitchell: I received a written representation last August from my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) but I have not been approached yet by the hon. Member for Southport.

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Transport if there have been any consultations between his Department and British Rail on whether to restore the Burscough curves rail extension to Southport.

Mr. David Mitchell: No.

Railways (Reopening)

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he employs when deciding whether to reopen a rail link.

Mr. David Mitchell: It is for British Rail to consider the case for re-opening any rail link. Ministers would only wish to be involved in major investment proposals. As a general rule, we expect proposals for additions to the existing rail network to achieve at least a real return of 7 per cent. We would support any worthwhile investment which offered a sound prospect of improving the railways' finances.

Tourist Attractions (Signposting)

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Transport how many visitors a tourist resort has to attract per year before it can apply to have further words added to local road and motorway signs to attract more people.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Individual tourist attractions which are open for casual visits by the general public may be signed from motorways using the new white on brown tourist signs if they attract over 150,000 visitors per year, are situated within 20 miles of the nearest motorway junction, have adequate car parking and are open for more than 50 days per year.

Places providing accommodation and facilities fpr pre-booked customers are not eligible for white on brown tourist signs; if they also cater for casual visitors then their eligibility for signing will be considered on the basis of the number of casual visitors. Where a town, or a rural area, has a number of smaller attractions which in total have 150,000 visitors a year then a white on brown sign may be erected on the motorway directing drivers to an information board just off the motorway where they can stop and obtaim details of the various attractions in the area. Major holiday resort towns which are of sufficient traffic importance are already signed from motorways as primary destinations on the standard white on blue signs. The criteria for signing tourist attractions and resorts on local roads are a matter for the local highway authority.

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria he employs for the designation of a tourist attraction or resort on motorway signs.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The criteria and arrangements for the white on brown tourist signing are set out in circular Roads 3/86. To be eligible for tourist attraction signing from a motorway, the attraction must have over 150,000 visitors a year, be within 20 miles of a motorway, have adequate parking and be open for at least 50 days in the period 1 April to 31 October each year. Caravan parks, camp sites, youth hostels and hotels are not eligible for motorway signing.

Places providing accommodation and facilities for pre-booked customers are not eligible for white on brown tourist signs; if they also cater for casual visitors then their eligibilty for signing will be considered on the basis of the number of casual visitors. Resort towns, historic towns, or rural areas, which have a number of smaller attractions which in total meet the criteria for motorway signing, may be signed with a white on brown sign on the motorway directing drivers to an information board just off the motorway where they can obtain details of the individual attractions in the area. The individual attractions may be signed as approporiate on the local roads.

Mr. Neil Allison (Member's Correspondence)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport when the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth might expect a reply to his letters of 26 January, 4 March and 6 May, all of which refer to Mr. Neil Allison of Kenilworth.

Mr. David Mitchell: I have today written to my hon. Friend to explain the reasons for delay and to send a substantive reply to his query.

Merchant Shipping (Formal Investigations)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Christchurch of 6 July, Official Report, column 15, he will now list those formal investigations ordered under section 55 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1970 which he was including, in his answer of 29 June, Official Report, column 26, as being analogous with his stated policy on non-prosecution in the case of the Herald of Free Enterprise.

Mr. David Mitchell: In the past 10 years there have been 11 formal investigations held under the Merchant Shipping Acts, as follows:

Vessel
MFV Rotche/MFV Stroma II	1978	July 1977
MV Hero	1979	November 1977
MFV Boston Sea Ranger	1979	December 1977
MFV Do It Again	1979	January 1979
MV Kurdistan	1981	March 1979
MV Pool Fisher	1980	November 1979
MV Union Star and RNLB Solomon Browne	1983	December 1981
MV Grainville	1983	December 1981
MV European Gateway/MV Speedlink Vanguard	1983-84	December 1982
Marques	1985-86	June 1984
MV Herald of Free Enterprise	1987	March 1987

In the case of the Stroma II and Rotche, a prosecution was brought but the formal investigation was not held until after the criminal proceedings had been completed. It would not be fair to the parties involved for me to comment on whether or not criminal offences were thought to have been committed in the remaining cases, but in none of them did the Department initiate any prosecution.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iran

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will outline the action which he has initiated at the United Nations to protest about the arbitrary execution of members of the Baha'i faith in the Islamic Republic of Iran; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: For the last five years, including 1987, we have co-sponsored the resolution on human rights in Iran at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. These resolutions urged the Iranian Government to respect the human rights standards set out in the instruments to which it is party. The resolutions also established and renewed the appointment of the commission's special representative on Iran, including a specific mandate to investigate the treatment of Baha'is.

In 1985 and 1986 we also co-sponsored the resolutions on human rights in Iran at the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonweath Affairs (1) if he will raise with the United Nations Human Rights Commission allegations of the use of an electric guillotine to cut off fingers of prisoners during 1986 in the Islamic Republic of Iran detailed in a recent report by Amnesty International;

(2) if he will raise with the United Nations Human Rights Commission allegations of stoning to death of at least eight people during 1986 in the Islamic Republic of Iran detailed in a recent report by Amnesty International;

(3) if he will raise with the United Nations Human Rights Commission allegations of the use of torture, including floggings and mock executions in the Islamic Republic of Iran detailed in a recent report by Amnesty International.

Mr. Mellor: For the last five years, including 1987, we have co-sponsored the resolution on human rights in Iran at the United Nations Commission on Human Rights. At the next session of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in February 1988, we will again make clear our continued abhorrence of all violations of human rights in Iran.

Diplomatic Representation

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the total number of British diplomats remaining in British interests sections of friendly powers accredited to the Syrian Arab Republic, the Islamic Republic of Iran and the People's Socialist Libyan Arab Jamahirya; and what are the equivalent number of persons purporting to be diplomats from those same countries currently based in friendly embassies in Britain.

Mrs. Chalker: There are three diplomatic staff in the British interests section of the Australian embassy in Damascus, one in the British interests section of the Italian embassy in Tripoli and one in the British interests section of the Swedish embassy in Tehran. There are three diplomatic staff in the Syrian interests section of the Lebanese embassy in London, one in the Libyan interests section of the Saudi Arabian embassy and one in the Iranian embassy.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will list all known examples of involvement in terrorist incidents since 1974 of persons purporting to be diplomats accredited to the embassies in London of the Syrian Arab Republic, the Islamic Republic of Iran and the People's Socialist Libyan Arab Jamahirya, indicating in each case whether any diplomats subsequently returned to their country of origin at the request of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Mr. Mellor: In April 1984, the staff and occupants of the Libyan people's bureau in St. James's Square were expelled following an incident in which WPC Yvonne Fletcher was murdered by a shot fired from the people's bureau.

Following the arrest of Nezar Hindawi in April 1986, the Syrian Ambassador was asked to waive the diplomatic immunity of three attachés on his staff to enable police to question them about their involvement with Hindawi. When the Syrian authorities refused to meet our request, we informed the Ambassador that we required the attachés to be withdrawn within seven days.

On 24 October 1986, following the conviction of Nezar Hindawi, we announced that the United Kingdom was breaking off diplomatic relations with Syria. The Ambassador and the remaining seventeen members of his staff were given seven days in which to leave the country.

Spain

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British citizens have reported to United Kingdom consular staff that they have been (a) physically assaulted and (b) robbed in Spain in each of the past five years.

Mr. Eggar: I regret that the statistics requested are not available. Only in serious cases, or those in which consular officers are requested to take follow-up action, are records kept. Even for those it would require a disproportionate amount of time to provide figures in the categories requested.

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British citizens have died in Spain in each of the past five years.

Mr. Eggar: It is not mandatory for the deaths of British nationals overseas to be registered at our consulates, but the numbers of deaths of British nationals in Spain which have been so registered over the past five years are as follows:

	Number
1982	295
1983	401
1984	429
1985	350
1986	416

Figures relating to the deaths specifically of British citizens are not kept separately, but they are likely to represent a very high proportion of the figures given.

Blowpipe Missiles

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on representations made to Her Majesty's ambassador in Moscow by the Soviet Government on Monday 6 July about the supply of Blowpipe missiles to Afghan guerillas; and if he will list each of the specific allegations put to Her Majesty's ambassador and his reply to each.

Mr. Eggar: The Soviet Foreign Ministry made an oral statement to Her Majesty's ambassador in Moscow on 6 July. He undertook to report to London. Pravda published the statement on 8 July.

State Security

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions officials at the British embassy in Washington have had with representatives of the United States National Security Agency about the possibility of legal action to prevent publication of Peter Wright's book "Spycatcher" in the United States.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the answers that I gave to him on 3 and 10 July.

Iran—Iraq War

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on his meeting with representatives of the League of Arab States on 9 July regarding the war between Iran and Iraq.

Mr. Mellor: At their request, a delegation from the Arab League, led by the Foreign Minister of Jordan, visited London on 9 July to discuss the Iran-Iraq conflict. Similar delegations have visited the capitals of the other permanent members of the United Nations Security Council. They had talks with my right hon. and learned Friend the Foreign Secretary and with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

We emphasised our deep concern over the continuation of the conflict, which threatens the stability of the region and freedom of navigation in the Gulf.

The delegation expressed gratitude for our continuing efforts in New York, and all were agreed on the value of current United Nations activity aimed at an early mandatory Security Council resolution.

King of Morocco

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to whether the King of Morocco, or any member of his party, will be meeting representatives of any armaments manufacturers at any stage during his state visit beginning on 14 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: Representatives of a large number of British companies, including some with interests in arms manufacture, have been invited to functions during King Hassan's state visit.

Western Sahara

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will offer his services as a mediator between the Polisario Front and Morocco, with a view to ending the conflict in Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Mellor: No. We fully support the efforts already being made by the UN Secretary General to bring about a peaceful solution to the Western Sahara dispute.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members (Bleepers)

Mr. Barry Field asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will consider issuing hon. Members with a world-wide wrist bleeper to enable Parliament to be recalled during the recess in the case of a national emergency.

Mr. Wakeham: No. The Services Committee considered the question of radiopaging in its second report of 1986-87 (HC207). The Committee recommended against the House providing its own radiopaging service, but expressed the view that Members who wished to subscribe to such a service in connection with their parliamentary duties should be free to do so out of their office allowance.

My hon. Friend will no doubt wish to leave word as to his whereabouts with my right hon. Friend the Patronage Secretary before he goes away.

ENERGY

Coal Industry

13. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to meet the chairman of British Coal about the future of the industry; and if he will make a statement.

14. Mr. Orme asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal to discuss the future of the industry.

Mr. Parkinson: I had an initial meeting with the chairman on 29 June, and intend to meet him regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

17. Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he next plans to meet the chairman of British Coal to discuss coal prices.

Mr. Parkinson: I intend to meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

18. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to lay orders under sections 6 and 7 of the Coal Industry Act 1987.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I hope to do so shortly.

23. Mr. Barron asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of British Coal; and what issues were discussed.

Mr. Michael Spicer: My right hon. Friend and I met the chairman on 29 June, and intend to meet him regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

29. Mr. Sumberg asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will give details of the Government's financial support to British Coal for each financial year since 1979-80.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The information requested by my hon. Friend is as follows:

Financial Support to the Coal Industry (£ million)

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	Total
Deficit and Operating Grants	189	175	455	386	875	2,225	50	290	4,645

Total Support[2]	267	271	626	602	1,337	2,616	1,129	1,498	8,346

[1] Figures are on an accruals basis.
[2] This represents total Government support for the industry and includes RMPS amounts paid direct to redundant mineworkers.

In addition the Government has supported the following levels of capital investment by the coal industry.

	£ million
1979-80	661
1980-81	807
1981-82	812
1982-83	842
1983-84	702
1984-85	371
1985-86	660
1986-87	650
Total	5,505

31. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for Energy what has been the increase in labour productivity in the coal mining industry compared with 1983-84.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton).

37. Mr. Jack Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has yet had the opportunity to meet the chairman or board members of British Coal to discuss the future of the coal mining industry.

Mr. Parkinson: I intend to meet the chairman of British Coal regularly to discuss all aspects of the coal industry.

39. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on his plans for the coal industry.

41. Mr. Rogers asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of the coal industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The objectives agreed between the Government and the chairman of British Coal, Sir Robert Haslam, were announced to the House on 11 March. They remain valid.

42. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to privatise British Coal during the lifetime of the present Parliament.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We have no such plans.

Central Electricity Generating Board

15. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last had a meeting with the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board; and what subjects were discussed.

Mr. Parkinson: I have met the chairman once since joining the Department and will be meeting him on a regular basis in future.

Combined Heat and Power

16. Mr. Meale asked the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to promote the development of combined heat and power.

Mr. Peter Morrison: We are continuing to promote combined heat and power through the energy efficiency demonstration scheme and the energy efficiency survey scheme. We are also contributing to the cost of the studies in the lead cities.

30. Mr. Rost asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to meet representatives of the Combined Heat and Power Association.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have no immediate plans to meet representatives of the Combined Heat and Power Association.

Gas Bill Vouchers

19. Mr. Ian Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Energy when gas bill vouchers are to be dispatched; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The gas vouchers will be dispatched this week to qualifying shareholders who were on the register on 30 June. Some 1·2 million of the present 3 million shareholders chose vouchers; around 1·8 million chose the share bonus alternative.

North Sea Oil

20. Mr. McCartney asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on future prospects for the North sea oil industry.

21. Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the effects of the recent stability of world oil prices at higher levels on United Kingdom continental shelf oil production and new offshore development.

Mr. Peter Morrison: The signs are that development activity is beginning to pick up again in the United Kingdom sector of the North sea; many oil companies are now concentrating on the longer term and looking on the North sea as a priority area, as clearly demonstrated by the response to the recent 10th round of licensing.

Electricity Industry

22. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he plans to publish a consultation document on the privatisation on the electricity industry.

Mr. Michael Spicer: We are engaged in widespread consultation and will bring forward our proposals as soon as our consideration of the important issues involved is complete.

27. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of the electricity generating industry.

Mr. Parkinson: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) earlier today.

34. Mr. Allen McKay asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met the chairman of the Central Electricity Generating Board to discuss the construction of new power stations.

Mr. Parkinson: I met the chairman of the CEGB recently and we discussed a wide range of issues. Applications for consent to the construction of power stations are a matter for the CEGB and I have received no applications either for coal-fired or nuclear stations.

35. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Energy what plans he has to introduce a regulatory system for prices in the electricity supply industry when it is privatised.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Proper regulation will certainly be necessary and will depend on the structure of the privatised industry, which is currently under consideration.

36. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to make competition a priority when determining his plans for the privatisation of electricity.

Mr. Parkinson: Yes.

Mr. Ashton asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the future of the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Parkinson: The Government are working to secure a very successful future for the electricity supply industry in the private sector. We are urgently tackling the important issues involved, and consulting widely, and will bring forward proposals as soon as this work is complete.

Energy Efficiency

25. Mr. Couchman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what potential for improved energy efficiency in industry and commerce he can identify following Energy Efficiency Year.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Energy Efficiency Year was successful because it raised awareness of the cost-effective benefits of improved energy efficiency. Action already under way in industry and commerce is now leading to savings of over £500 million a year and we estimate that further annual savings of £2 billion are still possible through the introduction of cost-effective measures. This can be achieved only if managers and their staff continue to realise that the benefits of increased energy efficiency flow straight to the bottom line—benefiting customers and shareholders alike.

Offshore Licences

26. Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy what representations he has received concerning the 10th offshore licence awards announced on 18 May.

Mr. Peter Morrison: I have received no formal representations, but many successful applicants in the 10th Round have expressed satisfaction.

Privatisation

28. Mr. Eadie asked the Secretary of State for Energy what are his plans for privatisation in his Department's area of responsibility.

Mr. Parkinson: I shall be bringing forward proposals for privatisation of the electricity supply industry in England and Wales.

Offshore Energy Technology Board

32. Mr. Simon Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Energy if his hon. Friend the Minister of State, Department of Energy will continue to chair the Offshore Energy Technology Board.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Yes.

Nuclear Power Reactors

33. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for Energy what is his latest estimate of the number of foreign and United Kingdom civil nuclear power reactors, respectively.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The data are as follows:

Nuclear reactors connected to the grid at end-December 1986

	Reactors (No.)	Capacity (GW)
United Kingdom	38	10·2
Rest of World	359	263·5

Source: IAEA

Tidal Barrages

38. Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans for the future development of tidal barrages; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The Secretary of State announced in July 1986 a major extension for the United Kingdom's tidal energy programme. The programme of work on the Severn and Mersey tidal barrages and supporting generic studies are well under way and good progress is being made.

Coal-fired Power Stations

40. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he has any plans to introduce new coal-fired power stations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: It is for the CEGB to put forward applications for new power stations. I have received no application in respect of a coal-fired station, and it would be inappropriate for me to make a statement.

Fast Reactor Technology

43. Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Energy what progress has been made in the European collaborative programme on the development of fast reactor technology; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Joint work programmes have been agreed for over 80 R & D topics and work on these is being taken forward in member countries.

Radioactivity

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Energy what information he has about recent problems experienced by French nuclear reactors involving leaks of radioactive material.

Mr. Michael Spicer: Nothing significant has been reported to Her Majesty's Government under the bilateral agreement with France about recent problems at French nuclear reactors. Details of these problems are freely available and are to be found in a bi-monthly bulletin published by the French Ministry of Industry titled "Bulletin Sur La Sûreté des Installations Nucleaires".

British Gas

Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the recent performance of British Gas in relation to profits and standing charges.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Privatisation has brought new opportunities to the company and reinforced incentives for efficiency to the benefit of customers and shareholders alike. British Gas has announced profits on an historic cost basis of £1,293 million before tax.

At the same time, a 4·5 per cent. tariff reduction has been announced, with both rates per therm and standing charges being reduced.

The reduction passes on to tariff customers the lower gas purchase prices now forecast by British Gas, as well as efficiency gains, as required by the new regulatory system whose operation is monitored by OFGAS.

WALES

Public Libraries

44. Mr. Ray Powell asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will publish a table showing the level of expenditure on public libraries in Wales in each financial year since 1979.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is as follows:

Net expenditure on public library services (all Wales)

	£'000
1978-79	9,693
1979-80	11,009
1980-81	12,915
1981-82	14,120
1982-83	15,337
1983-84	16,233
1984-85	16,823
1985-86	17,327

Beef

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he is satisfied with the present state of the beef industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The December 1986 sample census figures show that the Welsh beef breeding herd has increased by 4·9 per cent. compared with December 1985 and there was an encouraging increase of 11·4 per cent. in the number of heifers in calf intended for the beef rearing herd.

The agreement obtained at the December 1986 Agriculture Council secured the beef variable premium scheme, under which £5·3 million was paid to producers in Wales in 1986-87, for a further two years, and took steps to cut back intervention. These changes will bring the regime more into line with market realities and provide producers with greater assurance for the longer-term stability of the sector. In addition, specialist beef producers continue to benefit from the suckler cow premium (increased to £33·40 per eligible animal for 1987-88) which was worth £3·5 million in Wales in 1985-86.

Out-Patient Waiting Lists

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales to what factors he attributes the 35 per cent. increase in the hospital out-patient waiting lists in Wales between 1979 and 1986.

Mr. Grist: The number of people on hospital out-patient waiting lists is determined by two factors: the number of patients referred to out-patient clinics and the number of people seen and thereby removed from the lists. The number of new out-patients seen during 1986 was greater than the number seen in 1979 by 17·7 per cent. The number on out-patient waiting lists rose despite this, because the rate of increase of referrals was faster than the rate of increase of out-patients seen.

Water Rates

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the average household bill for water rates for each regional water authority in Wales for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Mr. Grist: The information requested for the Welsh water authority is as follows:

Average domestic bill for unmeasured consumers (cash terms)

1979-80	49·08
1980-81	60·38

1981-82	66·76
1982-83	81·34
1983-84	86·35
1984-85	92·77
1985-86	103·91
1986-87	114·01
1987-88	122·61

Water Supplies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing the figures for the numbers of households where water supplies have been disconnected, showing where possible the reasons for disconnection for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Mr. Grist: The information is as follows:

Household disconnection for non-payment in Welsh Water Authority area

	Number
1984-85	90
1985-86	350
1986-87	950

Information on household disconnections prior to 1984-85 is not held centrally.

Radiation (Monitoring)

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he is satisfied with the extent and effectiveness of radiation monitoring conducted by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: Yes. Monitoring of radiocaesium levels in sheep is being undertaken on a regular basis at a number of locations both inside and around the boundaries of the restricted areas. In addition, where a producer wishes to move sheep out of the restricted area for marketing or flock management purposes, the sheep concerned are individually live monitored and those that are above the action level are marked to prevent their slaughter.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the scientific advice available to his Department on radio-caesium levels in hill land; and if he will give an indication of the latest advice available to him about the time period for which levels are likely to remain high enough to necessitate restrictions on sheep and lamb movements.

Mr. Peter Walker: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 28 April 1987, at column 67. The programme of research and monitoring is continuing and results will be published in the normal way.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish details of all radiation measurements conducted by his Department on grassland and sheepmeat since 1 January.

Mr. Peter Walker: The available data has already been published and copies placed in the Library of the House.

Sheep Movement Restrictions

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total value of compensation paid to date to farmers who have been affected by restrictions on movements of sheep and lambs.

Mr. Peter Walker: To date, some £2·7 million has been paid to producers in Wales affected by the restrictions on the movement and slaughter of sheep and lambs following the Chernobyl incident.

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total number of farm holdings and the number of sheep and lambs currently affected by the order restricting movements; in how many cases restrictions have been extended, and for what reason; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: There are roughly 335 holdings with over 200,000 sheep and lambs within the restricted areas. Restrictions have been reintroduced in an area west of Llanuwchllyn where monitoring has identified readings above the action level in some sheep.

DEFENCE

Export Sales

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the countries of the world to which the United Kingdom has exported arms since May 1979.

Mr. Sainsbury: A list of 121 countries with which contracts for military equipment were signed since May 1979 and which were notified to the Ministry of Defence is as follows. As such, the list, although substantially correct, may not be comprehensive, because not all private orders, particularly those of a minor nature, are notified to the Defence Export Services Organisation.

Intermediate Nuclear Forces

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he has assessed the implications for the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation's policy of flexible response of the present intermediate nuclear forces discussions.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) on 6 July, at column 58.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will specify the number of nuclear weapons (a) possessed and (b) operated under dual key arrangements by the United Kingdom in each of the following ranges: (i) 0 to 500 km, (ii) 500 to 1,000 km, (iii) 1,000 to 5,500 km and (iv) 5,500 km and above; and if he will further subdivide each category into land, sea and air-based systems.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Details on the number of United Kingdom nuclear warheads is classified, as is the number of United States nuclear weapons assigned to United Kingdom nuclear delivery systems. However, unclassified information about United Kingdom nuclear forces is summarised in paragraph 404 of volume 1 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1986" (Cmnd 9763). I also refer the hon. Member to annex A, volume 1, of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" (Cmnd 101-I), in particular figures 15 and 16, which show NATO's nuclear systems according to range.

Naval History

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement as to the extent to which naval history is taught at Dartmouth; and if he will take steps to ensure that young officers are adequately instructed as to the traditions of the Royal Navy.

Mr. Freeman: The naval history course at Britannia Royal naval college, Dartmouth, is taught during the first term of naval general training. The term is 14 weeks in length and the course is made up of 14 lectures, followed by a written examination.

Proposals currently under consideration would increase the amount of time available for the teaching of naval history, and allow a more strategic and thematic approach to be adopted.

Training will continue to include instruction in the values and traditions of the Royal Navy. They are, and will continue to be, an essential part of the training of young officers at Dartmouth.

Jaguar and Tornado (Accidents)

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer to the hon. Member for Bradford, South of Tuesday 30 June, Official Report, column 51, how many civilians have been killed or injured and what is the value of property damaged in Jaguar and Tornado aircraft accidents since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: No civilian injuries or fatalities resulted from the accidents referred to in my answer of 30 June. As the hon. Member will be aware, the Ministry of Defence makes every effort to ensure that members of the public do not suffer loss or material damage as a result of Royal Air Force operations. Anyone so affected is encouraged to submit a claim for compensation under long-standing procedures. A complete record of compensation claims for the period in question cannot be compiled at such short notice. However, since 1982, claims to the value of £30,000 have been settled as a result of Tornado and Jaguar accidents. Claims originating from recent accidents are still under consideration.

Army Cadet Corps (Inner Cities)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to establish an Army Cadet Corps unit in Leicester and in other inner-city areas.

Mr. Freeman: I will answer shortly.

El Salvador (Training Facilities)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if there are any plans to extend training facilities to any further cadets or forces personnel from El Salvador; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: There are no current applications for military training assistance from the Government of El Salvador.

Stornoway Airport

Mr. Macdonald asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans there are to extend or to reduce housing provision at Stornoway airport; what plans there are for the future military development of Stornoway airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: There are no current plans to increase or decrease married quarter holdings at RAF Stornoway, as the existing houses are expected to be able to cope with the planned manning levels. There are no plans to extend the development or increase the military usage of Stornoway airport.

Type 23 Frigate

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to ask for tenders for the next batch of type 23 frigates.

Mr. Sainsbury: Decisions on further follow-on orders for type 23 frigates will be made when appropriate.

Defence Expenditure

Mr. Bevan asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he will publish his response to the first report from the Defence Committee on "Expenditure on Major Defence Projects: Accountability to the House of Commons", H.C. 340, Session 1986-87; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Younger: Yes. The Committee has already been notified that I shall arrange for the first defence equipment project report to be submitted to it in 1988. I note that the Committee's proposal in paragraph 33 of its report concerning highly classified projects is addressed to its successor Committee.

EMPLOYMENT

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment (a) what data are available to indicate that women who may wish to work part-time also wish to be eligible for fewer and lesser employment rights and benefits than women working full-time and (b) whether he will list the data.

Mr. Nicholls: I know of no such data, but there is some evidence that current employment protection legislation, including that intended to protect part-time workers, deters employers from creating new jobs.

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will list the statistical information which illustrates that the YTS has revolutionised the opportunities girls have to obtain vocational qualifications as stated in the Home Office report: "The Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women: A Review."

Mr. Nicholls: YTS is a two-year equal opportunity training scheme aiming to provide trainees of both sexes with vocational qualifications. Suitable qualifications are being identified on behalf of the Manpower Services Commission by a YTS certification board. These qualifications are progressively coming on stream in YTS. Until the board has completed its work and a full range of qualifications is available in YTS, it is not possible to provide reliable statistical data on the general impact of qualifications across YTS. The latest information applicable to one-year YTS indicates that the acquisition of qualifications is equally divided between males and females. The fact that YTS provides widespread and equal opportunities means that the scheme has broken new ground for opening up opportunities for girls.

Employment and Family Commitments

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether his Department is monitoring the extent to which parental leave and flexible working arrangements, designed to help parents combine employment and family commitments, are being adopted by employers in response to the Government's encouragement, rather than a statutory obligation, to do so.

Mr. Nicholls: My Department is not aware of any surveys on the extent to which employers and employees have agreed arrangements specifically for the purpose of helping working parents to combine employment and family commitments. However, it closely monitors all research carried out into the general question of flexible working patterns, and has itself commissioned and carried out studies yielding relevant information.

Training (Disabled People)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will give the number of disabled people who have applied for places on the new job training scheme; and if he will express this number as a percentage of the total number of applicants to the scheme;

(2) if he will give the number of disabled people who have been accepted for places on the new job training scheme; and if he will express this number as a percentage of the total number of people accepted on the scheme.

Mr. Cope: Information on the number of disabled people who have applied for places on the new job training scheme is not available. However, research carried out during the pilot stage of the scheme showed that 13 per cent. of trainees had a health or disability problem. A comprehensive follow-up survey of trainees is planned to take place later in the year.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline any measures, including any special funding arrangements, available to ensure that disabled people derive maximum benefit from the job training scheme.

Mr. Cope: Arrangements have been made to ensure equality of opportunity in the new job training scheme for people with disabilities. Managing agents have a contractual commitment to provide equal opportunities in their scheme regardless of sex, race or disability and will in due course have to satisfy the criterion on equal opportunities for approved training organisation status. The scheme design allows training programmes to be drawn up according to the particular needs and abilities of individuals, including people with disabilities.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment how the criteria for a place on the job training scheme co-ordinate with criteria for other programmes, including the youth training scheme, community programme and new workers scheme, with regard to disabled people.

Mr. Cope: The new job training scheme is open to all those aged 18 or over who have been signing at an unemployment benefit office for at least the last six months. It is one of a number of MSC programmes which provide a wide range of opportunities for people with disabilities.

The eligibility criteria programmes vary and overlap depending on the objectives of the individual programmes. Specialist careers officers or the disablement resettlement officers, as appropriate, help disabled people to decide on the opportunities most suitable for them.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the voluntary organisations of and for disabled people which were consulted prior to the introduction of the job training scheme.

Mr. Cope: The Manpower Services Commission consulted a wide range of organisations, including the voluntary sector and organisations dealing with disabled people, before the national extension of the new job training scheme in April 1987. The scheme has also been considered at length by the commission and its advisory bodies.

Four-day Week

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will estimate the number of full-time employees in (a) manufacturing, and (b) service industries whose terms of employment allow them to work a four-day week.

Mr. Lee: Information from which to produce such estimates is not available. Some national collective agreements specify the number of days per week to be worked and details of these are included in the Department's publication "Time Rates of Wages and Hours of Work", a copy of which is in the Library.

Crown Hotel Classification Scheme

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Employment what results there are to date following the introduction of the crown hotel classification scheme; and how many hotels have failed to meet the specification.

Mr. Lee: To date, over 9,800 applications for registration under the crown classification scheme have been received by the English tourist board. According to English tourist board figures, less than 20 have failed to meet the criteria for registration.

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to extend the crown rating system to all hotels, guest houses and holiday flats.

Mr. Lee: This is a matter for the English tourist board. However, I understand that, as well as the existing voluntary crown classification scheme covering all serviced accommodation and the rose award grading and classification scheme for holiday parks, the board is planning to introduce a verification scheme for self-catering accommodation before the end of the year.

Tourism

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Employment on what criteria grants are provided for tourist projects such as the building of new local accommodation or the funding of tourist attractions.

Mr. Lee: The English tourist board can provide financial assistance under section 4 of the Development of Tourism Act 1969 to help with the capital cost of tourism projects in England which would not otherwise be able to go ahead, either at all or in the planned form or timescale. Projects must be commercially viable and make a positive contribution to employment and to the tourism potential of the area concerned.

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for Employment what help he provides for private enterprise schemes within the tourist industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lee: Private sector tourism projects are eligible for consideration under the section 4 scheme of selective financial assistance run by the English tourist board. In 1986-87, the ETB approved offers of assistance totalling £14 million, the major part of which went to private sector schemes. Private companies can also benefit both directly and indirectly from marketing activities carried out by the ETB and the regional tourist boards in England and, overseas, by the British Tourist Authority.

YTS

Mr. Gregory asked the Secretary of State for Employment what are the most recent statistics for the number of YTS places taken up in tourism-related jobs.

Mr. Lee: There is no precise definition of tourism-related YTS places, but in 1985-86, the most recent year for which information is currently available, there were around 8,600 starts in Great Britain on YTS places which were classified to the hotel and catering industry, which includes tourist accommodation. In addition, the Association of British Travel Agents and a number of individual tour operators run YTS schemes offering over 2,000 places for young people wishing to train in the travel industry.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Grocott asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his latest estimate in £ sterling of the average cost per head in the United Kingdom of the United Kingdom contribution to the common agricultural policy.

Mr. MacGregor: The United Kingdom contributes to the EC budget as a whole, rather than to individual items of expenditure, at approximately 20 per cent. abated by the Fontainebleau mechanism.

The 1987 budget provides for expenditure of 24,174 mecu (£16,670 million) under the common agricultural policy. The forecast of United Kingdom receipts from the CAP in 1987-88 is £1,399 million.

Intervention Stocks

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish a table showing the various amounts of particular foodstuffs held in private and public intervention stocks within the European Economic Community; and if he will also publish the comparable totals for each commodity at the same time in each of the previous five years.

Mr. MacGregor [pursuant to his reply, 1 July 1987, c. 121]: A note setting out the volume of Community intervention stocks and private storage stocks, including those of foodstuffs, on the latest available dates has been deposited in the Library of the House, and updated monthly, since January 1985. The most recent note was deposited on 1 July. Comparable information on EC stock levels in years previous to 1985 could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Intervention Stores

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how much has been spent on maintaining European Economic Community food intervention stores in London by borough in each of the past four years.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 9 July 1987, c. 221]: I regret that records are not kept in a form which enables this information to be readily extracted. Expenditure on storage and related costs in the United Kingdom was

1983-84	48,623
1984-85	57,655
1985-86	124,595
1986-87	[1]128,521

CIVIL SERVICE

Ministerial Responsibility

96. Mr. Franks asked the Minister for the Civil Service if he will list his precise responsibilities for the organisation, management and overall efficiency of the Home Civil Service.

Mr. Luce: I would refer my hon. Friend to the recent MPO report "The Challenge of Change in the Civil Service", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

General Medical Council

99. Mr. Spearing asked the Minister for the Civil Service if the Lord President of the Council is satisfied with the operation of paragraph 60 of the General Medical Council (Preliminary Proceeding Committee and Professional Conduct Committee) (Procedure Rules) Order of Council 1980, (S.I., 1980, No. 858) concerning transcripts of proceedings of the professional conduct committee of the General Medical Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: Yes. My right hon. and noble Friend is satisfied that the General Medical Council's procedure conforms with the rule approved by the Privy Council.

Central Unit on Purchasing

100. Sir David Price asked the Minister for the Civil Service if the Government intend to retain the Central Unit on Purchasing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The joint Cabinet Office/Treasury central unit on purchasing was set up in 1985 for a period of three years. Its future will be reviewed nearer to the end of the three-year period.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Income Tax (Childminding Costs)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his latest estimate of the tax expenditure costs of allowing working mothers to put their childminding costs up to a maximum of £35 a week against income tax.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The cost of relief for the child-minding costs of working mothers would depend on a number of factors such as whether the relief would be available only for children of pre-school age or for older children as well; whether the relief would be given against the total income of a married couple or would be restricted to the income of the working mother; the treatment of relief for payments made to relatives and the extent to which relief was in practice taken up by mothers.

As an illustration, if all working mothers of children aged under five received relief on child-minding expenses of £35 per week, the direct revenue cost, in a full year at 1987-88 levels, would be about £350 million. This assumes that, for a married woman, relief would be available against her and her husband's joint income for tax purposes. In practice, the cost would be dependent on the level of take-up of the relief.

British Petroleum plc

Mr. Wallace asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what arrangements have been made for the further sale of Government-held shares in British Petroleum plc; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I announced on 18 March at column 1011 that, subject to market conditions, the Government will sell their remaining shareholding in British Petroleum during this financial year. The proceeds will be received in instalments, of which the first will be in 1987-88. The Government have appointed N M Rothschild and Sons Ltd. as their main financial advisers and are discussing arrangements for the sale with them and with British Petroleum. Further announcements will be made in due course.

Free Ports

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans Her Majesty's Government have to extend free ports.

Mr. Brooke: None at present. The Government will review the future of free ports at the end of the five-year trial period.

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he is satisfied with the working of free ports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Yes. The free ports regime was established for a five-year trial period to see whether the benefits forecast by the designated operators can be realised. To date, some free ports have made substantial progress; others have been less successful. We will continue to monitor the experiment over the remainder of its five-year life.

Mr. Parry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many new jobs have been created at the Liverpool free port at the latest date.

Mr. Brooke: Approximately 100 new jobs in manufacturing and distribution have been created at Liverpool free port.

Personal Incomes

Mr. Wigley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table indicating, on the basis of the most recent information available, what the average pre-tax per capita personal income is in each of the standard regions of the United Kingdom; and what are the corresponding figures for each year since 1979.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The estimates of the average pre-tax personal income per head, in each of the standard regions for each year since 1979 are as follows:

Region	1979	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985
United Kingdom	3,040	3,594	3,941	4,315	4,646	4,971	5,368
North	2,781	3,345	3,724	4,122	4,344	4,489	4,946
Yorkshire and Humberside	2,849	3,393	3,661	4,082	4,348	4,420	4,941
East Midlands	2,941	3,458	3,800	4,187	4,512	4,886	5,128
East Anglia	2,870	3,426	3,731	4,175	4,564	4,919	5,291
South East	3,441	4,072	4,511	4,852	5,276	5,692	6,114
Greater London	3,671	4,314	4,796	5,206	5,691	6,106	6,631
Rest of South East	3,284	3,908	4,322	4,617	5,004	5,421	5,778
South West	2,940	3,520	3,832	4,233	4,571	4,908	5,171
West Midlands	2,944	3,388	3,618	3,963	4,237	4,620	5,012

Northern Ireland	2,503	2,895	3,183	3,595	3,769	4,058	4,341

Pensioners

Mr. Marlow asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the cost of disregarding for tax purposes the first (a) £5 per week, (b) £10 per week and (c) £20 per week of occupational pensions for pensioners over 65 years of age.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The full-year costs at 1987-88 levels are estimated to be about £150 million, £290 million and £510 million, respectively. These estimates are on the basis that a wife with a pension in her own right would be entitled to a separate tax exemption.

Customs Officers (Dispute)

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the effects of the dispute involving customs officers in terms of delays to goods imports.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Coinage

Mr. Nigel Griffiths asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of the consultation process in relation to the proposed changes in the coinage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lilley: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Civil Servants

Mr. Grocott asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many full-time employees in the Civil Service have terms of employment that allow them to work a four-day week.

Mr. Brooke: The terms of employment for full-time civil servants are such that, wherever practicable, it is standard practice for the conditioned hours to be worked over a five-day week. However, it is possible for departmental managements to agree to the conditioned hours being worked over a different period. There is no central record of the number of civil servants who may be covered by agreements which allow them to work a four-day week.

THE ARTS

North-west Region

48. Mr. Stott asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet the director of North-West Arts to discuss the level of financial support in the north-west for arts education projects.

52. Mr. Cunliffe asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of North-West Arts to discuss the level of funding for community arts projects in the north-west.

Mr. Luce: I met the director of North-West Arts during my tour of the region last April, when I visited several arts education projects and community arts centres.

56. Mrs. Wise asked the Minister for the Arts how much is spent on the arts per capita in the north-west.

66. Miss Lestor asked the Minister for the Arts how much is spent on the arts per capita in the north-west.

Mr. Luce: The Policy Studies Institute's publication "Facts about the arts 2" gives the following information:

> Local authority expenditure per head on arts, museums and galleries by region, 1983-84: North-West £1·84.
> Arts Council expenditure per head by region, 1984-85: North-West £0·78.

These are the latest figures available.

58. Mr. Eastham asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of North-West Arts to discuss the level of expenditure per head on the arts in the north-west.

83. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Minister for the Arts when he last visited North-West Arts to discuss the level of arts funding in Manchester.

Mr. Luce: On 9 and 10 April.

Northern Region

51. Ms. Armstrong asked the Minister for the Arts how much is spent on the arts per capita on the northern region.

64. Ms. Quin asked the Minister for the Arts how much is spent on the arts per capita in the northern region.

Mr. Luce: The Policy Studies Institute's publication "Facts about the arts 2" gives the following information:

Local authority expenditure per head on arts, museum and galleries by region, 1983-84: Northern £2·27.

Arts Council expenditure per head by region, 1984-85: Northern £1·13.

These are the latest figures available.

National Book Committee

53. Mr. Buchan asked the Minister for the Arts if he has any plans to meet the chairman and secretary of the National Book Committee.

Mr. Luce: I shall be meeting the chairman (Lady David) and other representatives from the literary world at the reception I am giving on 22 July.

British Film Institute

54. Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of the British Film Institute to discuss its future funding.

Mr. Luce: I met the director of the British Film Institute when I visited the John Paul Getty Conservation Centre, Berkhamstead, on 31 March.

90. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Minister for the Arts what information he has on the expenditure on cinema exhibitions by the British Film Institute.

Mr. Luce: The BFI made available £842,590 for cinema exhibitions in 1986-87, as follows:

£472,590 funded directly by the BFI.
£225,000 via Regional Arts Associations.
£120,000 cinema capital funding.
£25,000 Regional exhibitions.

South-west Region

55. Ms. Primarolo asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of South West Arts to discuss the level of financial support for community arts in Bristol.

Mr. Luce: I met the director of South West Arts during my visit to the region on 19 March and we discussed a wide range of topics, including community arts.

Disabled Persons

57. Mr. Hannam asked the Minister for the Arts how much is spent on the standards of physical access to the arts for the disabled.

Mr. Luce: No national figures are available. The Arts Council has published a code of practice in which theatres and other arts bodies are encouraged to do all that they can to improve such access, and other funding bodies are acting similarly.

Museums

59. Mr. Butler asked the Minister for the Arts whether he has any plans to seek to alter the powers of museums to dispose of items that are duplicated, surplus to requirements, or not salient to the aims of the museums concerned.

Mr. Luce: Most of the national museums and galleries which I sponsor already have limited statutory powers to dispose of items from the collections but I will bear in mind the point made by my hon. Friend.

Glasgow

60. Mr. Maxton asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet the Scottish Arts Council to discuss additional funding for the arts in Glasgow.

71. Dr. Godman asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet Glasgow city council to discuss additional funding for the arts in Glasgow.

Mr. Luce: I expect to meet the chairman of the Scottish Arts Council when I visit the Edinburgh festival in August. No doubt we shall discuss the funding of the arts in Scotland.

Public Libraries

61. Mr. Haynes asked the Minister for the Arts how many public libraries have closed since 1979.

86. Mr. Barron asked the Minister for the Arts how many public libraries have closed since 1979.

92. Mr. Andrew Smith asked the Minister for the Arts how many public libraries have closed in England and Wales since 1979.

Mr. Luce: The total number of service points in England increased from 13,948 in 1979-80 to 17,236 in 1985-86. The number of static libraries decreased from 3,638 to 3,411 over the same period. The reduction has occurred mainly in small libraries opening less than 10 hours a week, reflecting in part a general trend to replace small branches, which provided a very limited service, with mobiles and with larger branches covering a wider area. Responsibility for public libraries in Wales rests with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Public Library Book Funds

75. Mr. Madden asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish details of the level of financial support for public library book funds in England since 1979.

Mr. Luce: Support for public library book funds in England is a matter for the local authorities. Statistics published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy, and supplemented by information obtained by my office, indicate the following level of funding:

£ million

	1979-80	1980-81	1981-82	1982-83	1983-84	1984-85	1985-86
Expenditure on books	38·3	40·2	44·0	49·9	54·3	56·2	60·7
Number of authorities responding	108	106	108	108	108	107	108

Statistics for 1986-87 are not yet available.

76. Mrs. Mahon asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the Library Association to discuss the level of funding for public libraries.

79. Mrs. Beckett asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the Library Association to discuss the level of financial support for public library book funds.

87. Mrs. Walley asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received from the Library Association about the level of financial support for public library book funds.

Mr. Luce: I last met a formal delegation from the Library Association on 13 January 1986 when our discussions included funding for public libraries. I have since met and corresponded with individual officers of the association on this and other subjects on a number of occasions.

Business Sponsorship

62. Mr. Chapman asked the Minister for the Arts if he will make a statement about the progress of the business sponsorship incentive scheme for the arts.

Mr. Luce: The business sponsorship incentive scheme continues to be successful. It has brought £12·4 million new money into the arts and over 400 businesses have sponsored the arts for the first time.

As I announced in the House on 12 March, at column 494, I intend to continue the scheme in 1988-89.

Films and Television

63. Mr. Gwilym Jones asked the Minister for the Arts what steps he is taking to help preserve classic works of films and television.

Mr. Luce: The British Film Institute maintains the national film archive, and, thanks particularly to the great generosity of private donors, it has recently been able to open a new conservation centre at Berkhamsted. In all, the institute spent £5·2 million on the building of the centre and the transfer and preservation of film in 1986-87. Negotiations are in progress about extending the television coverage of the archive. The national heritage memorial fund donated £62,000 to the archive in 1986-87, specifically for the preservation of classic films.

Tourism

65. Sir David Price asked the Minister for the Arts if he regularly meets representatives of the tourist industry to discuss matters of mutual interest; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: I am always happy to meet representatives of the tourist industry to discuss matters of mutual interest.

My officials regularly attend meetings of the heritage committee of the British Tourist Authority and keep closely in touch with tourism initiatives.

Wales

67. Mr. Rogers asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the Welsh Arts Council to discuss future arts funding for Wales.

70. Mr. Morgan asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet the Welsh Arts Council to discuss the level of arts funding in Cardiff.

Mr. Luce: I met the chairman of the Welsh Arts Council shortly after his appointment last year and have no immediate plans for another meeting. The level of arts funding in Cardiff is a matter for the Welsh Arts Council.

Per Capita Expenditure

68. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Minister for the Arts how much is spent per capita on the arts in Wales, England and Scotland.

69. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Minister for the Arts what is the level of arts expenditure per head in Wales.

Mr. Luce: Central Government and local authority expenditures per capita on the arts in 1983-84 are shown in the Policy Studies Institute's publication "Facts about the Arts 2", as follows:

	Central Government	Local Authorities	Total
England	3·6	3·6	7·2
Wales	5·0	1·9	6·9
Scotland	4·1	5·2	9·3

These are the latest figures available.

Royal Shakespeare Company

72. Mr. Fisher asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the governors of the Royal Shakespeare Company to discuss its future funding.

Mr. Luce: I met the chairman, Mr. Geoffrey Cass, recently and discussed with him matters of mutual interest including the company's financial position; but the level of funding to the RSC is a matter for the Arts Council, and I understand that the two bodies are in discussion on the matter.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about the future funding of the Royal Shakespeare Company.

Mr. Luce: I have received some representations, but would refer the hon. Member to my reply to the question from the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) earlier today.

Scotland

73. Mr. Wilson asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet the Scottish Arts Council to discuss the level of future funding for theatre in Scotland.

Mr. Luce: I expect that the subject will be discussed when I meet the chairman of the Scottish Arts Council during my visit to the Edinburgh international festival in August.

London

74. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Minister for the Arts whether he will publish a table showing the level of arts funding by each London borough.

Mr. Luce: Details of the estimated expenditure of local authorities on leisure and recreation services are published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy in the annual booklet "Leisure and Recreation Statistics". No records in more detail are available to my office.

82. Ms. Richardson asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of Greater London Arts to discuss the level of arts funding by London boroughs.

85. Mr. Boateng asked the Minister for the Arts whether he plans to meet the director of Greater London Arts to discuss the level of arts funding by London boroughs.

Mr. Luce: On 12 May last.

84. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Minister for the Arts what representations he has received about cuts in arts funding in London boroughs.

Mr. Luce: I have received a few representations, especially on the decision of Tower Hamlets to cut out all funding for the arts.

Arts Marketing Scheme

77. Mr. Maples asked the Minister for the Arts whether independent museums and galleries are eligible for the arts marketing scheme.

Mr. Luce: The arts marketing scheme is open to arts organisations, including museums and galleries, in receipt of Government or local authority funding. The primary purpose of the scheme is to encourage better marketing of the subsidised arts, but where regional or group marketing initiatives are involved applications which include independent museums and galleries may be considered.

Wales (Theatre Companies)

78. Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the Welsh Arts Council to discuss the future of forming theatre companies in Wales.

Mr. Luce: I met the chairman of the Welsh Arts Council shortly after his appointment last year and discussed a wide range of matters with him.

Regional Opera

80. Mr. Ashby asked the Minister for the Arts when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Arts Council to discuss regional opera.

Mr. Luce: I meet the chairman regularly, and opera provision is among the subjects we discuss.

Northern Regional Arts Association

81. Miss Mowlam asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of Northern Arts to discuss the funding of the Northern Regional Arts Association.

Mr. Luce: In Newcastle, last week.

Payroll Giving Scheme

88. Mr. Rowe asked the Minister for the Arts what plans he has to increase awareness of the payroll giving scheme among arts organisations.

Mr. Luce: My office has published a guide to the scheme for arts bodies, "Payroll Giving: making it work for the arts", explaining how it operates and what they can do to encourage payroll donations. This has been widely distributed amongst arts organisations, national museums and galleries, regional arts associations, and those individuals who had requested the previous OAL guide "New Tax Benefits for the Arts". My office has also arranged to distribute 3,000 copies of the leaflet in the Arts Council's bulletin this month. Action now rests with arts charities themselves to take advantage of these new benefits.

Public Libraries (Community Services)

89. Mr. Illsley asked the Minister for the Arts what information he has on the level of expenditure by public libraries on community services.

Mr. Luce: No statistics are currently available on the amount spent by public libraries on "community services". The publication by my office of a model costing system for public libraries, which I announced on 7 July, at column 15, should enable library authorities to cost the specific services they provide.

National Gallery

91. Mr. Knox asked the Minister for the Arts when he next plans to meet the director of the National Gallery to discuss the proposed extension.

Mr. Luce: I have no immediate plans to do so but I and my officials keep in close touch with the National Gallery over this important development.

Yorkshire

93. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Minister for the Arts when he last met the director of Performing Arts to discuss the funding of community arts projects in Yorkshire.

Mr. Luce: I met the director of Yorkshire Arts during my visit to Leeds on 2 April, and discussed the funding of the arts in Yorkshire, including the provision made for community arts.

Leeds

94. Mr. Battle asked the Minister for the Arts what information he has about the level of employment in the arts in Leeds.

Mr. Luce: The Regional Arts Association is aware of over 400 people employed in the arts in Leeds on a regular basis. In addition, several hundred people are engaged on short-term contract work. The major arts employers in the city are Opera North, Leeds Playhouse and the Leeds Art Gallery.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Retirement Pensioners (Television Licences)

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is his estimate of the number of retirement pensioners holding (a) a colour and (b) a black and white television licence;

(2) what estimates are available to him of the cost of introducing (a) a 50 per cent. colour television licence fee and (b) a 50 per cent. black and white television licence fee for all retirement pensioners.

Mr. Renton: The latest available estimates of pensioner households with television licences, which are for 31 December 1985, are given in the following table. The estimated annual losses of revenue from introducing 50 per cent. colour and monochrome television licence fees for pensioner households, assuming no change to the current accommodation and residential care concessionary scheme or in the pattern of television ownership, would be of the order of £160 million and £7 million respectively.

Estimated number of pensioner households[1] with television licences United Kingdom Thousands of households.

	Colour	Monochrome	Total
Number of households covered by the current accommodation and residential care scheme	350	50	400
Number of households with full-rate licences	5,500	800	6,300

[1] Households containing one or more pensioners.

Police Interviews (Tape Recording)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made on tape recording statements; and how soon he expects all statements made to the police by suspects to be tape recorded.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Following the completion of successful field trials last year, my right hon. Friend indicated his desire to see tape recording introduced on a nationwide basis by 1991. Provision has been made in the police capital works programme to enable forces to undertake necessary building work and to purchase appropriate equipment. The need to carry out such work, to provide some further training for the officers who will do the interviewing and to ensure that local arrangements are introduced when other agencies in the criminal justice system are also ready for them, requires that this introduction should be phased. I understand that in a number of force areas, the tape recording of interviews is already taking place in accordance with locally agreed arrangements and that it is working well.

General Election

Mr. Forth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give, for the general election of 11 June, details of those candidates whose election addresses were queried or rejected, for the purpose of Post Office delivery, by head postmasters.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Information of this kind is not recorded centrally. If my hon. Friend has some particular incident in mind, I should be pleased to hear from him.

Immigration

Mr. Fraser asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will review the working of the immigration rules relating to marriage.

Mr. Renton: The operation of the immigration rules, including those relating to marriage, is kept under regular review.

Magistrates Courts (Fines and Fees)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total income from fines and fees collected by magistrates courts in 1985-86.

Mr. John Patten: The total income from fines and fees collected by magistrates courts in England and Wales in 1985-86 was £143,146,000.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total income from fines and fees collected by magistrates courts since 1985-86.

Mr. John Patten: The total income from fines and fees collected by magistrates courts in 1986-87 in England and Wales was £159,045,000; and for the first quarter of 1987-88 it was £43,850,000.

Syrian Embassy (Bomb Incident)

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any Arab terrorists were subsequently identified by police inquiries as responsible for the incident on 3 June 1985 when a bomb was placed outside the Syrian embassy in London; and whether any charges were subsequently brought against any person or persons.

Mr. Hurd: No one has been charged in connection with this incident. A suspect was arrested by the Italian authorities on 2 July 1985 in Rome in connection with the investigation of a number of terrorist offences throughout Europe. He was questioned by the Metropolitan police about the bomb at the Syrian Embassy in London on 3 June 1985. He has since been charged with an offence under Italian law and is at present awaiting trial in Italy.

Zircon Satellite

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis about the number of officers still working full-time on the case of disclosure of material relating to the Zircon satellite.

Mr. Hurd: I am informed that there are no Metropolitan police officers still working full-time on the case.

Crime

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of homicides involved drink in the last year for which figures are available;

(2) what proportion of rapes involved drink in the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. John Patten: Information on the use of alcohol in connection with notifiable offences is not collected centrally.

Terrorism

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many extensions of detention requested by the police under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 have been personally considered and granted or refused by (a) the Secretary of State for the Home Department, (b) a junior Minister for the Home Department, (c) a Home Office official, (d) the Secretary of State for another Department and (e) a junior Minister for another Department.

Mr. Hurd: Of the requests by the police for extensions of detention under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 made to the Secretary of State for the Home Department (a) my predecessor and I have personally considered 161 and granted 159 (b) a Minister of State or Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department considered 14 and granted 13 and (c) (d) and (e) none were decided by a Home Office official, or Secretary of State or junior Minister for another Department.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there are any plans to publish in his Department's quarterly statistics on the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts the numbers of complaints made against the police in relation to the Prevention of Terrorism Act which are made available to the Prevention of Terrorism Act Commissioner.

Mr. Hurd: No.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons excluded under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts were originally detained in London.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons excluded under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts 1974, 1976 and 1984 were excluded direct from prison after completing a prison term.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used to decide whether a person requesting a review of his exclusion order made under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1974, 1976 or 1984 is granted one.

Mr. Hurd: All exclusion orders now in force have been made under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1984. Orders made under this Act have a three-year life. Each order is reviewed about six months before it expires before I decide whether to make a new order on the expiry. In considering a request for a review of an exclusion order before that time, I take into account the factors which led to the making of the order and the time which has elapsed since it was made.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons whose exclusion order made under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts 1974 and 1976 and revoked during the three-year comprehensive review process had attended an interview with the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Hurd: The information requested is not readily available.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals were successfully contacted from 1984 in connection with the comprehensive review of exclusion orders made under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts 1974 and 1976 that were still in force.

Mr. Hurd: The information requested is not readily available, I will reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many excludees had attended interviews with a Home Office adviser prior to having their exclusion order revoked as a part of making representations against their order within the specified period following removal under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976 and 1984.

Mr. Hurd: Only under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 has someone who made representations against his exclusion order following removal from Great Britain or Northern Ireland of the United Kingdom had a right to an interview with an adviser. There have been six completed cases of representations, against exclusion orders made in Great Britain under that Act, following removal. In two of these cases, in both of which the excluded person had had an interview with an adviser, the Home Secretary revoked the exclusion order.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons were initially offered an interview with a Home Office adviser as part of the representations against their exclusion order under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Acts 1974, 1976 or 1984; and how many declined to attend.

Mr. Hurd: Twelve people were offered interviews with a Home Office adviser as part of the representations made against their exclusion order made under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1974. None declined to attend. Under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1976 there was, and there is under the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984, a statutory right for a person who has been served with notice of the making of an exclusion order to include in his or her representations against the order a request for a personal interview with an adviser. Under the 1976 Act, if the excluded person had not been removed with his consent from Great Britain or Northern Ireland or the United Kingdom, he or she had to be granted a personal interview with the adviser. Under the 1984 Act, this right extends to a person who has been removed.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals held under the international provisions of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 and against whom an extension of detention was authorised by the Secretary of State were (a) subsequently charged with an offence or (b) deported under the Immigration Act 1971.

Mr. Hurd: I shall reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many incidents of international terrorism there have been in (a) the Metropolitan police area, and (b) the rest of Britain during the following periods: (i) 1 January 1981 to 29 March 1984, and (b) since 30 March 1984 to the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Hurd: Statistics in the form requested are not available. The following table sets out the terrorist incidents which have taken place in Great Britain since 1981. These do not include incidents apparently caused by extremist nationalist or anarchist groups based in Great Britain, or by extremist animal rights activists.

	1981	May-December 1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	January-June 1987
Shooting incidents		1		3	2	3
Bombing incidents
exploded	9	3	4	6	2	2
neutralised or failed to explode	1	2	1	4	4		5
Arson attacks					1
Kidnappings	1			1
Hi jacking of aircraft		1

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals arrested on suspicion of involvement in international terrorism since 30 March 1984 were arrested under the ordinary criminal law rather than the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 in (a) the Metropolitan police area, and (b) the rest of Britain.

Mr. Hurd: The number of persons suspected of involvement in international terrorism who are arrested under other legislation than the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 is not recorded, and could not readily be obtained.

Ceremonial State Events (Traffic Congestion)

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on measures taken to minimise traffic congestion arising as a result of ceremonial state events occurring on weekdays.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am informed by the Commissioner that, prior to such events, the police plan alternative routes in consultation with other agencies, and that advance warning of likely congestion is given through signs and notices to the local media, motoring organisations and local businesses etc. On the day of the event, alternative routes are marked by the police and motoring organisations; police officers are posted to direct traffic; and local radio stations are given information on delays.

Citizenship

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to exempt from liability to pay the fee for people in receipt of supplementary benefit or family income support to enable them to register as British citizens before the deadline of 31 December.

Mr. Renton: No. The Government believe that it is right that those who wish to become British citizens should meet the cost of their registration. The cost of exemptions for some groups would increase the costs to be borne by other applicants.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will consider allowing people in receipt of supplementary benefit and family income supplement to be allowed to pay the fee for British citizenship in instalments beyond the deadline of 31 December.

Mr. Renton: I am not persuaded that it would be right to introduce such a system, which would increase costs and the time taken to finalise registration applications. Those who wish to apply for the relevant registration entitlements still have until the end of December to make arrangements to meet the cost of the fee, which has been held at £60 since April 1986.

Hit-and-Run Drivers (Sentencing Policy)

Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to increase the maximum sentence available to the courts on conviction of hit-and-run drivers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The road traffic law review, which was set up by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, is examining the scope and definition of road traffic offences and the penalties available. We have no plans to change existing legislation before considering its report, which is expected towards the end of the year.

Detained Persons (Police Cells)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many male and female prisoners were being held in police cells in England and Wales on each of the following dates: (a) 29 June, (b) 30 June, (c) 1 July, (d) 2 July, (e) 3 July, (f) 4 July, (g) 5 July, (h) 6 July, (i) 7 July and (j) 8 July.

Mr. John Patten: The only reliable figures available are obtained from a weekly census on Fridays. On 26 June, the number of prisoners being held in police cells in England and Wales was 411 males and 95 females; on 3 July, 511 males and 109 females; and on 10 July, 553 males and 95 females.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners were held in police cells in areas outside the Metropolitan police district during the period 29 June to 8 July.

Mr. John Patten: The only reliable figures available are obtained from a weekly census on Fridays. The number of prisoners held in police cells in areas outside the Metropolitan police district on 26 June and 3 and 10 July were 185, 264 and 311 respectively.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department in which police districts prisoners were held in police cells during the period 29 June to 8 July.

Mr. John Patten: Prisoners were held in police cells by each of the following police forces at some time during the period 29 June to 8 July:

Avon and Somerset
Bedfordshire
Cambridgeshire
Cheshire
City of London
Derbyshire
Essex
Gloucestershire
Greater Manchester
Hampshire
Kent
Lancashire
Merseyside
Metropolitan
Northamptonshire
North Wales
Nottinghamshire
South Yorkshire
Staffordshire
Suffolk
Thames Valley
West Mercia
West Midlands
West Yorkshire
Wiltshire

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many remand prisoners are currently being held in police cells in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: On 10 July 1987, 648 prisoners, most of whom would have been untried, were held in police cells in England and Wales.

Prospective Employees (Police Information)

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether he will initiate inquiries to see whether information is ever provided by the police to employers in relation to the recruitment of individuals;

(2) what instructions he has issued to the Metropolitan police about provision of information to the Economic League or its officials.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The principles governing the disclosure of police information to potential employers and others are set out in section 17 of the consolidated circular to the police on crime and kindred matters and Home Office circular 45/1986. A joint departmental circular issued on 17 July 1986 (Home Office circular 44/1986) sets out the arrangements for checks on people seeking positions in local authorities that give substantial access to children. Copies of these circulars are in the Library. We see no need to issue separate guidance to the Metropolitan police on these arrangements, which do not allow for the disclosure of information to private organisations such as the Economic League.

Economic League

Mr. Austin Mitchell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he hopes to publish the results of his inquiry into contacts between the police and the Economic League;

(2) why he chose the North Yorkshire police to investigate complaints about contacts between the Economic League and the North Yorkshire police;

(3) how many police forces were included in his inquiry into contacts between the police and the Economic League;

(4) how many officials of the Economic League were interviewed in the course of his inquiry into the League; what League records were examined; and whether access was refused to any such records.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It was considered sensible for the North Yorkshire police to undertake this investigation, since the claims about contacts were made in the course of an interview at the regional office of the Economic League in Skipton and were not specifically directed against that force. Since no evidence was found to support these claims, the investigation was not extended to other forces. Six officials of the League were contacted in the course of the inquiry. Records of names were examined; access to other records was not refused.

The outcome of the inquiry was announced in an answer to the hon. Member for Newcastle-Upon-Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) on 30 June 1987, at column 55-56.

Prison Population

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department for the most recent date available, what was the total prison population for England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: On 10 July 1987, the total prison population for England and Wales was 50,381. This does not include the 648 prisoners held in police cells.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, at the most recent date available, how many remand prisoners were being held in custody in England and Wales.

Mr. John Patten: On 31 May 1987 about 11,200 untried or convicted unsentenced prisoners were held in custody in England and Wales. This included 355 prisoners held in police cells, most of whom would have been untried.

Charity Commission

Mr. Cash asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will publish the report of Sir Philip Woodfield's efficiency scrutiny of the Charity Commission.

Mr. Hurd: We are placing copies of the report in the Libraries of both Houses and are arranging for copies to be sent to those who gave evidence to the scrutiny team. Arrangements are being made for printed publication by HMSO so that the report will be available more widely.

I should like to thank Sir Philip Woodfield and his team for the contribution they have made to this important issue.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Microwave Therapy

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will make a statement on the rules governing the administration of microwave therapy to patients;

(2) if he has any plans to change the rules governing the administration of microwave therapy to patients; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: The administration of microwave therapy to patients is a matter for the professional practitioners, the physiotherapists. The rules governing this treatment are those of professional practice which are incorporated in training approved by the appropriate professional body—the Chartered Society of Physiotherapy. We are not aware of any plans to change the rules.

The Department has given some consideration to possible dangers arising from unintentional exposure due to the electric and magnetic fields which inevitably surround operating microwave equipment. Work is currently in progress on defining possible risks and setting limits for exposure but to date there is no evidence to suggest that there is any significant risk, provided all persons not receiving treatment remain outside the immediate zone of influence of the operating microwave equipment.

Departmental Forms (Lewisham)

Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the reason for the delay in supplying an order of his Department's invalid care allowance claim forms, supplementary benefit, mobility allowance and attendance claim forms and leaflets to Lewisham social services department; and what is the average time in which such orders are processed.

Mr. Portillo: I understand that an order was dispatched to Lewisham on Monday 6 July. Over the past few months the demand for leaflets, particularly bulk orders, has been very high and remains at a high level. This increase in requests has affected the normal working of the leaflets unit and has created substantial delays, sometimes running into several weeks.

I am aware of the many problems this delay can cause. Discussions are currently taking place on various options to overcome these difficulties and include the option to use an outside agency to help clear the backlog of orders. As soon as a decision has been reached it will be implemented quickly.

Hip Operations (Waiting Times)

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list district health authorities where the waiting time for hip replacements is less than six months.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. Reliable estimates at district health authority level cannot be made from the sample information held centrally.

Invalid Care Allowance

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there is only one telephone line for each half of the alphabet for all inquiries about the payment of invalid care allowance; what is the average delay in paying back claims; and what improvements he intends to institute to ensure that cases receive their entitlement as quickly as possible.

Mr. Scott: Five telephone lines are available for inquiries of the invalid care allowance unit at Preston which currently takes an average of 19·2 weeks to process a backdated claim. We are taking all practical steps to reduce this period.

Cumberlege Report

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what plans he has to publish a response to the Cumberlege report entitled "Neighbourhood Nursing—A Focus for Care".

Mr. Newton: We are still considering the issues which emerged from the consultations on the community nursing review, and will respond as soon as possible.

Retirement Pension

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures, for each year since 1978, comparing the annual percentage increases in the basic state retirement pension, for each of a single person and a married couple, with increases in (a) the retail prices index, (b) the index of average earnings and (c) the net earnings (after income tax and national insurance contribution) at average earnings of a single person and a married couple.

Mr. Scott: The table shows the increase at uprating dates in each year for each of the items specified.

per cent.

	1978	1979	1980	November 1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	July [1] 1986	April [1] 1987

[3] Average earnings index, whole economy, seasonally adjusted.
[4] Based on provisional earnings figures for July 1986 and April 1987.

Mr. Winnick asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will now supply the information requested by the hon. Member for Walsall, North as to the amount paid in £ sterling equivalent in state pension to the retired in other European Economic Community countries and the amount currently paid out in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Scott: There is nothing I can usefully add to my reply to the hon. Member on 8 July at column 171.

Supplementary Benefit

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many new claims for supplementary benefit were submitted and accepted during each year since 1980; and how many dependants as well as claimants were involved in each case.

Mr. Portillo: The table shows the total number of claims for supplementary benefit, and the total number where a payment was made, in each year since 1980. (These include repeat claims made by the same person; there are no separate figures on the numbers of people who made claims.) I regret that no figures are available on the numbers of dependants involved.

	Claims made	Payments made
1980-81	5,488,399	4,004,964
1981-82	5,653,331	4,073,740
1982-83	5,995,965	4,374,982
1983-84	6,031,233	4,646,030
1984-85	6,175,094	4,909,437
1985-86	5,881,790	4,307,714
1986-87	5,613,323	4,053,295

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will arrange for a one-off single payment to supplementary benefit claimants to enable those eligible to register as British citizens before the deadline of 31 December.

Mr. Scott: There is no provision in the supplementary benefit regulations for single payments to be made for Home Office citizenship fees. Supplementary benefit is intended to cover necessary living expenses, not the cost of acquiring the rights of citizenship.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will state whether disabled people at present in receipt of supplementary benefit at the long-term rate will continue to receive that rate during training under the job training scheme.

Mr. Scott: Yes. The long-term scale rate is used in calculating entitlement to supplementary allowance while a person participates in the job training scheme if he was entitled to that rate when he started the course or becomes entitled during the course.

AIDS

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what advice he has given to the dental profession to prevent the spread of AIDS.

Mr. Newton: The Chief Dental Officer issued guidance to all dentists in April last year which stressed the importance of following high standards of cross-infection control when treating all patients, including the use of operating gloves by all dentists and close support staff when treating patients. The advice was in line with previous advice on clinical procedures recommended by the expert group on hepatitis in dentistry in 1979. Following those simple procedures will minimise exposure to the virus during the course of dental treatment.

The Chief Dental Officer also wrote to dentists in September 1986 advising against the use of jet injectors for multiple purposes by dentists. This guidance too relates to control of cross infection. The need to issue further guidance is kept under regular review.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether his Department's statistics on AIDS victims include people other than those suffering from Kaposi's sarcoma and/or pneumocystis pneumonia;

(2) what are his Department's latest estimates for the numbers (a) infected and (b) dead from AIDS or HIV-related disease.

Mr. Newton: Statistics on AIDS are based on reports to the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre (CDSC) and the Communicable Disease (Scotland) Unit (CD(S)U). These statistics include people suffering from conditions other than Kaposi's sarcoma and or pneumocystis carinii pneumonia, but these two diagnoses form the presenting features in more than half the reported cases. The definition of AIDS established at the Centres for Disease Control (CDC) in Atlanta, covers a number of other diagnoses, including other opportunistic infections. This definition is currently under review by CDC.

The number of AIDS cases and people who have died from AIDS as reported to CDSC and CD(S)U was published on 6 July. A copy of the publication has been placed in the Library. There will also be cases of HIV-related illness, and possibly some deaths, amongst people who have not progressed to AIDS. These cases will not be included in the CDSC and CD(S)U AIDS figures.

I gave our current estimate of the number of people infected with HIV in my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Sir D. Price) on 7 July at column 123.

Housing Benefit

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will update the figures given in his reply to the hon. Member for Norfolk, North (Mr. Howell) Official Report, column 541, 2 February, showing the number of recipients of housing benefits since 1979-80; and if he will estimate the effect on the number of people in receipt of means-tested benefit of the proposed community charge, assuming that rate rebates are replaced by community charge rebates.

Mr. Portillo: The numbers of recipients of housing benefits since 1979-80, according to the latest available information, are as follows:

Average number of recipients (Great Britain)

Thousands

Year	Rent rebates	Rent allowances	Rate rebates[2]
1979-80	1,205	220	3,065
1980-81	1,330	240	3,350
1981-82	1,590	250	3,700
1982-83[1]	3,050	260	5,320

[1] Figures for 1982-83 include those local authority tenants receiving housing assistance in supplementary benefit who in November 1982 were included in the partial start of the housing benefits scheme.

[2] Most recipients of rent rebates-allowances also receive rate rebates. Rate rebate recipients include owner occupiers.

[3] Estimates for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are provisional and are subject to revision. Estimates for earlier years may be subject to minor revision.

The only estimates currently available on the number of people who would be eligible for a community charge rebate are in the Green paper "Paying for Local Rates" (Cmnd. 9714). Annex J of the paper estimates the number at 7,660,000 and sets out the assumptions on which this is based.

Benefits

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of people in receipt of unemployment benefit in the Fife, Central constituency at (a) June 1979, (b) June 1983 and (c) June 1987.

Mr. Portillo: The information requested, at the nearest available dates, is given in the following table:

Number of persons receiving unemployment benefit

	May 1979	May 1983	February 1987
Glenrothes UBO	873	1,605	1,676
Leven & Methil UBO	730	1,308	1,659

Resettlement Units

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the progress of the review bodies established to develop alternative provision to the existing resettlement units in England and Wales.

Mr. Portillo: In two cases, Brighton and Bristol, proposals for the replacement of units have been agreed and the providers are taking steps to bring the facilities into operation.

Eight other teams are expected to put proposals forward in the next few months. In seven cases development workers have been appointed or are about to be appointed to help review teams take things forward.

The Wales review team has produced a consultative document on its plans for replacement provision and this was the subject of a conference in May attended by representatives from the local authority and voluntary sectors.

Abortions

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the total number of abortions which have been performed under the Abortion Act 1967 (a) on persons coming from Northern Ireland and (b) on persons from the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Newton: The numbers of notifications of abortions carried out under the Abortion Act 1977 from 27 April 1968 to 31 December 1986 to women usually resident in Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic are 20,957 and 41,548 respectively.

Speech Therapists

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many vacancies for speech therapists in (a) inner London, (b) Greater London and (c) England and Wales remained unfilled at the most recent convenient date; and what steps are being taken to recruit or train speech therapists.

Mr. Newton: I regret that information on vacancy levels is not collected centrally. Recruitment of speech therapists is a matter for individual health authorities. Training of speech therapists takes place within institutions of higher education on courses recognised (under S.I. 1985 No. 47) by the College of Speech Therapists as providing suitable training for work in the National Health Service. The number of people entering employment as speech therapists with health authorities has recently been rising by about 9 per cent. a year.

Supplementary Benefit and Residential Care

Mr. Tom Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what conclusions he has drawn from the report of the joint working party on supplementary benefit and residential care.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the Firth committee on supplementary benefit and residential care has reported.

Mr. Newton: We have received the report and are making arrangements for its publication later this month. We have drawn no conclusions from it, but will be considering it in the context of other studies, including in particular that of Sir Roy Griffiths in relation to community care.

Obstetricians and Gynaecologists (Session Contract)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from the call of the Royal College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists about its session contract in relation to the demands of private practice.

Mrs. Currie: None.

Private Patients

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will give for each year since 1979 (a) in both money terms and real terms the income received from private in-patients and (b) the number of such patients in each payment category;

(2) what arrangements exist to ensure that no profits accrued from national charges to private patients as a result of health authorities with relatively high private patient costs opting out of the national system and establishing their own charges;

(3) if he will list (a) those health authorities which have chosen to set their own charges to private patients for all treatment and (b) those health authorities which have chosen to set their own charges to private patients for some treatments.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what information is available to his Department about the impact on consultants' commitment to National Health Service work of the growth of private practice.

Mr. Newton: I am not aware of any evidence that consultants' commitment to NHS work has been affected by the growth in private practice.

National Health Service consultants may hold whole-time, maximum part-time or part-time contracts. Whole-time consultants, who may undertake private practice limited to the value of 10 per cent. of their National Health Service salary, and maximum part-time consultants, who may undertake private practice without specific limit for a slightly lower National Health Service salary, are both expected to devote substantially the whole of their professional time to the National Health Service. Since the introduction of the current contract in 1980, there have been variations from year to year in the proportion of consultants with each type of contract, but over the period as a whole there has been a slight increase in the proportion of contracts which are whole-time.

HIV Virus

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) which variants of the HIV virus are known to escape detection by current tests; and what are his Department's estimates of their prevalence;

(2) by what procedures his Department monitors the continuing development of variants of the HIV virus.

Mr. Newton: New retroviruses known collectively as HIV2 have been identified in West Africa. They may be variations of the same virus but are distinct from HIV. Test systems in current use for HIV do not reliably detect antibody to these viruses.

Samples from selected individuals who may have been at risk from infection with these viruses are being monitored by the Public Health Laboratory Service and other virology laboratories. This monitoring shows no evidence of HIV2 being prevalent in the United Kingdom.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many unemployed people have been disqualified from unemployment benefit on grounds of voluntary unemployment at each unemployment benefit office in Greater London since the new rules came into operation in October 1986; in how many cases the disqualification was for the maximum period; and what were the comparable figures for a similar period in 1983.

Mr. Portillo: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NHS Resources

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy towards the proposal from the Institute of Health Service Management, the British Medical Association and the Royal College of Nursing that at the minimum Health Service spending should be maintained as a proportion of national income with additional finance to cover demographic change and new problems such as AIDS.

Mr. Newton: We are studying the report's analysis and comments, taking account of the fact that the proper measure of the National Health Service is the record and growing amount of treatment and care it provides.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the latest percentage estimates of the increased need for the National Health Service resources due to demographic change in each year from 1970 to 1995.

Mr. Newton: The following figures are the latest available estimates of changes in demographic demand on hospital and community health services for each year from 1972-73 to 1995-96 (estimates for earlier years are not readily available):

	Per cent. change
1972-73	0·0
1973-74	0·0
1974-75	0·0
1975-76	0·0
1976-77	0·1
1977-78	0·3
1978-79	1·0
1979-80	1·2
1980-81	1·1
1981-82	0·4
1982-83	0·4
1983-84	0·5
1984-85	0·6
1985-86	1·3
1986-87	1·1
1987-88	1·0
1988-89	1·0
1989-90	1·0
1990-91	0·9
1991-92	0·7
1992-93	0·6
1993-94	0·3
1994-95	0·4
1995-96	0·9

The effect of demographic changes is not identified separately from other pressures for the family practitioner services which are demand-led, but changes in population structure, and especially increases in the number of very elderly people, clearly lead to increased demand for these services as well.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will cause to be sent to all doctors concerned with the granting of his Department's benefits a package of up-to-date information on myalgic encephalomyelitis with a particular emphasis on the diagnostic problems.

Mrs. Currie: No. It is not the Department's policy to advise the medical profession on clinical practice.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will meet the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association and medical organisations to discuss ways on which general practitioners could be made better informed about the complaint.

Mrs. Currie: If they will write to me, I shall be pleased to receive and consider any representations from the Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Association.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will take steps to discover whether people suffering from myalgic encephalomyelitis have problems obtaining his Departmant's benefits because of difficulties in diagnosing the disease.

Mr. Scott: Decisions by the independent adjudicating authorities about entitlement to incapacity or disablement benefits depend on medical statements that the claimant is incapable of work or suffers from the prescribed level or type of disablement. Doctors providing such statements are asked to give as full and accurate a diagnosis as the available evidence allows, but inability to provide the specific cause of the claimant's symptoms would not debar him from benefit (except in the case of prescribed industrial diseases). Problems as envisaged by the right hon. Member therefore ought not to arise.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are receiving invalidity benefit because they are suffering from myalgic encephalomyelitis.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form required. However, in the 1 per cent. sample of cases taken at 30 March 1985 there were seven people receiving invalidity benefit who were classified according to the international classification of diseases as cases of encephalitis, myelitis, and encephalomyelitis. As the sample and actual numbers are both small, grossing up this number may produce an inaccurate figure.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what estimates are available to him about the number of people suffering from myalgic encephalomyelitis.

Mrs. Currie: No statistics about the incidence of this disease are collected centrally.

Manchester FPC (Ophthalmic Prescriptions)

Mr. Meacher asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the audit investigation report into the Manchester family practitioner committee concerning ophthalmic prescriptions, as outlined in his letter to the hon. Member for Oldham, West of 27 February is now complete; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received a report from the auditors and I expect to write to the hon. Member shortly.

Nobrium

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the exclusion of Nobrium capsules from the National Health Service limited list; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: We have received a number of letters about the exclusion of Nobrium capsules from National Health Service prescription under the selected list scheme. I understand that the Advisory Committee on National Health Service Drugs, which keeps the selected list scheme under review, has not considered it necessary to review the position of Nobrium capsules, nor has it received any representations from the manufacturers.

BT (Total Care Service)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) whether health authorities are paying for British Telecom's total care service where this is required by their employees due to on-call responsibilities;

(2) whether general practitioners and other independent contractors can claim back from the National Health Service the cost of purchasing British Telecom's total care service where this is required to replace emergency fault repair cover;

(3) what is the total cost to the family practitioner service budget of British Telecom's total care service; and whether this cost has been taken into account in his Department's estimates;

(4) what is the total cost to the hospital and community health service budget of health authorities paying for British Telecom's total care service; whether this cost is reimbursed to health authorities; and whether health authority allocations have been increased to cover this new cost.

Mr. Newton: The total cost (including VAT) to the National Health Service of British Telecom's total care service is not yet known. Discussion will continue with BT on the application of the agreed charging arrangements which allow for the total cost to be influenced by the level of demands made.

The cost of these BT services to the hospital and community health service will be met by health authorities from within their existing allocations for the current financial year. It is for health authorities to decide whether they wish all or some of their on-call staff to receive this BT service for which the authority would pay.

Provision for the costs (including VAT) of British Telecom's total care service for priority telephone fault repairs for general medical practitioners (including trainees) and pharmacists in contract with family practitioner committees in England is included in the Department's estimates and central settlement by the Department has been agreed and will be made. To the extent that general dental practitioners and opticians in contract with family practitioner committees take up the service any costs arising would form part of the normal remuneration arrangements and be indirectly reimbursed through the NHS scale of fees.

Hospitals (Planning)

Mr. Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the optimal size on clinical grounds in terms of the number of in-patient beds currently recommended to district health authorities when planning new general hospitals.

Mrs. Currie: There is no universally applicable optimal size.

Each proposal must be looked at separately on its merits, balancing a range of factors. Although most district general hospitals now being built range between 400 and 800 beds, exceptions do occur. Factors taken into account would include:

size and characteristics of the catchment area and its population;

whether regional or supra-regional services are provided at the hospital; whether facilities (eg. geriatric or mental illness beds) are already provided elsewhere in the district; provision of a large enough range of services to meet the needs both of patients brought in following accidents or emergencies and non-emergency cases from the waiting lists; provision for a large enough population of patients in the specialties provided to ensure that staff have sufficient experience to maintain their skills and thus provide a high quality service; provision for sufficient patients to provide the experience required by the training bodies in order to employ junior doctors and nurses in training; provision for sufficient patients in the various specialties to make economic use of expensive equipment;

the state of existing NHS stock;

local social and geographical factors eg difficulties in travelling.

Clarke v Chief Adjudication Officer

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the implications of the decision of the European Court in the recent case of Clarke v Chief Adjudication Officer for Government policy on eligibility for disability benefits; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what are the implications of the decision of the European Court in the case of Clarke v Chief Adjudication Officer for the entitlement of married women who have been incapable of work since May 1984 to severe disablement allowance, under the passporting arrangements for former claimants of housewives' non-contributory invalidity pension;

(3) what steps the Government are taking to comply with the European Court's decision in the case of Clarke v Chief Adjudication Officer.

Mr. Scott: The European Court's judgment in the case of Clarke v Chief Adjudication Officer was in answer to a question referred by a social security commissioner concerning Mrs. J. B. Clarke's entitlement to severe disablement allowance (SDA).

The commissioner now has to give his decision on Mrs. Clarke's claim. It would be premature to make any statement about Government action on the judgment in advance of the commissioner's decision. An announcement will be made as soon as possible thereafter.

Mrs. Beckett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, in the recent case of Clarke v Chief Adjudication Officer, what questions were referred by the Social Security Commissioner to the European Court.

Mr. Scott: The question referred for determination by the European Court was:

"Does Article 4(1) of Council Directive 79/7/EEC have a direct effect such that a woman can from 22 December 1984 qualify for an invalidity benefit by reason of her having before that date satisfied conditions sufficient to enable a man to qualify for that benefit notwithstanding that she did not also before that date satisfy a further condition applicable under domestic law only to a class of woman of whom she was one?".

Community Pharmacists

Mr. Bill Michie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received from community pharmacists in Sheffield and nationally requesting an increase in advance payment to take account of the cashflow problems being caused by the non-processing of claims for refund of value added tax.

Mr. Newton: In addition to a number of representations from the Sheffield local pharmaceutical committee, we have received representations from the Pharmaceutical Services Negotiating Committee, three family practitioner committees and five pharmacists.

NHS (Annual Report)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to publish the annual report of the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: Later this year.

NHS (Employees)

Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are employed in the National Health Service; what was the comparable figure for 1979; and if he will break down both figures to show the tasks for which they were employed.

Mr. Newton: The figures requested are shown in the table.

For non-medical staff, numbers (actual head counts) are not available centrally for 1979 on a consistent basis with those for latter years; we have given therefore a whole-time equivalent (WTE) comparison for 1979 and 1986. Whole-time equivalent figures for September 1986 are still on a provisional basis.

For medical and dental staff, figures comparable with the available non-medical figures have been used to retain consistency and comparability of England totals.

Severe Weather Payments

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many exceptional cold weather payments were made by region in 1986-87.

Mr. Scott: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply shortly.

Food Imports (Radiation Levels)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what testing methods are recommended or approved for importers to ensure that food imports have not been treated with ionizing radiation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Acute Hospital Services (Liverpool)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many beds will be provided at the Liverpool royal infirmary following the relocation of services from St. Paul's eye hospital and the seamen's dispensary;

(2) what are the estimated savings to the Liverpool area health authority from the location of all obstetric and gynaecology services to the former Liverpool royal infirmary; and if he will make a statement;

(3) what will be the estimated cost of the relocation of the St. Paul's eye hospital and the seamen's dispensary to the Liverpool royal infirmary;

(4) what will be the estimated cost to the Liverpool area health authority of the relocation of all obstetrics and gynaecology services to the former Liverpool royal infirmary;

(5) how many beds will be provided at the Liverpool royal infirmary site following the location of all obstetric and gynaecology services.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 10 July 1987]: The Liverpool health authority's plans for reshaping the pattern of acute hospital services in Liverpool are described in its draft strategy, which was issued for consultation at the beginning of June. Firm plans cannot be properly formulated until that consultation exercise is completed on 31 August 1987. I understand that all Members whose constituencies cover Liverpool have been sent copies of the document and invited to comment on the proposals. The hon. Member may therefore wish to write to the chairman of the Liverpool health authority.

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out in the Official Report the figures for the non-emergency patient journeys run under the auspices of the London ambulance service for each of the first two quarters of 1987 in the format of his reply of 5 March, Official Report, column 679, showing percentage change with the respective quarters in 1984.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 10 July 1987]: The information requested for the first quarter is given in the table. The information for the second quarter will not be available for several weeks.

On the introduction of new rotas for ambulance persons in March 1986 extra resources were diverted into the emergency side of the service. This has allowed the London ambulance service to deal with the increased number of 999 calls as well as to cut down the average response times to emergencies.

Cancer Screening

34. Mr. Patchett asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the target level of accuracy in National Health Service pathology laboratories for dealing with cervical smears.

37. Mr. Bradley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what provision he has made to monitor the standards of accuracy of cervical smear tests.

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to safeguard, in the rest of the United Kingdom, the accuracy of smear tests for cervical cancer, following recent errors which have been shown to have occurred in the Liverpool area health authority.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her replies, 30 June 1987, c. 69-70]: Monitoring of standards of accuracy in pathology laboratories is undertaken by pathologists themselves, for example, through their participation in external quality assessment schemes. Target levels of accuracy for NHS pathology laboratories are not laid down centrally.

A revised health circular on cervical cancer screening which is in preparation will include guidance on arrangements for quality control in laboratories in which cervical smears are examined. We shall certainly take into account any lessons that can be learnt from the problems which arose in Liverpool health authority.

Kidney Transplants

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the latest figure for the change in the number of kidney transplants over a convenient 12-month period.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 30 June 1987, c. 79]: Figures for the change over the most recent 12-month period may be misleading because of significant variation within the period. The number of cadaveric kidney transplants reported to the United Kingdom transplant service for a series of six-monthly periods is as follows:

	Number of transplants
1 June 1985—30 November 1985	672
1 December 1985—31 May 1986	726
1 June 1986—30 November 1986	766
1 December 1986—31 May 1987	646

These figures refer to National Health Service operations within the United Kingdom. We are currently awaiting the advice of a working party established to examine ways of increasing the availability of organs for transplant. For further details I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Mr. McNair-Wilson) on 9 July 1987.

ENVIRONMENT

Rates

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the estimated 1987-88 total annual receipts for rates net of rebates in England and Wales; and what percentage this represents of forecast local government expenditure for 1987-88.

Mr. Howard: Local authorities' income from domestic and non-domestic ratepayers, net of rebates, in England and Wales in 1987-88 is estimated at £15 billion. This represents 48 per cent. of estimated local government expenditure (defined as local authority net revenue expenditure for RSG purposes).

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place with the National Association of Parish Councils on the impact of the proposed community charge; and what was the outcome.

Mr. Howard: Officials from the Department of the Environment met representatives of the National Association of Local Councils on 5 November 1986 to discuss these issues. NALC wrote to my predecessor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Brent, North (Sir R. Boyson) in February requesting a meeting to which he agreed; I understand that NALC intend to take up that invitation in due course. I shall of course be happy to honour my predecessor's commitment.

Mrs. Wise asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many women he estimates will become liable to pay the proposed community charge, despite having no personal income.

Mr. Howard: No firm figures are available. However data from the family expenditure survey suggests that there may be about 2·9 million women over the age of 18 with no regular personal income from employment, investment or state benefits (excluding child benefit). Almost all of these are wives not in paid employment.

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many civil servants in all Departments are currently involved in preparation for the implementation of the poll tax.

Mr. Howard: Twenty-one staff in the Department of the Environment, 10 in the Scottish Office and three in the Welsh Office are engaged full time on all aspects of the reform of local government finance. A further 21 staff in the Department of the Environment and 36 staff in other central Departments are involved, as part of their other duties, in contributing to this work.

Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on how the proposed unified business rate and the community charge will affect landlords; and whether they will be required to collect the community charge from their tenants.

Mr. Howard: When the new system of local government finance is in operation, landlords will no longer pay rates in respect of the residential property occupied by their tenants. Adult tenants will pay the community charge in the same way as other adults.

In the minority of multi-occupied properties, where it would be impractical to register tenants individually for the community charge, local authorities will be able to apply a collective community charge. This will be paid to the local authority by the landlord, who will recover contributions from each adult tenant.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will assess the likely cost to Leeds city council of collecting a community charge as opposed to domestic rates; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1987]: Our preliminary estimate is that the cost of collecting the community charge may be, broadly, up to twice the cost of collecting domestic rates. However, the cost to an individual local authority will largely depend on how far it is successful in reducing unit costs. We estimate that almost twice as many people will pay the community charge as pay domestic rates.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning special provision under the community charge for ministers of religion.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 56]: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations about special provision under the community charge for ministers of religion. These include representations from the Churches Main Committee and several diocesan secretaries.

Inner Area Programme

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the inner area programme bids submitted for 1987-88 indicating which have been approved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Trippier: The information requested is as shown in the table. I expect to issue further approvals shortly.

Rating Reform

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the House of Commons Library the Government's study of the expected numbers of community charge payers as a proportion of those obliged to pay.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his answer, 7 July 1987, column 140]: My right hon. Friend has not undertaken a study of the kind referred to by the hon. Member. Registration for and enforcement of the community charge will be a local authority responsibility. We intend to give authorities the powers to ensure that this task is undertaken effectively and efficiently, and we see no reason why they should not achieve very high registration and payment rates.

Greater London

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what (a) ceremonial and (b) other functions flow from the continued existence of the county of Greater London following abolition of the Greater London council; and what is the cost of these to public funds for the most recent 12 months period for which figures are available.

Mr. Chope: The functions of the former GLC were transferred to new and existing bodies in accordance with the provisions of the Local Government Act 1985. Aggregate information on the cost of providing ceremonial or other functions across Greater London is not available.

Empty Dwellings

Mr. Wheeler asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many vacant flats and houses there are in the ownership of the London borough of Ealing.

Mr. Waldegrave: The latest information available to the Department is for the council's vacant housing within its own area and is in the authority's housing investment programme return for 1 April 1986, which is in the Library.

Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the most recent list available from his Department's estate action team, of schemes where local authorities have disposed of empty dwellings to property developers; if he will state the purpose of this list, how it has been compiled, and how frequently it is updated; who has been sent a copy of this list; and why they have received a copy.

Mr. Waldegrave: The most recent list of schemes involving the disposal of local authority empty dwellings to private developers compiled by my Department is given in the table.

This information is gathered from local authorities and from developers, but is not necessarily comprehensive since local authorities are not required to seek the Secretary of State's consent or to inform the Department when they are disposing of empty housing at the best price.

This information is assembled by the Department as part of its routine assembly of factual material which is used to assist in the assessment of housing policy and performance. The information has been provided on request to local authorities, housing developers and members of the public. The list is updated as and when new information is received.

Poll Tax

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about which Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries use a poll tax to finance public expenditure; and which Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development countries use a poll tax to finance state education.

Mr. Howard: I refer my hon. Friend to annex K of the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714), which comments on international comparisons.

Local Authority Expenditure

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish figures for each local authority, and for the latest available year, setting out the main components of local authority expenditure, and showing expenditure separately on education, fire and police in relation to population.

Mr. Chope: I have today placed the information in the House of Commons Library.

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish, for each class of local authority and for local authorities in total, the percentage increase in current expenditure in cash between (a) 1978-79 and 1987-88 and (b) 1981-82 and 1987-88.

Mr. Ridley: The information for English authorities is as follows:

Percentage increases in net current expenditure

	1978-79 to 1987-88	1981-82 to 1987-88
Shire Counties	136	52
Shire Districts	120	54
Metropolitan Areas [1]	137	48
Greater London Area [2]	150	54
All England	138	52

[1] Comprising Metropolitan Counties, Metropolitan Districts, and Metropolitan Authorities for Police, Fire and Civil Defence and Transport.

[2] Comprising ILEA, GLC, City of London, Inner and Outer London boroughs, Metropolitan Police and the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority.

Dr Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list in the Official Report, for each local authority in England, the increases in current and total expenditure from 1986-87, revised estimates to 1987-88, showing in each case the political complexion of the authority; and if he will provide overall average figures by political control.

Mr. Ridley: I have today placed this information in the House of Commons Library.

Cayman Turtle Farm

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the Government's implementation of the convention on international trade in endangered species conference resolution 2.12 with respect to the Cayman turtle farm in the Cayman Islands.

Mr. Ridley: The Cayman turtle farm has not taken turtles or eggs from the wild since 1978 and the Government consider that the 1979 conference resolution 2.12 should not be applied retrospectively to the farm. The operations of the farm are, however, structured to meet the breeding criteria that the resolution lays down.

New Towns

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of houses currently managed by each of the new town corporations.

Mrs. Roe: On 31 March 1987, the numbers of dwellings for rent owned by new town corporations were as follows:

	Numbers
Milton Keynes	13,049
Peterborough	6,842
Runcorn	9,049
Telford	8,742
Warrington	4,891

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the value of the assets of each of the remaining new town development corporations.

Mrs. Roe: With effect from the 1986-87 financial year, new town development corporations are required to show information on the value of their property assets in their annual accounts. I will write to the hon. Member with the information requested when the 1986-87 accounts have been received from all the development corporations.

Enterprise Zones

Mr. Anderson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to end the special attractions and advantages to firms which locate in enterprise zones; and whether the cut-off of financial incentive will be immediate or tapered.

Mr. Trippier: Under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, the designation order for each enterprise zone specifies the period for which the area concerned is to remain an EZ. When that period ends the financial benefits of the EZ will cease immediately.

Urban Development Corporations

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for monitoring the employment effects of urban development corporations.

Mr. Trippier: Information on this subject is published in the urban development corporations' annual reports and in the public expenditure White Paper.

Nuclear Waste

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has about which countries other than the United Kingdom are carrying out research into the disposal of intermediate level nuclear waste under the sea bed using coastal sites.

Mr. Moynihan: I have information about the disposal facility under the Baltic at Forsmark in Sweden and about preliminary studies for a similar facility in Finland. I understand that France and Japan are also considering disposal under the sea bed near the coast.

Urban Regeneration Grants

Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a comprehensive statement on the operation of urban regeneration grants giving details of numbers approved, paid, and submitted in each region and the proportion the grant is of the projects approved.

Mr. Trippier: Urban regeneration grant is one of the measures which the Government have introduced in order to encourage new private investment in cities and towns which have been affected by the loss of employment in traditional industries and to bring derelict or unoccupied land or buildings in these areas back into use. URG is paid direct to developers with proposals for the reclamation and redevelopment of large urban sites of 20 acres or more or for the refurbishment of very large buildings or groups of buildings of 250,000 sq ft of floor space or more. Priority will be given to projects which give the best prospects of private sector investment, and minimise the net outlay by the public sector, in those areas which already have priority under the Government's urban programme. I am greatly encouraged by the amount of interest in URG since the scheme was launched in April. A number of sites, located mainly in the midlands and the north, have been drawn to the Department's attention as possible candidates for URG and I hope it will not be too long before I am able to announce the first offers of assistance.

In the meantime, I would urge private sector developers and property owners with sites which they consider may fit the criteria for URG to get in touch with my Department, from where more detailed guidance can be obtained.

Housing Legislation

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when his Department plans to issue a White Paper on the Government's proposals for the reform of housing legislation; when the consultative papers will be published; and what subject areas will be covered.

Mr. Waldegrave: These matters are being considered.

Southgarth West

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to be in a position to reply to the letter of 11 May from the hon. Member for South Shields about Southgarth West.

Mr. Ridley: As soon as my formal decision on this matter is announced, which is likely to be very soon.

Housing (Durham)

Mr. Steinberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will tabulate for each year since 1979, at constant 1987 prices, the amount requested by Durham city council for its housing investment programme allocation and the amount actually approved by his Department.

Mr. Waldegrave: The position has changed since 1979, in that local housing authorities nationally now fund more than half their capital expenditure from capital receipts, rather than from housing investment programme allocations made by the Department. The proposed capital programmes shown by authorities in their HIP submissions cannot therefore be compared directly with their HIP allocations.

Since 1979 the final HIP allocations made to Durham city council, and its total capital expenditure on housing, have been as follows:

£ million 1987-88 prices

	HIP allocation	Expenditure
1979-80	4·785	4·849
1980-81	3·279	3·121
1981-82	2·667	2·589
1982-83	3·550	4·836
1983-84	2·650	4·621
1984-85	2·940	4·712
1985-86	2·400	4·304
1986-87	1·913	[2]5·666
1987-88	[1]1·784	—

[1] Initial HIP allocation
[2] Estimated by the authority on Form HIP2 in July 1986

Mr. Steinberg asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from Durham city council about the level of homelessness and the number of houses in poor repair and the implications of this for the level of Government funding for housing in the city.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have not received any recent representations from Durham city council about these matters which are usually referred to in the authority's annual housing investment programme submission. The council is due to send the submission for 1988-89 to the Department's northern regional office by 13 July.

Performance and Growth

Dr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, as in previous years, he will publish expenditure performance and growth tables for 1981-82 to 1987-88, showing also the figures from 1978-79 to 1987-88.

Mr. Ridley: I will place these tables in the House of Commons Library shortly.

Rents

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to introduce legislation to decontrol rents on new lettings.

Mr. Waldegrave: As soon as possible.

Historic Buildings (Report)

Sir Hugh Rossi asked the Secretary of State for the Environment why no reply has yet been issued to the first report from the Environment Committee in Session 1986-87 on historic buildings and ancient monuments, published on 18 February; and if he will now take steps to issue the Government's reply in the form of a Command Paper.

Mr. Ridley: Our planned timetable for replying to the report was overtaken by the dissolution of Parliament. I cannot now reply before the Committee is re-appointed.

Defective Housing

Mr. Wareing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he is likely to be able to give a decision on the possible designation of Truscon RD 27 houses under part XVI of the Housing Act 1985.

Mrs. Roe: We are considering the hon. Member's request concerning the designation of these properties under the housing defects legislation and hope to be able to give a decision shortly.

Water Supplies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the average household bill for water rates for each regional water authority in England for 1986-87, the percentage increase on the previous year and the percentage increase between 1979 and 1986-87.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to the hon. Member for Copeland (Mr. Cunningham) on 29 June 1987, at column 46.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the latest figures for the numbers of households where water supplies have been disconnected, showing where possible the reasons for disconnection.

Mr. Moynihan: In 1986-87, about 6,500 households were disconnected by water authorities because of non-payment. Similar information in respect of water companies is not available.

Drins

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the letter he sent to the water authorities on 6 March, 932-19, on the European Community proposals on the drins;

(2) if he will place in the Library the summary note of the first meeting on 28 January of his Department's consultation group on the European Community proposals on the drins.

Mr. Ridley: No. The papers referred to are working documents used in the formulation of Government policy. It is not the practice to make such documents publicly available.

New Parliamentary Building

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to respond to those recommendations addressed to him in the second report from the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services) on the new parliamentary building (phase 2), HC 378, Session 1986-87; and when he now expects to be able to announce a commencement date for works at No.1 Cannon row.

Mr. Chope: I am grateful for the Services Committee report which was published on 1 July. I am considering the recommendations and will respond as soon as possible. I hope to be able to make a full statement about No. 1 Cannon row shortly.

Gipsies

Mr. Ian Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made as to whether the Caravan Sites Act 1968 gives local authorities sufficient power to regulate unauthorised gipsy encampments; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Roe: The eviction powers available to local authorities designated under section 12 of the Caravan Sites Act 1968 were simplified by amendments to the Act in the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980. In his announcement on 6 February 1987 of the results of a review of gipsy sites policy, the Secretary of State said there would be no further amendments to the legislation for the present.

Lead-free Petrol

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many petrol stations in the Merseyside area presently have facilities for lead-free petrol.

Mr. Moynihan: I understand from the United Kingdom Petroleum Industry Association that there are currently five service stations selling unleaded petrol in Merseyside, at Prescot, Birkenhead, Southport, Wallasey and Maghull.

SCOTLAND

Travelling People

Mr. Andrew Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what advice his Department gives to local authorities regarding the siting of travelling people's facilities and their proximity to existing housing developments.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: In circular 34/1984 of November 1984, the Scottish Development Department advised local authorities about arrangements for the grant scheme for sites for travelling people and said that, in choosing a location, authorities should take into account the advice in the third report of the Secretary of State's advisory committee on Scotland's travelling people (HMSO, June 1982). That report indicated that a site should be appropriately located in relation to a number of services and to the settled community, but it did not offer guidance on proximity to existing housing developments.

Stracathro Junction

Mr. Andrew Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now give a starting date for the construction of the proposed flyover at Stracathro junction.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: It is not yet practicable to give a starting date for the construction of the flyover, as this is dependent on the completion of the necessary statutory procedures, by way of a side roads order and compulsory purchase order, and public reaction to them.

Mr. Andrew Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to have estimates for the costs of the proposed flyover at Stracathro junction; and if he will detail the steps so far taken in producing this new development.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I expect to have estimated costs within the next few weeks. Tayside regional council, as agent authority, are working on the design of the scheme and details relevant to the necessary statutory orders. This material will be with the Scottish Development Department shortly.

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many civil servants are employed in his Department; and what is its budgeted expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Rifkind: At 1 July 1987, 6,618 staff were employed in the Scottish Office, 3,238 in the Scottish prisons service and a total of 2,144½ in the four minor Departments for which I am responsible (Scottish Record Office, General Register Office (Scotland), Department of the Registers of Scotland and the Scottish Courts Administration); the respective running cost limits for 1987-88 are £110·961 million, £61·101 million and £37·040 million.

Students

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the percentage of students in receipt of SED awards who receive the maximum parental contribution.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In academic session 1985-86, the latest period for which figures are available, 21·1 per cent. of SED award-holding students received no standard maintenance allowance, either because their parents were assessed as liable for the maximum parental contribution or because no claim for maintenance was made.

Information on parental contributions actually made is not available; that is a matter between the students and their parents.

Psychiatric Hospitals

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has a target figure for the number of (a) physiotherapists, (b) occupational therapists, (c) clinical psychologists, (d) social workers in psychiatric hospitals and (e) psychiatrists required to work with the mentally ill in Scotland; and if he will state the current numbers employed in each category.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Target figures have not been set for these professions working with the mentally ill, the numbers employed being agreed by local management. 211 consultant psychiatrists work with the mentally ill in Scotland. 150 social workers employed by local authorities work in psychiatric hospitals or psychiatric units. For the other professions, the information is not held centrally in the form requested.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was, separately, the number of men and women in Scottish psychiatric hospitals for each of the years 1980 until 1986.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is as follows:

Scottish Psychiatric Hospitals[1] : Residents

Residents[2]	Male	Female
1980	10,260	11,656
1981	9,997	11,607
1982	9,733	11,452
1983	9,519	11,320
1984	9,309	11,110
1985	8,952	10,967

[1] Mental Illness and Mental Handicap.
[2] At 31 December.
Information for 1986 is not yet available.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the Scottish psychiatric hospitals and the number of patients in each hospital on 11 June.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information for the day in question is not held centrally. Psychiatric hospital in-patients statistics are published annually by health board area in "Scottish Health Statistics", a copy of which is available in the Library.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of patients, and their percentage of the total number of patients in Scottish psychiatric hospitals, who have been in Scottish psychiatric hospitals for (a) under one year, (b) under five years, (c) under 10 years, and (d) over 10 years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest information available is as follows:

Distribution of residents[1] in Scottish psychiatric hospitals[2] by length of stay: 1985

	Number	Percentage
Less than one year	5,229	26
Less than five years	9,896	49
Less than 10 years	12,085	61
10 years of more	7,834	39
Total	19,919	100

[1] At 31 December.
[2] Mental illness and mental handicap.

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total number of qualified occupational therapists working with people with mental illness in Scotland for each of the years 1980 to 1986.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information collected centrally does not identify separately those occupational therapists employed in the NHS and by local authorities working with the mentally ill some of whom may be having treatment in psychiatric hospitals, general hospitals, local authority accommodation or at home.

The total numbers of qualified occupational therapists employed by health boards and local authority social work departments are shown in the following table. All figures are whole-time equivalents.

	Health boards (at September)	Local authority social work departments (at October)
1980	304·1	158·0
1981	319·5	169·0
1982	340·2	175·0
1983	371·0	185·0
1984	380·4	190·0
1985	414·7	196·0
1986	469·3	[1]198·0

[1] Provisional figure at 6 October 1986.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of people in Scotland estimated to be suffering from (a) schizophrenia, (b) dementia and (c) severe drinking problems.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It is not possible to assess accurately the number of people with these conditions as not all sufferers come into contact with medical or other services.

Prescriptions

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of prescriptions for sleeping tablets, tranquillisers and anti-depressants issued in Scotland for each of the years 1980 to 1986.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The following table gives the information for the relevant therapeutic categories. This is abstracted from the annual HMSO publication "Scottish Health Statistics" which is available in the Library. The figures for the full year 1986 are not yet available but those for the first nine months are given.

[1]Therapeutic Classification	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	Million [2]1986
Hypnotics	1·772	1·758	1·831	1·815	1·825	1·770	1·306

[1] Estimated using a sample of approximately one per cent. of prescriptions dispensed in Scotland by chemist contractors (i.e. excluding prescriptions dispensed by dispensing doctors).
[2] January-September 1986.

Prison Disturbances

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each Scottish prison the number and dates of all disturbances since 1982.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Providing a list of all disturbances, however minor, which have occurred in Scottish penal establishments since 1982 would require disproportionate staff resources. I am therfore listing only incidents which could be categorised as serious because of the nature of the incident or the extent of the damage caused.

	Establishment	Nature of Incident
1982
7 May	Peterhead	Major disturbance.
17 August	Edinburgh	Attempt to reach roof.
1983
16 October	Peterhead	Major disturbance.
1984
9-10 January	Peterhead	Staff evicted from hall.
1985
13 March	Peterhead	Staff taken hostage in escape attempt.
15 April	Dumfries	Prisoner taken hostage.
2 November	Peterhead	Staff taken hostage in escape attempt.
1986
2-3 July	Peterhead	Hostage incident.
21 October-2 November	Edinburgh	Hostage incident.
9-13 November	Peterhead	Hostage incident.
1987
5-19 January	Barlinnie	Hostage incident.

Holy Loch

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what planning requirements exist for future developments at Holy Loch base.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Planning proposals for any future development at the Holy Loch base would be brought forward by the Ministry of Defence and would be subject to the planning procedures that apply to all developments by Government Departments. These procedures are set out in Scottish Development Department circular 21/1984, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Health Boards

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list each member of every health board in Scotland, and the source of their nomination.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mentally Handicapped and Disabled Persons

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if his Department has set a target for the provision of places for the mentally ill or mentally handicapped in each of the following: (a) group homes, (b) hostels and (c) day hospitals;

(2) whether the Government have set a Scottish target for the provision of places in full-time day centres for (a) the mentally ill, (b) the mentally handicapped and (c) the physically handicapped.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: No formal targets for the provision of residential or day care places for any of the three groups mentioned have been set in the recent past. Suggested figures in a 1979 report by the mental disorder programme planning group of the Scottish Health Services Planning Council have served to stimulate progress but have been overtaken by more recent consideration of the subject.

Local authorities are aware of the Government's view that due priority should be given to the promotion of community care, and in consultation with health boards they are well placed to judge the particular needs of their areas. Considerable progress is being made already, for example in the provision of day care places for the mentally handicapped which have risen from 4,705 in March 1977 to a provisional figure of 6,995 in March 1986.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of group homes or hostels for the mentally ill run by or known to social work departments in Scotland and the number of places they contain.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest available information is as follows:

Group homes and hostels for the mentally ill at 31 March 1986

	Group homes	Hostels
Local Authority
Number of homes	25	4
Number of places	110	40
Other
Number of homes	104	1
Number of places	410	20

There are, in addition, four fully staffed homes with 64 places at the same date.

SHARE Formula

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he now proposes to implement the SHARE formula in full.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The SHARE formula has been fully implemented each year since 1978-79 and this has resulted in a much fairer distribution of available resources to health boards.

Breast Cancer Screening

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if the Scottish Home and Health Department has discussed with health boards the steps which have to be taken to establish a breast cancer screening service in Scotland; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if progress has been made in Scotland on the implementation of the Forrest recommendations on breast cancer screening;

(3) when he expects to announce details of his decision on the 10 centres which were suggested in the Forrest report on breast cancer screening.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Discussions are continuing with health boards and other interested parties about the implementation of the recommendations on breast cancer screening contained in the Forrest report. Subject to these discussions, I would hope to be able to make an announcement about the location of the first centres in the autumn.

Breast and Cervical Cancer

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many women have died of breast and cervical cancer in 1986 in Scotland as a whole and in each of the health board areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is given in the table below:

Universities (Funding)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when appointments will be made to the Scottish Committee of the Universities Funding Council; and if he will seek nominations from representative groups of Scottish opinion.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: It will only be possible to make appointments after the Universities Funding Council has been established, which the Government propose to do by legislation to be introduced during the current session. Appointments to the committee will be a matter for the council, in consultation with my right hon. and learned Friend. We envisage that the committee will include members in individual rather than representative capacities.

Higher Education

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state what progress has been made in broadening access to Scottish higher education through wider recognition of the national certificate.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This is a matter primarily for the Scottish Vocational Education Council to take forward as the custodian of the national certificate. I understand that, following discussions with SCOTVEC the Scottish Universities' Council on Entrance has agreed to recommend to individual universities in Scotland that they make sympathetic use of waiver arrangements in the case of deserving candidates with national certificate qualifications. SCOTVEC and SUCE have agreed that the performance of first year students gaining admission to universities either solely on the basis of national certificate modules or on a mixture of national certificate modules and other qualifications should be closely monitored.

To assist admissions officers and staff in the various specialist departments in institutions of higher education in Scotland in dealing with students who hold the national certificate, my Department is funding the appointment of four development officers by SCOTVEC to assist admission staff in better equipping themselves to interpret and make an assessment of the qualifications offered by applicants. This exercise is intended to build on discussion begun at a conference sponsored by my Department last February at which representatives of SCOTVEC, the Council for National Academic Awards, the universities and central institutions met to consider how progression from national certificate to higher education might be enhanced.

Whatever national initiatives are undertaken, it is, of course, open to individual institutions to make their own arrangements at a local level to encourage national certificate students to move on to higher education. A good example of this is an initiative in the west of Scotland where a working party has been set up, consisting of representatives of Glasgow and Strathclyde universities, Paisley and Glasgow colleges of technology and further education colleges managed by Strathclyde region, specifically to devise national certificate modular programmes which, if successfully completed, would give direct access to first degree courses in business studies and engineering at the two universities as well as to HND and degree courses at the two central institutions. The aim is to construct programmes which will be of particular relevance to young people from disadvantaged backgrounds, to adults without formal qualifications, or to those seeking to enhance their employment prospects through a reorientation of their qualifications. This is an extremely encouraging development which I am sure will be of interest to other institutions.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he received from the general councils, students' representative councils, student unions, student associations and trade unions of the eight Scottish universities regarding future control of Scottish higher education following his statement in the House of Commons on 1 April 1987.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has received representations from the general council of the university of Edinburgh.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for the future development of adult and continuing education in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Provision for the development of adult and continuing education in Scotland is made through the normal rate support grant arrangements with local authorities. This allows for flexibility in the allocation of priorities by each region in order to respond to local requirements.

To establish close links with industry and commerce, additional central government funds are allocated to the joint Manpower Services Commission and Scottish Education Department programme of local collaborative projects. Under this scheme, educational establishments collaborate with local industrial and commercial interests to identify particular training requirements in their areas.

In 1986, the Scottish PICKUP (Professional, Industrial and Commercial Updating) programme was launched to promote the recognition of and the provision of updating courses for people already in employment. This is a rolling programme of projects funded by central Government and extending over three years to 1988-89.

The Workers Educational Association receives funds annually for the promotion of adult education throughout Scotland and have power to direct their expenditure in accordance with their income.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations relating to the future control of Scottish tertiary education he has received from student organisations, trade unions, governing bodies and individuals in the Scottish central institutions and colleges of education.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Following his statement on 1 April 1987, my right hon. and learned Friend has received representations from the Joint Committee of Principals of Colleges of Education and the Principals and Directors of Central Institutions and separately from the Royal Scottish Academy of Music and Drama.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the General Council of Edinburgh University regarding the control of Scottish higher education; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. and learned Friend has recently received a letter regretting his decision, announced on 1 April 1987 at column 1107, that the Scottish universities would continue to be funded alongside other universities in Great Britain through the new Universities Funding Council; and suggesting that the members of the Scottish committee of the new council should be appointed by my right hon. and learned Friend in consultation with the Scottish universities and colleges.

My right hon. and learned Friend has replied pointing out the divergence in views between the general council and the university of Edinburgh which, like the majority of the other Scottish universities, did not favour funding of the universities through a Scottish body; and saying that he would consider the method of appointment of members to the Scottish committee in the light of responses to the recent consultative exercise.

Torness Nuclear Power Station

Mr. Darling asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if any emergency exercises are to be carried out at Torness nuclear power station before it is fully operational.

Mr. Lang: The SSEB has already demonstrated its emergency arrangements to the satisfaction of the NII, and as part of its own on-going programme the board will carry out further emergency exercises during the commissioning period of the power station. This will be independent of any further exercises determined by the Inspectorate in implementation, as it considers necessary, of the site licence requirements.

Mr. Darling asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects that the Torness nuclear power station will be commissioned and electricity generated for the national grid.

Mr. Lang: I am advised by SSEB that they expect that the first reactor at Torness will be commissioned towards the end of 1987. The second reactor is planned to be in operation before the end of the current financial year.

Mr. Darling asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate to grant consent for the final fuel loading at Torness nuclear power station.

Mr. Lang: I am advised by the South of Scotland Electricity Board that it hopes shortly to obtain the necessary approval from the nuclear installations inspectorate to allow fuel loading at the first reactor.

Mr. Darling asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if the modifications to the control rod guide tubes at Torness nuclear power station have been completed; and whether the modifications have delayed the commissioning of the power station.

Mr. Lang: I am advised by the SSEB that the necessary modifications to the control rod guide tubes at Torness have now been completed and the approval of the nuclear installations inspectorate is being sought. The requirement to investigate and remedy the problem with the guide tubes has caused some delay to the commissioning of the first reactor, but the station is expected to be fully commissioned substantially to programme.

YTS (Argyll and Bute)

Mrs Ray Michie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people there are on youth training schemes in Argyll and Bute at the moment; and what change there has been over the last year.

Mr. Lang: In Argyll and Bute district, 250 young people were participating in YTS at 30 June 1987, compared with 158 participants at 30 June 1986.

BBC Glasgow (Police Raid)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the procurator fiscal is still involved in consideration of the evidence involved in the police raid on the BBC in Glasgow on Sunday 1 February; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. A number of reports from the procurator fiscal are being considered by the Law Officers. I have nothing to add.

Water Supplies

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the average household bill for water rates for each regional water authority in Scotland for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Mr. Lang: The table shows the average household water bill for each regional authority in Scotland for each year between 1979-80 and 1987-88.

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the figures for the numbers of households where water supplies have been disconnected, showing where possible the reasons for disconnection, for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not held centrally. A water authority (regional or islands council) would disconnect a household's supply only on account of operational reasons. These would include repairing leaks in household plumbing systems or in burst systems, making connections and lining pipes.

Terrorism

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if, when an application is made for an extension of detention for a loyalist suspect by the police in Scotland, it is considered directly by the Scottish Office, as stated by Lord Jellicoe in his 1984 review of the operation of the Prevention of Terrorism (Temporary Provisions) Act 1984 (Cmnd. 8803: paragraph 30).

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes.

Rating Reform

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give the estimated level of personal community charge in each regional and district council area in Scotland that would be required in the current financial year if the Abolition of Domestic Rates (Scotland) Act were in force.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 8 July 1987, c. 187]: The estimated levels of personal community charge required to replace domestic rate income in 1987-88 are as follows:

Notes:

(1) Figures for regions are averages of their component districts; the figure for Scotland as a whole, is an average of all regions and islands.

(2) The total charge may not be the sum of the constituent parts, as a result of rounding.

(3) The figures for Lothian regional council and Edinburgh district council take account of the rate reductions proposed by the Secretary of State in the reports he laid before Parliament on 10 July. The figure for Clackmannan district council takes account of a rate reduction which the Council propose to make, as announced on 10 July.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

CAP (Surpluses)

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will set out the amounts of common agricultural policy surplus production held in each of the stores used for that purpose in the United Kingdom;

(2) what is the location, by town, of the stores used for the storage of common agricultural policy surpluses in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Milk Quota

Mr. Livsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in view of the effects of delay on United Kingdom dairy farmers, he will immediately allow the Milk Marketing Board to organise milk quota leasing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon a possible.

Council of Agriculture Ministers

Mr. Boswell asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Council of Agriculture Minsters' meeting held in Luxembourg on Monday 13 July; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I represented the United Kingdom at this meeting. The Council agreed, subject to the opinion of the European Parliament, on arrangements for the funding of agricultural expenditure from the Community budget. The decision implements the conclusions reached by Heads of Government at their meeting on 29 and 30 June that the present system of advance payments should be changed.

Instead of member states making guarantee payments to farmers and others after they have received funds from the Community budget, they will make the payments in advance, out of their own finances. There will be a delay of two months before member states are reimbursed from Community funds and this will have the effect of removing the budget deficit for agriculture in 1987. This system will continue until such time as final arrangements are made for the future financing of the Community.

Payments to farmers and other recipients will not be affected by the change.

It was important to establish that the adjustment of the advances system will result in no extra cost to the Community budget in 1988 and subsequent years, and this has been achieved. Provision is made for limited interest payments to be made in the short-term to certain member states.

This year's price fixing and budget are finally settled. We must continue to focus on finding longer term solutions to the problems of budgetary discipline in the interests of farmers and taxpayers as a whole. Britain has already put forward ideas which the Commission is considering.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Detained Persons

Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what rights and conditions apply to people (a) being held on remand in police cells and (b) serving a prison sentence;

(2) what are the rights of people being held on remand in police cells as to visits; and if he will make a statement as to his Department's policy in this matter.

Mr. John Patten: The conditions under which sentenced and unsentenced prisoners are held in prison department establishments are laid down in "The Prison Rules 1964" as amended. These do not extend to prisoners held in police cells. However, such prisoners are covered by the relevant sections of the code of practice for detention, questioning and treatment of persons by police officers issued under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984.

Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of (a) men and (b) women being held in police cells in the United Kingdom on 1 July; and what was the longest period of time a person on remand had been held under such conditions on that date.

Mr. John Patten: On 3 July, the nearest date for which reliable figures are available, the number of men being held in police and court cells in England and Wales was 511 and the number of women was 109. The longest period of time that a person on remand had been so held was 65 days.

Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the number of people held in police cells in the United Kingdom for each month since January 1965.

Mr. John Patten: The readily available information relates to the last Friday of each month when the numbers of prisoners held in police cells in England and Wales were as follows:

	1980	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987
January	—	1,461	—	107	71	5	53	337

November	3,494	—	170	568	18	42	195
December	3,454	—	—	33	—	—	59

There are no records available prior to 1980 and information relating to the years 1980 and 1982 is incomplete.

Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department why people, whose homes are in London and who have been remanded in custody by courts in London, are being held in police cells many miles away from London.

Mr. John Patten: The continuing rise in the prison population, particularly those remanded in custody, has led to the increasing use of police cells to accommodate some remand prisoners. The pressure on police cells in the Metropolitan police district has made it necessary for the police to look outside London for short term accommodation.

Entry Clearance

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions since 1979 visa officers have appealed against an adjudicator's determination to allow an application for entry clearance; and if he will give a breakdown (i) by post of application in the sub-continent and (ii) by year.

Mr. Renton: The available information compiled from statistics maintained by the independent appellate authorities is given in the table. No record is kept for individual posts and prior to 1984 no separate figures were kept for the Indian sub-continent.

Appeals to the Immigration Appeal Tribunal from decisions by adjudicators to allow appeals against refusal of entry clearance

	Commonwealth	Non-Commonwealth	EC
1979	47	50	0

Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been refused visitor's entry clearance, since the new system was introduced, on the grounds that the immigration officer was not satisfied that the applicant was genuinely seeking entry for only the period of the visit stated by him; and if he will give a breakdown by each post considering applications in the sub-continent.

Mr. Renton: Information is available centrally only on all applications refused for a visit visa, irrespective of the reason for refusal, and is given in the following table:

Applications refused initially in the Indian sub-continent for a visit visa to the United Kingdom

Number of persons

	1986 [1] 4th quarter	1987 1st quarter	1987 April

Remand Centres

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proposals his Department has to improve conditions at remand centres.

Mr. John Patten: In the short term implementation of proposals in "A Fresh Start" and the court escort scrutiny will allow staff to be deployed more flexibly and to better effect, providing a sound organisational base for improvements in regime standards for prisoners. In the longer term we are giving priority to measures designed to reduce overcrowding and modernise old buildings throughout the prison estate, including remand centres. The current prison building programme will provide over 17,000 additional places by the mid-1990s in existing and new establishments and we are undertaking extensive modernisations and refurbishment at about 100 establishments, including almost all the Victorian prisons.

Offenders (Hostels)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average cost to his Department of a place in a voluntary after-care hostel for offenders.

Mr. John Patten: About £1,000 per annum, but there is considerable variation around this figure according to the type of hostel and the facilities provided.

Feltham Youth Custody Centre

Mr. Ground asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has made towards reaching an agreement with the Prison Officers' Association concerning staffing and security at the new remand building due to open at the Feltham youth custody centre on 12 July.

Mr. John Patten: Progress has been made towards reaching agreement with the Prison Officers' Association on matters connected with the new remand building at Feltham youth custody centre. The opening date of 12 July has been postponed for a few days to allow further talks to take place.

Inner-City Crime

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what additional measures he proposes to take to combat crime in the inner cities.

Mr. John Patten: We are developing a range of measures to make our cities safer places. We are evaluating the lessons learned from our "Five Towns" local crime prevention initiative with a view to establishing similar arrangements in other urban areas. For this purpose, we shall again be working with the police and seeking the co-operation of local authorities and the private and voluntary sectors. We shall continue our efforts to encourage and support chief police officers in their endeavours to put more police officers on the streets. We will work with other government departments to build on the valuable contribution they are already making to the prevention of crime through the policies and programmes for which they are responsible.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Play Areas (Surfaces)

Dame Peggy Fenner asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if his Department issues recommendations or guidelines on safe surfaces in children's playgrounds or recreation areas for schoolchildren; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave on 1 July to the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) at column 86.

ENERGY

Electricity Industry

Mr. Lord asked the Secretary of State for Energy what part of the electricity supply system and ancillary companies will be privatised; and if he will list them.

Mr. Parkinson: Detailed proposals for the privatisation of the electricity supply industry are still being developed.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy what effect he estimates the limited resources and understaffing of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate identified by the Chief Inspector in evidence to the Energy Committee on 6 May have on (a) the safety of nuclear installations and (b) the development of the nuclear industry.

Mr. Parkinson: The legal responsibility for the safety of a nuclear installation lies with the site operator. The responsibility of the NII is to see that appropriate standards are developed, achieved and maintained by the licensee to ensure that the necessary safety precautions are taken and to monitor and regulate the safety of the plant by means of its powers under the licence.

Although the NII has had staffing shortages, it has nonetheless been able to maintain the required standards of safety, by giving priority to the inspection and assessment of operating plant, but with the consequent risk of some delay to other projects. However, following a special salary increase a recruitment campaign is now under way which is expected to bring the NII up to full strength.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the recommendations contained in paragraph 17 of the second report and paragraph 3 of the third special report of the Energy Committee, Session 1986-87, with regard to the implications for the nuclear industry of the understaffing of the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

Mr. Cope: I have been asked to reply.

Two substantial increases in the salary scales for all nuclear installations inspectors have recently been agreed and it is expected that this will enable the inspectorate to attract recruits with the expertise and skills required and to bring its staff up to the numbers planned for 1987-88. A recruitment competition is now under way.

Energy Committee (Second Report)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to respond to the second report of the Energy Committee, Session 1986-87.

Mr. Parkinson: With regard to the Committee's recommendation on NII staffing, the Government have agreed to a further pay award for nuclear inspectors to make NII salaries fully competitive with the rest of the industry. An extensive recruitment campaign is now under way and has attracted considerable interest.

I hope to be able to respond shortly to the Committee's recommendation on decommissioning costs.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Parkinson: My Department takes full account of the needs of small businesses in considering the adoption or revision of measures for which it is responsible.

Small businesses, like larger ones, will have benefited from measures to encourage competition and stimulate efficiency in energy supply and use. They will also have shared in the benefits from a range of measures, including:

—information and advice schemes to help firms use energy more efficiently; —support for research and development in new energy technologies; and —promotion of the offshore supplies industry.

Because the span of these activities is so wide, it is not possible to single out their impact on different sizes of company: some individual measures have, however, been of particular benefit to small business. An example of this is the Energy Efficiency Office's support of projects to draughtproof the homes of low-income groups. Much of the new and expanding market for the materials concerned, worth perhaps £10 million in the current financial year, will be supplied by small companies.

In addition, £40 million has been made available to British Coal Enterprise to help create jobs in coalfield areas. This has contributed directly to the creation of 18,506 new job opportunities in 1,399 individual projects, many in new, often small, businesses. The company's investment of £31·5 million so far has attracted additional finance from other sources of almost £200 million.

WALES

Ogwr Health District (Staff Shortage)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received from the chief administrative nursing officer of the Mid Glamorgan health authority about the shortfall of staff for health visitor and community nursing services in the Ogwr health district based on the Telford guidelines; and if he is prepared to provide extra funds to make up this shortfall in the Ogwr health district.

Mr. Grist: None. The distribution of manpower and other resources to the various units of the district health authority are matters falling to its own operational and managerial responsibility.

S4C (Viewing Audience)

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if estimates are available county by county of the average viewing audience of Welsh-language television programmes broadcast by Sianel 4 Cymru;

(2) what are the latest estimates of the average number of viewers of Welsh-language television programmes broadcast by Sianel 4 Cymru.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: This information is not held centrally.

ADAS (Welsh Language)

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the employees of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in each of the Welsh counties speak Welsh; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: The number of employees of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service in the Welsh counties who speak Welsh is:

	Number
Gwynedd	20
Dyfed	18
Clwyd	9
Powys	4
Mid Glamorgan, South Glamorgan, West Glamorgan and Gwent	5

In addition, there are a further 60 Welsh speakers located at the centralised specialist establishments in Wales, that is ADAS headquarters, sub centres and veterinary investigation centres.

Housing

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the current and capital expenditure per head on housing in Wales during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Grist: Local authorities current and capital expenditure per head for 1986-87 is:

	£ per head
Current	49·32
Capital	62·68

Current expenditure relates to both the housing revenue account and rate fund revenue account but excludes any expenditure on advances under the Housing and Small Dwellings Acquisition Acts, expenditure by the Housing Corporation, any Housing Benefit expenditure and Debt charges.

Capital expenditure is shown gross of receipts but excluding leasing, and Housing Corporation expenditure.

Capital expenditure including Housing Corporation is £81·00 per head.

Community Charge

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will estimate how many second homes in each borough in Wales will not be rated when the poll tax is operating in full; and what will be the loss of revenue on present charges for each borough as a result of this.

Mr. Peter Walker: All domestic hereditaments, including second homes, will cease to be rated when the community charge is in full operation. Owners of second homes will instead pay a standard charge to the local authority where the property is situated. The standard charge will normally be equivalent to two units of community charge; but local authorities will have power to set lower standard charges.

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will estimate what is the current rates revenue received from private and local authority establishments catering for old people as residents by each local authority in Wales;

(2) what is the estimated revenue for each local authority in Wales when the new business rate is levied in full on private and local authority residential establishments catering for old people and the poll tax is levied in full on the residents.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information needed to make these estimates is not available centrally. Final decisions on the treatment of such establishments under the new system have not yet been taken. However, we have already made it clear that residents of old peoples homes will be exempt from the community charge.

Rates

Mr. Wyn Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will estimate what is the current rates revenue received from religious establishments with permanent residents by each local authority in Wales;

(2) what is the estimated revenue for each local authority in Wales when the new business rate and poll tax are levied in full on religious establishments and their residents.

Mr. Peter Walker: The information needed to make these estimates is not available centrally.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Polling Register

Mr. Allen asked the Attorney-General if the Lord Chancellor will make it his policy to make available free on request to any hon. or right hon. Member one copy of the marked polling register for his or her constituency; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No.

PRIME MINISTER

Insurance (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Prime Minister what information she has as to how insurers' overheads in Northern Ireland compare with those in England.

The Prime Minister: None.

Data Processing (Duplication)

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Prime Minister (1) to what extent the Home Office's data processing activities are duplicated by (a) the Inland Revenue, (b) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and (c) the Department of Health and Social Security;

(2) to what extent the Department of Health and Social Security's data processing activities are duplicated by (a) the Inland Revenue, (b) Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and (c) the Home Office.

The Prime Minister: Government Departments do not, in discharging their own responsibilities, deliberately duplicate data processing activities of other Departments.

The Department of Health and Social Security exchanges approximately 40 million data items with the Inland Revenue each year in the process of collecting national insurance contributions and income tax, and in relation to pensioners working and paying income tax; duplication of data processing activities takes place only in that this common information is shared.

Western Sahara

Mr. Corbyn asked the Prime Minister what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards recognising the Moroccan annexation of Western Sahara; and if she will convey this policy to King Hassan during his forthcoming visit.

The Prime Minister: The Government recognise neither the "Saharan Arab Democratic Republic" nor Moroccan claims to sovereignty over the Western Sahara. The Government fully support the efforts made by the United Nations Secretary General to bring about a peaceful solution. I look forward to discussing this and other international issues with King Hassan.

Engagements

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

Mr. Thomas asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

Mr. Wigley asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

Mr. Pike asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 14 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. I was also present at Victoria station to mark the arrival of the King of Morocco. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, including one with the Prime Minister of Sri Lanka.

TRANSPORT

BR (Punctuality)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 14, he will specify the benefits which his Department derives from the quarterly information on punctuality by sector supplied by British Rail; and if he will publish the latest such information in the Official Report.

Mr. David Mitchell: This information forms part of our general monitoring of the board's performance against the objectives that we set it last October. The latest available information on train punctuality is for the last quarter of 1986-87 and is as follows:

Trains arriving within 0 to 5 minutes of right time

	Per cent.
Intercity	77
Network Southeast	91
Provincial	90

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, pursuant to the answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 14, he will publish in the Official Report the evidence upon which he based his statement that British Rail's punctuality had improved over the last six months; and if he will now take steps to monitor punctuality regionally.

Mr. David Mitchell: My statement was based on train punctuality figures for all the passenger railway sectors covering the last six months of the 1986-87 financial year. They are the most recent figures for a six-month period and are as follows:

Trains arriving within 0-5 minutes of right time

Sector	3rd quarter 1986-87 per cent.	4th quarter 1986-87 per cent.
Intercity	75·0	77·0
Network SouthEast	89·7	91·0
Provincial	90·0	90·0

I do not propose to monitor punctuality regionally, but I have asked the board to send me information broken down by sub-sector.

British Rail (Derelict Land)

Mr. Pawsey asked the Secretary of State for Transport, pursuant to the answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 14, what information he has about British Rail's intentions with regard to maintaining the trend and pace of disposal of derelict land during the next five years.

Mr. David Mitchell: I understand from British Rail that it aims to dispose of its present vacant and under-utilised land by the end of 1989. Where further sites are released from operational use, British Rail would intend to dispose of these where possible within the same times scale.

British Rail (Repair Work)

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport, if, when next he meets the chairman of British Rail, he will raise with him the concentration of repair work in regional depots and the work available to BREL in Crewe, in the light of the accelerated redundancies there since March 1987.

Mr. David Mitchell: No. The allocation of repair work is a management matter for the Railways Board.

Leeds

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment his Department has made on the prospects for the economic development of south-east Leeds in its deliberations on the proposed M1-A1 link.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: Consulting engineers are carrying out the east of Leeds study. They must be satisfied that traffic forecasts take account of the prospects for economic development.

Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish his Department's report on the study of traffic in east Leeds; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: We hope to make an announcement during the autumn. This should end the present uncertainty.

A423 (Maidenhead Thicket)

Dr. Glyn asked the Secretary of State for Transport when a decision can be expected on the A423 through Maidenhead Thicket; and how soon after a decision he expects work to commence.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I hope to be able to announce a decision on the A423 Maidenhead Thicket to Burchetts Green improvement during the summer. This scheme is in the national trunk road programme for a start of works in the period to March 1989. The actual start will be dependent on the satisfactory completion of the statutory procedures.

Privately-owned Aircraft

Mr. Snape asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to introduce legislation to require those flying or operating privately-owned aircraft to be insured for third party and passenger liability; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: It is for aircraft owners who carry passengers on private flights to decide the appropriate levels of both passenger and third party insurance to meet their potential liabilities. Under section 76 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 they are strictly liable for injury or damage caused to persons or property on the ground.

There are no plans to introduce legislation.

Lighthouse Tender Vessels (Report)

Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether he will announce the results of studies undertaken into the tender vessel requirements of the general lighthouse authorities.

Mr. Channon: In June last year my right hon. Friend, jointly with the three general lighthouse authorities, commissioned Arthur Young Management Consultants to review the authorities' tender vessel requirements. I have now received their report and I am placing copies of it in the Library.

I believe that this is the first joint comprehensive appraisal that has been made of the authorities' tender vessel requirements, and I am grateful to the consultants for undertaking it. Their report makes a wide range of recommendations which I shall be considering carefully in close consultation with the authorities, the Lights Advisory Committee (which represents shipowners, shippers and port authorities) and the Irish Government.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the steps being taken by the promoters of the Channel Tunnel project to ensure more than 50 per cent. of the contracts required to build the trains for use in the Channel Tunnel will go to British Rail Engineering Ltd., particularly in the north-west region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: I have been asked to reply.

British Rail Engineering Ltd. has been given the lead in the design contract for the shuttle trains to be used in the Channel fixed link. The subsequent manufacturing contract will be subject to open and competitive tendering.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

IHV Industrial Investments Ltd.

Mr. Rooker asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what date IHV Industrial Investments Ltd., Reg. No. 1102274, went into liquidation.

Mr. Maude: No notice of the appointment of a liquidator nor a copy of a winding up order has been filed with the Registrar of Companies in respect of IHV Industrial Investments Ltd.

Doorstep Sales

Mr. Fraser asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when he will introduce legislation to reform the law relating to doorstep sales.

Mr. Maude: My Department will shortly be consulting interested organisations on the text of draft regulations to implement the EC directive on doorstep selling. We expect to lay the regulations before Parliament in the autumn.

Task Force Projects (Leeds)

Mr. Fatchett asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list for each of the projects supported by task force money in the Chapeltown area of Leeds the amount of money (a) allocated in 1986-87, (b) spent in 1986-87 and (c) allocated for 1987-88.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The information requested is as follows:

	Funds allocated in 1986-87	Spent in 1986-87	Funds to be allocated in 1987-88
Hendrickson Feasibility Project	500	500
Headstart in Business	12,883	12,883
PATH	93,349	20,000
Chapeltown Community Workshops	3,000
APEX Trust	1,000	1,000

Harehills Lane Baptist Church			1,546
Apex Trust			12,524
TOTAL	734,016	300,175	51,070

There are a number of projects under development which are expected to commit further substantial sums in 1987-88.

Ferguson Group

Mr. Hoyle asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if, pursuant to his reply of 1 July, Official Report, column 92, he has had any discussions or contact with Thomson since its purchase of Ferguson; and what information he has on Ferguson's current share of the market for television (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in the European Economic Community.

Mr. Butcher: Neither my right hon. and learned Friend, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, nor I have been in contact with Thomson Grand Public since the announcement of its proposed acquisition of Thorn EMI Ferguson. Information collected by my Department about the market share of individual companies is commercially confidential. However, the proposed acquisition would qualify for consideration under the Fair Trading Act 1973, and the Director General of Fair Trading will no doubt take account of market share considerations in advising my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, on the question of a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Ivor Williams

Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when Mr. Ivor Williams, a constituent of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet, will receive a substantive reply to his letter dated 12 January to the Office of Fair Trading regarding his complaint about the conduct of his estate agent; why the reply has not yet been given; and why the Office of Fair Trading has not yet acted on the complaint.

Mr. Maude: I shall reply to my hon. Friend as soon as possible.

Redundant Steel Workers (Payment)

Mr. Cryer asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations have been made to the EEC Commission to ensure that applications under article 56 of the European Coal and Steel Community programme for payments to redundant steel workers are approved without delay.

Mr. Atkins [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: Representations about delays in approving article 56 ECSC readaptation aid payments were made to the Commission recently, followed up last week by a letter from the United Kingdom permanent representation. I understand that approvals in a number of outstanding cases should be given shortly.

Regional Development Grant

Ms. Quin asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement as to the reasons for the decline in regional development grant assistance to the north-east of England, as detailed in the reply to the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) on 2 February 1987, Official Report, column 501.

Mr. Atkins [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: Expenditure on regional development grant is a function of the rates and scope of grant, the coverage of the development areas and the level of demand. The decline in RDG payments in the north-east appears to have resulted mainly from changes in the development and special development areas in the early 1980s and a fall in investment by manufacturing industry in the region, notably the capital-intensive petrochemicals and steel industries, as well as from changes in the scheme itself. However, the region's share of RDG payments in 1986-87 was higher than in the preceding four years.

ENVIRONMENT

Bathing Water Quality

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps will be taken that all the beaches currently designated as bathing areas for the purposes of meeting the water quality standards of directive 76 160 EEC in the United Kingdom will meet these standards by 1992 at the latest.

Mr. Moynihan: It is not possible to give the assurance the hon. Member seeks. The scale and cost of the necessary works makes it impossible to complete the task by 1992. However, it remains our target that all identified waters should meet the directive's standards, and we are spending nationally some £70 million on improvement schemes.

Rating Reform

Miss Widdecombe asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment has been made of the effect of the community charge on small businesses in the Maidstone area; and what steps he will consider taking to alleviate the adverse consequences of any sudden increase in payments due from minor but viable concerns with small profit margins.

Mr. Howard: The community charge will replace domestic rates and should not affect businesses directly. The proposal for a national non-domestic rate on present figures would initially increase rate poundages in the Maidstone area, but thereafter restrain further increases to the rate of inflation. My right hon. Friend has already announced generous transitional arrangements to phase the impact of this proposal and the revaluation of non-domestic properties over five years, or longer in the case of those properties with the largest increases from the revaluation.

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated revenue for each local authority in England when the new business rate and poll tax are levied in full on religious establishments and their residents.

Mr. Howard: The information needed to make such estimates is not collected centrally.

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his answer of 29 June, Official Report, column 44, he will publish additional information exemplifying the community charge proposals, to show specifically the effect on each of the illustrative community charge figures of the difference between the amount of revenue likely to be obtained by each local authority from a centrally fixed non-domestic rate and the amount of revenue from locally determined non-domestic rates projected for 1987-88 under the existing system.

Mr. Howard: I shall write to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate how many second homes in each borough in England will not be rated when the poll tax is operating in full; and what will be the loss of revenue on present charges for each borough as a result of this.

Mr. Howard: All second homes will be liable for a standard community charge, which will be set by each local authority as a multiple of the personal community charge, up to a maximum of two units of personal charge.

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the estimated revenue for each local authority in England when the new business rate is levied in full on private and local authority residential establishments catering for old people and the poll tax is levied in full upon the residents.

Mr. Howard: The information needed to make such estimates is not collected centrally. Final decisions on the treatment of such establishments under the new system have not been taken. However, we have already made it clear that residents of old people's homes will be exempt from the community charge.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he intends to make special provision under the community charge for ministers of religion.

Mr. Howard [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 56]: The community charge will be paid by all adults, with only limited exceptions. As a result, local accountability will be restored, because the cost of local spending will be spread much more widely than at present among those entitled to vote in local elections and who use local services.

Against this background, the Government believe that it would be difficult to justify any special provision which resulted in ministers of religion being treated more favourably than their parishioners.

Housing Expenditure

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the current and capital expenditure per head on housing in England during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Waldegrave: Current expenditure by English local authorities and new towns on their housing revenue accounts in 1986-87, including debt charges, represented on average £124 per head of population. Capital expenditure by local authorities, new towns, the Housing Corporation and central Government in England represented on average £71 per head of population.

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total public expenditure on housing in the United Kingdom as a proportion of the gross domestic product in each year since 1977 to the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Waldegrave: Total public expenditure on housing in the United Kingdom from 1977 to 1985 is shown in the table as a percentage of gross domestic product at factor cost. The definition is the same as in the answer given to the hon. Member on 23 May 1986, at columns 370-71, and on 2 April 1987, at columns 606-7. The figures for public expenditure on housing are taken from the annual national income accounts, which are usually published in September of each year. 1986 figures are, therefore, not yet available.

Public Expenditure on Housing as percentage of gross domestic product at factor cost per cent.

1977	3·1
1978	3·3
1979	3·4
1980	3·5
1981	1·6
1982	2·6
[1]1983	2·9
1984	3·0
1985	2·5

[1] Discontinuity between 1982 and 1983 is due to introduction of housing benefit and consequent exclusion of rent from supplementary benefit paid to tenants.

Old Persons' Establishments (Rates)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate what is the current rates revenue received from private and local authority establishments catering for old people as residents by each local authority in England.

Mr. Howard: This information is not collected centrally.

Religious Establishments (Rates)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate what is the current rates revenue received from religious establishments with permanent residents by each local authority in England.

Mr. Howard: This information is not collected centrally.

Canary Wharf

Ms. Gordon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) of 8 July, whether (a) a certificate from an independent valuer was obtained in respect of the prospective sale of Canary wharf by the London Docklands Development Corporation or (b) specific consent from his Department was sought or given.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) on 9 July 1987, at column 228.

Housing Associations

Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many dwellings are operated by housing associations in the Normanton constituency; and if he will break down the number into categories and type of dwellings.

Mr. Waldegrave [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1987, c. 296]: There are nine units operated by housing associations in the Normanton constituency and a further 47 under construction. The former are extra care units for the frail elderly and the latter are also designed to accommodate elderly people.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Housing

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Housing Executive houses in each of the housing executive districts have been sold to tenants up to the latest convenient date.

Mr. Needham: The number of homes sold by the Executive to its tenants in the 43 districts up until 30 June 1987 were as follows:

Region	Total

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland why he has changed his policy towards the receipts from the sale of houses owned by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: There has been no change in the policy which allows the Housing Executive to apply its capital receipts fully in support of its expenditure programmes. It has always been Government policy to take account of the Executive's estimates of income from rents and receipts in determining the overall level of expenditure by the Executive which includes its borrowings and grant-aid from Government.

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he proposes in respect of houses in the ownership of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive without central heating.

Mr. Needham: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive who has advised me that it is the Executive's long-term aim to provide central heating in all of its properties.

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the policy of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive with regard to the repair or replacement of steel-framed windows in its houses.

Mr. Needham [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: This is a matter for the chairman of the Housing Executive who has advised me that the policy in respect of galvanised steel window frames in existing housing stock is to retain them until the cost of repair and maintenance is so excessive as to merit replacement, of until repairs are no longer feasible.

Hospitals

Mr Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many elderly people are waiting for admission to geriatric beds in the hospitals in the North Down area.

Mr. Needham: The number of people waiting for admission to geriatric beds in the hospitals in the North Down area at 31 December 1986 was 107.

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the waiting list for patients who seek admission to (a) the Ulster hospital, Dundonald, (b) Royal Victoria hospital, Belfast, (c) City hospital, Belfast, (d) Mater hospital, Belfast and (e) the Bangor and Newtownards hospitals.

Mr. Needham: The number of patients seeking admission to the relevant hospitals at 31 December 1986 were as follows:

	Number
Ulster hospital	2,978
Royal Victorial hospital	5,862
Belfast City hospital	3,340
Mater hospital	72
Bangor hospital	386
Ards hospital	668

Beaches

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which beaches in Northern Ireland satisfy the requirements of the European Economic Community and are classified as beaches safe from pollution.

Mr. Needham: In Northern Ireland 14 waters have been identified under the EC directive on bathing-water quality. The directive applies to waters where bathing is traditionally practised by large numbers of people. Non-identification under the directive does not mean that water is unclear or unsafe. Of the five Northern Ireland bathing waters tested for compliance with the directive standards during the 1986 season, Portstewart, Portrush and Groomsport passed while Bangor (Ballyholme) and Newcastle failed. The cause of the failure at Bangor is being investigated and a new sewerage scheme for Newcastle at a cost of £2 million is nearing completion. I am advised that there is no evidence associating illness with bathing in Northern Ireland waters.

Sewage

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the work to prevent sewage spillage at Orlock, County Down, will be completed.

Mr. Needham: The spillage of sewage which occurred at Orlock, County Down, in April-May 1987 resulted from the simultaneous failure of both the normal and stand-by pumps at Coastguard lane. Replacement pumps were installed in mid-May are are now working satisfactorily. To avoid the possibility of future spillages the feasibility of laying an emergency overflow pipe from the pumping station to the sea is currently being investigated.

Pensions

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons in Northern Ireland are in receipt of retirement pension at the last available date; and how many receive supplementary benefit to augment their pension.

Mr. Needham: The number of persons in Northern Ireland in receipt of retirement pension at 30 November 1986 was 208,406. At 18 November 1986, 45,969 people were in receipt of supplementary benefit to augment their retirement pension.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will provide an estimate of the cost of unemployment in Northern Ireland for the last full financial year.

Mr. Needham: During the 1986-87 financial year a total of £227·9 million was paid to the unemployed £53·7 million by way of unemployment benefit and a further £174·2 million by way of supplementary allowances. Information on expenditure on agency benefits (for example, free welfare foods, school meals, Health Service charges, hospital fares, prison visits) and supplementary benefit single payments received by the unemployed is not readily available.

Clandeboye Shopping Centre (Fire)

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the fire at the Clandeboye shopping centre has revealed any shortcomings in measures to protect customers in an emergency.

Mr. Needham: No. The Clandeboye shopping centre complied with all the required measures to allow the safe evacuation of all occupants of the building in the event of a fire. On the day of the incident all customers and staff were evacuated safely and without casualty.

Cancer

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Department of Health and Social Services investigation into the incidence of cancer in Northern Ireland is completed; and when he expects it to make its final report.

Mr. Needham: The expert committee examining patterns of disease in Northern Ireland which have a possible association with radiation has not yet completed its work. I hope to receive the committee's final report by the end of 1987.

Warrenpoint Harbour

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the plans of the Warrenpoint harbour authority with regard to the expansion or development of the harbour area in Warrenpoint.

Mr. Needham [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: Planning approval for a proposal by the Warrenpoint harbour authority, for development of the area known as the Old Town dock, has recently been refused by the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland. I understand that the authority has no other current plans for expansion or development of the harbour area.

Water Rates

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the average household bill for water rates for each regional water authority in Northern Ireland for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Mr. Needham [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: A separate water bill is not levied in Northern Ireland, but is subsumed in the regional rate levied at a uniform poundage across the Province. From 1983-84 onward, however, it is possible to identify the portion of the regional rate attributable to provision of water and sewerage services, and the implied average rate demand per household for these years is shown in the table.

Average household water and sewerage rate demand

Year	£
1983-84	61·65
1984-85	67·85
1985-86	70·74
1986-87	71·60
1987-88	77·15

Water Supplies (Disconnections)

Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table showing the figures for the numbers of households where water supplies have been disconnected, showing where possible the reasons for disconnection, for each year separately between 1979 and 1987.

Mr. Needham [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: Since domestic water supplies are paid for through the general rating system in Northern Ireland, the need to disconnect premises used solely as household residences does not arise.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sex Data

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the guidelines dealing with use of data separated by sex for base line studies or other research within his responsibilities.

Mr. Eggar: There are no guidelines dealing with use of data separated by sex in either the diplomatic wing or the aid wing of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Dr. Kurt Waldheim

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what instructions were given to Her Majesty's ambassador in Amman regarding attendance at official functions given in honour of Doctor Kurt Waldheim during his visit to Jordan; and whether he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: Her Majesty's ambassador at Amman was authorised, in consultation with his European Community colleagues, to attend, as appropriate, events connected with the visit.

UN General Assembly Resolution 41/16

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs why the United Kingdom abstained on the United Nations General Assembly resolution 41/16 of 18 December 1986.

Mr. Eggar: We abstained both on this resolution and on a similar one in 1985 in accordance with our policy of strict neutrality in the Western Sahara dispute.

Western Sahara Refugees (Algeria)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to help relieve the suffering of the 165,000 Western Sahara refugees in Algeria.

Mr. Eggar: The Western Sahara refugees in Algeria receive assistance from European Community funds and from multilateral aid agencies to which we contribute.

Morocco

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will make it their policy to oppose any fishing agreement between the European Community and Morocco which extends to the territorial waters of Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Responsibility for the conduct of the negotiations for a fisheries agreement between Morocco and the European Community lies primarily with the Commission. We continue to monitor closely the progress of these negotiations.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to encourage peace between Morocco and the Polisario Front in Western Sahara; what contacts Her Majesty's Government have had with the parties concerned with a view to advancing the prospects for peace in the region; and what proposals Her Majesty's Government will be putting to King Hassan during his state visit to help bring about peace.

Mr. Eggar: We fully support the United Nations Secretary-General in his efforts to bring about a peaceful solution of the Western Sahara dispute. We look forward to discussing this and other international issues with King Hassan during his state visit.

DEFENCE

Cruise Missiles

12. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the number of cruise missiles to be based at Molesworth.

36. Mr. Nigel Griffiths asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the number of cruise missiles to be based at Molesworth.

Mr. Stewart: As has been stated previously it is planned that 64 cruise missiles will be based at Molesworth.

Conventional Weapons

13. Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the proportion of the defence budget spent on conventional weapons since 1979.

Mr. Younger: Over 97 per cent. of the defence budget since 1979 is estimated to have been spent on programmes other than the strategic nuclear force.

Nuclear Arms Control

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on verification procedures for enforcing nuclear arms control agreements.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Any arms control agreement must be effectively verifiable, but precise procedures will depend upon the terms of any agreement which may be negotiated.

Binary Chemical Weapons

15. Mr. Boyes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has held with the United States Secretary for Defence on the possibility of basing binary chemical weapons in the United Kingdom.

30. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the United States Secretary for Defence on the possibility of basing binary chemical weapons in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Ian Stewart: None.

Trafalgar Class Submarines

16. Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to assist the sale of Trafalgar class submarines by Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. to the Canadian Government; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Following the recent announcement in the Canadian defence White Paper of its requirement for a fleet of nuclear powered submarines Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd. has proposed the Trafalgar class submarine. Officials from the Ministry of Defence will shortly be visiting Canada for preliminary discussions of this requirement with their Canadian counterparts.

Trident

17. Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the Trident programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Kingdom Trident programme is making satisfactory progress and remains on time and to budget.

24. Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Defence what talks he has had with his French counterpart on co-operation on operational aspects of the deployment of Trident and the French submarine deterrent.

Mr. Younger: The British and French Governments maintain a close and fruitful dialogue on a wide range of defence and security matters.

31. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for Defence how it is proposed that communications will be maintained between Ministers and Trident submarines, and between Trident missiles and those deciding on targeting, without reliance on United States' extremely low-frequency systems and United States' satellites.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Effective and independent communications under the control of Her Majesty's Government will exist for all aspects of United Kingdom Trident submarine operations. Details of these are naturally classified.

45. Mr. Franks asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to place officially the order for the second Trident submarine.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) earlier today.

Frigates

18. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many type 23 frigates have been ordered; and if he is satisfied with progress on the type 23 frigate building programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: Four type 23 frigates are currently on order. The First of Class HMS Norfolk was launched by Her Royal Highness The Princess Margaret on 10 July and the other ships are making satisfactory progress.

Purple Warrior Exercise

19. Mr. Foulkes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has received concerning the Purple Warrior tri-service exercise to be held in south-west Scotland in November.

Mr. Ian Stewart: As part of its normal exercise planning activity, my Department has consulted the regional and district councils for the area, the local police forces and national governmental and environmental bodies, including the Nature Conservancy Council and the Forestry Commission. Private landowners and local community, environmental and fishing groups are also being consulted closely. That apart, my Department has received no representations, other than recent correspondence from the hon. Gentleman and the Questions tabled by the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) at column 113.

Polaris

20. Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he remains satisfied with the performance of Polaris missiles.

Mr. Ian Stewart: Yes.

Intermediate Nuclear Forces Agreement

21. Mr. Ernie Ross asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to hold discussions with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts on the implications of an intermediate nuclear forces agreement.

50. Ms. Ruddock asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he next intends to hold discussions with his North Atlantic Treaty Organisation counterparts on the implications of an intermediate nuclear forces agreement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for Defence, next expects to meet his Alliance colleagues collectively at the autumn meeting of NATO's nuclear planning group when a wide variety of nuclear policy issues will be discussed.

Willsworthy Firing Range

22. Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement as to the progress in his plans for accommodation for troops on the Willsworthy firing range on Dartmoor.

Mr. Freeman: Willsworthy Camp provides important facilities for regular and TA forces using the Dartmoor training areas, including the Willsworthy range. The camp is, however, in need of early replacement. Rather than rebuild on this site, which occupies a prominent position on the moor, the Ministry of Defence has recently purchased a suitable alternative small area of land at Higher Beardon farm, near Lydford. With new accommodation provided there the site of the present camp would be returned to moorland. The Dartmoor national park committee are aware of our plans in general terms and we will shortly be submitting our proposals through the normal planning consultation procedures.

F111 Aircraft

23. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for Defence in what military circumstances it is envisaged that American F111 aircraft would be used in Europe at a time of conflict.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The F111 is a long-range dual capable aircraft which is assigned to SACEUR for use in the event of a conflict involving NATO in Europe. In accordance with the practice of successive Governments, I am not prepared to comment on the details of particular operational plans.

Training Activities

25. Mr. Stevens asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the resources made available to the armed forces for training activities.

Mr. Freeman: I refer the hon. Member to tables 2.3 and 4.2-4.4 of volume 2 of the "Statement on the Defence Estimates 1987" which give details, respectively, of the financial and manpower resources devoted to training. In 1987-88 £1,277 million was spent by the three services and service colleges in training.

Central Ordnance Depot, Bicester

26. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress being made in the consideration of contracting-out certain activities of the Central Ordnance Depot, Bicester.

Mr. Sainsbury: We are currently preparing statements of requirements for those tasks which are to be exposed to competition. These will form the basis of the tender documents which we are aiming to issue to potential contractors later this year.

Local Overseas Allowance

27. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the saving to the defence budget deriving from his proposed cuts in the local overseas allowances for the British Army of the Rhine.

Mr. Freeman: Local overseas allowance is a tax-free payment intended to compensate for the extra cost of serving overseas. It is examined annually to ensure that it continues to meet that objective. In Germany the 1987 examination demonstrated that the sums required to compensate service personnel for the extra costs were lower than in 1986. Accordingly, LOA in Germany will be reduced from 1 August 1987, providing savings of about £25 million in a full financial year.

Small Firms (Contracts)

28. Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many small firms were awarded contracts by the Ministry of Defence in 1986-87.

Mr. Sainsbury: The collation of this information is a considerable task. I expect to have the necessary details around the turn of the year and will write to my hon. Friend at that time.

Northern Ireland

29. Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the number of troops stationed in Northern Ireland and the extent of the liaison with the Irish security forces.

Mr. Ian Stewart: The number of troops operating in support of the RUC in Northern Ireland as at 31 March 1987 (the most recent available figure) was 17,694. Liaison with the Irish security forces is achieved through the close and growing co-operation between the RUC and Garda.

32. Mr. Michael McNair-Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what are the lengths of the tours of duty of Army units serving in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Freeman: The six resident infantry battalions in Northern Ireland undertake tours of duty of about two years and the four roulement infantry battalions undertake short tours of about four and a half months. These tour lengths, which also apply to most other units in the Province, have remained unchanged for some years. Personnel who are posted to the Province as individuals and not as part of a unit change over — for example, headquarters staff — also serve on tours of about two years.

Rosyth Dockyard

33. Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of orders won by the private contractors at Rosyth dockyard.

Mr. Sainsbury: I am satisfied with the work which has been done by Rosyth dockyard since 6 April, since which time some 27 ship and submarine contracts and some 51 for other work have been placed with the dockyard. Of these, two were ships not already in the yard when the commercial managers took over.

IEPG Meeting

34. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent IEPG meeting.

Mr. Younger: My IEPG colleagues and I met in Seville on 22 June. The main business of the meeting was to consider proposals for increasing the competitiveness of Europe's defence industries and we set in hand detailed work aimed at establishing a framework within which we might move ahead in this vital area.

We also re-emphasised the fact that the activities of the IEPG are aimed at producing a stronger and more cohesive European contribution to the Alliance.

Royal Navy (Fuel Supplies)

35. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on supplies of fuel to the Royal Navy.

Mr. Freeman: We have now decided that the amount of fuel available to the Royal Navy this year should be increased, and so enable activity levels to be broadly comparable with those of recent normal years.

Research Budget

37. Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will state the proportion of his Department's research budget, for the last year for which figures are available, spent in each of the English regions, Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Sainsbury: Defence research expenditure is not accounted for on a regional basis.

NATO (Defences)

38. Mr. Kirkhope asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he plans to meet the United States Defence Secretary to discuss North Atlantic Treaty Organisation defences in the North Atlantic.

Mr. Ian Stewart: My right hon. Friend has frequent meetings with his United States colleague, when a range of Alliance defence issues are discussed. He next expects to meet the United States Defence Secretary at the autumn meeting of NATO's nuclear planning group.

RAF North Luffenham

39. Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the future of RAF North Luffenham.

Mr. Freeman: I wrote to the hon. Member on 2 July to inform him that we envisage a long-term future for RAF North Luffenham and no loss of employment prospects there.

An announcement to the personnel at the station to this effect has recently been made.

Low-flying Operations

40. Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many fatalities have resulted from low-flying operations over the past five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: Since 1 July 1982, the deaths of five RAF personnel have occurred in the United Kingdom during low-level flying operations by fast jet aircraft. A further 10 such deaths have resulted from crashes at sea around the United Kingdom. No civilians have been killed in these accidents. As is well known, a certain amount of low-level flying training is essential to the readiness of our aircrew. A degree of risk to those aircrew and of disturbance to the public is, regrettably, inevitable. However, all possible steps are taken to reduce this to a minimum.

51. Mrs. Margaret Ewing asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review safety procedures applicable to Royal Air Force low-flying exercises in light of recent accidents.

Mr. Freeman: The regulations governing the low-flying system are kept continuously under review and are altered as necessary. When the reasons for an accident are known these will be taken into account in our ongoing examinations of safety procedures.

Co-operative Ventures (France)

41. Mr. Ward asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he plans to meet the French Defence Minister to discuss co-operative defence ventures.

Mr. Younger: I expect to meet M. Giraud later this month to discuss a range of issues of mutual defence interest.

Strategic Defence Initiative

42. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the latest estimated total of strategic defence initiative contracts awarded to British companies.

Mr. Sainsbury: $34 million. This figure includes United States-funded SDI contracts placed with British academic institutions and through the Ministry of Defence. In the last case all but about $3 million of the work has been subcontracted to industry.

Nuclear Weapons

43. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will consider moving to an explicit policy of no first use of nuclear weapons in the light of current arms control negotiations.

Mr. Ian Stewart: No. It is long established NATO policy, to which we are fully committed, that no NATO weapons, either conventional or nuclear, would ever be used except in response to attack. That is a more fundamental commitment than renunciation of the option of first use of nuclear weapons. As has been only recently reaffirmed, nuclear weapons remain an essential component of NATO's policies of deterrence and flexible response. The current arms control negotiations do not alter our commitment to these important principles which will continue to remain valid for the foreseeable future.

Helicopter Procurement

44. Mr. Ashdown asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on future helicopter procurement.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the statement made by my right hon. Friend on 9 April, at columns 470-1, about orders which, subject to the satisfactory resolution of contractual and other issues, he intends to place for the utility version of the EH101 and for Lynx and Sea King helicopters; we are discussing the details with Westlands Helicopters accordingly.

In addition, we are participating with Italy, the Netherlands and Spain in a two-year study into the feasibility and cost of developing the Agusta 129 to meet the future light attack helicopter requirements of the four nations: Industry began work on the study at the beginning of last month.

European Fighter Aircraft

46. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress on the European fighter aircraft.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack).

Territorial Army

47. Mr. Conway asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on recruitment to the Territorial Army.

Mr. Freeman: The annual levels of recruitment into the Territorial Army have continued to show a steady improvement over the past five years. The figures are as follows:

Training year	Officers	Soldiers	Total
1982-83	715	23,218	23,933
1983-84	989	20,032	21,021
1984-85	920	23,931	24,851
1985-86	1,848	24,048	25,896
1986-87	1,919	24,579	26,498

Conventional Weapons

48. Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his Department's response to the latest Warsaw pact proposals contained in the Berlin statement covering conventional armaments.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I read the Warsaw pact communiqué with interest, and would draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the communiqué issued by NATO Foreign Ministers after the meeting of the North Atlantic Council in Reykjavik on 11 June, a copy of which is in the Library of the House. This reiterated the Alliance's determination to pursue its initiatives for achieving a comprehensive, stable and verifiable balance of conventional forces at lower levels. It indicated that work on draft mandates to be tabled in the CSCE meeting and in the conventional stability talks would be pressed ahead. It also reiterated the West's desire to achieve a meaningful agreement in the MBFR talks, calling upon the Warsaw pact to respond positively to the very important proposals made by the West in December 1985.

Defence Committee (Report)

49. Mrs. Mahon asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he will make a statement on the recent Defence Committee report on the implications for the United Kingdom of ballistic missile defence.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Government's response to this report is currently under consideration, and will be presented to Parliament in due course.

Tank Gunnery (Standards)

52. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the standard of British tank international gunnery demonstrated in recent competitions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ian Stewart: I do not believe that the performance of tanks in the artificial circumstances of a competition, such as the recent Canadian Army Trophy, is a proper indication of their capability in war. Challenger's gun gives the best penetrative performance against the tanks of a potential enemy. The tank itself is arguably the best protected in the world and has excellent mobility. It carries an advanced thermal imaging system which is much admired by our allies and ensures that Challenger can fight effectively by night and by day. Participation in international tank gunnery competitions is one useful option in the complete spectrum of training opportunities available in preparing our tank crews for war, but it is not on its own a basis for judgment of overall capability.

Single Role Minehunter

Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to be able to announce the results of the tenders for the single role minehunter order.

Mr. Sainsbury: Tenders are still being evaluated and we expect to be in a position to announce the results before the summer recess.

Destroyers and Frigates

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list by class the destroyers and frigates presently serving in the Royal Navy showing for each vessel the current age and the dates between which they have undergone major refits.

Mr. Sainsbury: The destroyers and frigates currently serving in the Royal Navy, their ages from commissioning, and the dates between which they have undergone refits are as follows. Those vessels listed in the "Statement on the Defence Estimates" as due to join the Fleet this year but which have not yet done so (Coventry, Cornwall and Sheffield) are not included.

Morocco

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if any restrictions are imposed by Her Majesty's Government on the use of British-supplied military equipment beyond Morocco's internationally recognised frontiers in Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Successive Administrations have not answered detailed questions of this kind. In general, however, the British Government consider all relevant political, strategic and security factors before issuing any export licence for defence equipment.

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the sale of Tornado aircraft to Morocco;

(2) what was the value of United Kingdom arms sales to Morocco in each of the last 10 years; what contracts exist for British arms sales to Morocco; and what negotiations are currently taking place.

Mr. Sainsbury: It has been the policy of this and previous Administrations not to comment on matters of this kind.

USAF (Mid-air Refuelling)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether any notice has been given by the United States Air Force of its intention to continue mid-air refuelling exercises at low level, using B-52 bombers, in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: There has been no such activity and none is planned.

EMPLOYMENT

Wages (Statistics)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish a table showing (i) on a national basis and (ii) on a regional basis the average weekly wage for (a) full-time male employees, (b) part-time male employees, (c) full-time female employees and (d) part-time female employees in both cash terms and real terms based on 1987-88 prices for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lee: I am sending the hon. Member the information requested, which is also available in the Library.

MSC Schemes (Rules)

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make available to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureau a full and comprehensive set of rules governing all aspects of the Manpower Services Commission schemes.

Mr. Lee: All the leaflets published by the Manpower Services Commission on the schemes which it operates are freely available to the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureau. These set out the main eligibility criteria. It would not be appropriate to provide more detailed information since the rules are designed to be applied flexibly to meet particular circumstances. The leaflets advise on where further information can be obtained.

Labour Statistics

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he has any plans to alter the publication of the monthly unemployment figures; and what plans he has for a quarterly labour force survey as is used in the United States of America.

Mr. Fowler: My Department continually assesses the quality of its published statistics and seeks ways to improve them, but I have no present proposals for specific changes.

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide, for the last full year for which information is available for the United Kingdom, Scotland and Fife, Central constituency (a) how many 16 and 17-year-olds entered the YTS, (b) what percentage gained employment at the expiry of their period on the scheme and (c) how many 16 and 17-year-olds remained unemployed.

Mr. Cope: Information about YTS entrants and leavers is not available in the form requested, but is available for Great Britain, Scotland, and Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy local authority districts, which together are representative of Fife, Central constituency.

During the period of April 1985 to March 1986, the last full year for which information is obtainable, 406,332 young people started YTS in Great Britain, 46,398 in Scotland and 3,212 in Dunfermline and Kirkcaldy local authority districts.

The MSC conducts a regular follow-up survey of YTS leavers three months after young people leave the programme. The table shows the destinations of young people who left YTS in the period April 1985 to March 1986.

Note: Percentages are rounded to whole numbers.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will state the number of unemployed people in Monklands, West constituency (a) 16-18 years of age, (b) 18-21 years of age, (c) 21-25 years of age, (d) 25-45 years of age, (e) 45-55 years of age, and (f) over 55 years of age, giving the latest available figures.

Mr. Lee: Following is the available information, which is also in the Library.

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will publish the latest unemployment figures for Carlisle in the Official Report by district ward boundary.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. The table shows the number of unemployed claimants in each electoral ward in Carlisle local authority district.

Nuclear Installations Inspectorate

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the extent to which salaries paid to the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate are adequate to recruit employees with experience of the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board.

Mr. Cope: The salary scales of recruitment grade nuclear installations inspectors have been increased by £4,000 per annum since April 1986 and a further pay award of £5,000 per annum has been agreed for 1 September 1987. Recruitment to the inspectorate is continuing and in the latest competition a number of candidates from the Central Electricity Generating Board and the South of Scotland Electricity Board have been invited for interview.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment which tasks the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (a) is not able to fulfil at all, (b) has delayed fulfilling and (c) has fulfilled to an inadequate extent, due to understaffing.

Mr. Cope: Her Majesty's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate of the HSE has always carried out essential tasks, giving priority to the inspection and assessment of operating installations.

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what steps are being taken to increase recruitment to the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate;

(2) whether he will make a statement on the recommendations of the second report of the Energy Committee, Session 1986-87, insofar as they relate to his responsibilities for the Nuclear Installations Inspectorate.

Mr. Cope: The Select Committee on Energy, in its second report, made recommendations about the recruitment and retention of Nuclear Installations Inspectorate staff. The resources and staffing of the inspectorate are the responsibility of the Health and Safety Commission and Executive, subject to the limits set by Government on their total manpower and running costs. The Government, the commission and the executive recognise the importance of ensuring that the NII is adequately staffed. Two substantial increases to salaries for all nuclear installations inspectors have recently been agreed and Health and Safety Executive expects that this will enable the inspectorate to attract recruits with the expertise and skills required to bring its staff up to the levels planned for 1987-88. A recruitment competition for inspectors is now under way and there are indications that the number of good quality applicants has increased.

Sellafield (Monitoring)

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment if sufficent nuclear inspectors are now in post to be able to monitor the Sellafield complex adequately; and what backlog of work currently exists at this site.

Mr. Cope: The level of inspection and examination at the Sellafield complex is adequate to ensure the safety of the public and site personnel. The large concentration of effort during the Sellafield audit diverted some resources from assessment work and routine inspection. Any interruption of routine inspection was outweighed by the benefits arising from increased surveillance during the audit.

Hotels (Costs)

Mr. Wood asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to establish a code of conduct for British hotels in respect of charging clients for telephone and similar non-accommodation costs.

Mr. Lee: The Government support the hotel industry's voluntary code of booking practice, which was updated and revised in 1986. This code of practice stipulates that special charges for telephone and other non-accommodation costs should be drawn to the attention of guests. The Government do not, however, have any plans to introduce a code in respect of the charges themselves. Pricing policy, including charges for telephone and similar non-accommodation costs, is a matter for the hotel industry.

Tourism

Mr. Steen asked the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from the tourist industry on the further development of tourism.

Mr. Lee: I have continuing contact with representatives of the industry and have received correspondence on a variety of subjects relating to the development of tourism in England.

Nuclear Inspectors

Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for Employment what studies his Department has made of the future numbers of nuclear inspectors who will be required if the electricity industry is privatised.

Mr. Cope: None.

Enterprise Agencies

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he is satisfied that enterprise agencies are sufficiently well advertised and visible for persons with spare premises suitable for new-start businesses to be able readily to notify those agencies of the availability of such premises; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: Local enterprise agencies are independent organisations and therefore responsible primarily to their own boards and supporters for their activities, including their visibility in the local community. Information on local enterprise agencies will be available through a wide range of sources, including libraries, local authorities, and the Government's small firms centres and jobcentres. The Department of Employment, through its local agency grant scheme, is encouraging greater professionalism in LEA management; LEA business plans, an integral part of the grant application, should address, as appropriate, the availability of small business premises.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Martlew asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of people in receipt of unemployment benefit in the Carlisle constituency.

Mr. Lee: On 14 May 1987 the number of unemployed claimants of benefits in the Carlisle constituency was 3,802.

THE ARTS

Museums

Mr. Butler asked the Minister for the Arts if he will undertake a review of the use of volunteers in museums.

Mr. Luce: Volunteers have always had an important and valuable role to play in British museums. A comprehensive survey of the use of volunteers in museums and galleries was undertaken in 1984 by the volunteers centre under the sponsorship of the Museums and Galleries Commission and with funding from the Office of Arts and Libraries.

Consideration is currently being given to developing guidance for museums on the use of volunteers.

NATIONAL FINANCE

National Economic Development Office

Ms. Armstrong asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans the Government have for the future of the National Economic Development Office.

Mr. Lawson: I informed the National Economic Development Council on 1 July of the Government's conclusions that in future the council would meet four times a year and that the work of the economic development committees and similar activities could not be justified on their present scale. A list of those EDCs which the Government consider would justify public funding after the current financial year has now been sent to the NEDC parties. The Government will take final decisions in the light of their comments. As a consequence of these changes there will be a corresponding reduction in the size of the National Economic Development Office.

Income Tax

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of raising the income tax threshold to £4,000; how many people this would take out of tax altogether; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Married Man's Tax Allowance

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made at the savings to the Exchequer of abolishing the married man's tax allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

VAT

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the increase in the rate of inflation from current levels if value added tax at 15 per cent. were imposed on all goods and services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The direct effect of imposing value added tax at 15 per cent. on all these goods and services which are currently zero rated would be to raise the level of retail prices by 4 per cent. The Government's medium term financial strategy ensures that there would be no lasting effect on the rate of inflation.

Mortgage Interest Tax Relief

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has any plans to review the availability of mortgage tax relief; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has reaffirmed on several occasions, the Government remain committed to continuing mortgage interest relief.

New and Expanding Companies

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider expanding the range of investment and capital relief for investment in new and expanding companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Clydesdale Bank

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bank of England was informed of the sale of the Clydesdale Bank to the National Australia Bank; when the Treasury was informed of the matter; whether either sought or received any guarantees as to employment, investment and autonomy of operation; and when the Bank of England gave its approval to the sale.

Mr. Lilley: The Bank of England was informed at an early stage of the negotiations. The bank considered the proposed acquisition of Clydesdale Bank and Northern by National Australia Bank and, against the criteria in the Banking Act 1979, indicated to Midland Bank and National Australia Bank before the announcement on 7 July that it had no objection in principle. The Treasury was also informed before the announcement.

Discussions with the National Australia Bank did not include the question of guarantees of the kind to which the hon. Member refers, as such guarantees were neither necessary nor appropriate to meet the Banking Act criteria.

Customs Officers (Dispute)

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the effects of the dispute involving customs officers in terms of delays to goods imports.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: The Civil Service trade unions' industrial action which involved customs officers has been suspended. All customs officers are now working normally and there are no abnormal delays to goods imported.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Young People (Benefits)

Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many young people have had their benefit reduced or suspended for either (a) refusing a YTS place or (b) leaving a scheme early in the Leeds, West constituency and in the Leeds metropolitan district council areas.

Mr. Portillo: The table sets out the number of young people whose supplementary benefit has been reduced by local offices serving the Leeds, West constituency and in the Leeds metropolitan district council area for the period from December 1983 to April 1987. The youth training scheme started in April 1983 but records were not kept from the outset.

Numbers Whose Benefit was Reduced	Leeds, West	Leeds Metropolitan District Council
(a) for refusing to take up a youth training scheme place	5	12
(b) for leaving a youth training scheme place early	75	150

NHS (Scientists' Pay)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make it his policy to ensure that graduate scientists working in the National Health Service receive pay awards that are comparable to those gained by similarly qualified people in the private sector.

Mr. Newton: The pay of graduate scientists is a matter for the Whitley Council. I understand that negotiations are in progress on the 1987 pay claim.

"What To Do After a Death"

Mr. Hargreaves asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will reissue the leaflet, "What To Do After a Death".

(2) why the leaflet "What To Do After a Death", has been out of print since 1979.

Mr. Portillo: The current edition of Social Security leaflet D49 "What To Do After a Death", is still available. The August 1979 date on the cover of the leaflet is an indicaton of the original production date for that edition. Since that date the leaflet has been amended and reprinted several times. Half a million copies were printed and distributed by the Department last year. A new edition of the leaflet is in the final stages of preparation and will be available later this year.

Pensioners (Incomes)

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table for the latest date for which the figures are available, showing the numbers of pensioners with gross weekly incomes other than the state basic pension of £0-£5, £5-£10, £10-£15, £15-£20, £20-£30, £30-£40, £40-£50, £50-£60, £60-£70, £70-£80, £80-£90, £90-£100, £100-£150, £150-£200, £200-£250, £250-£300, £300-£350, £350-£400, £400-£450, £450-£500, and over £500 also distinguishing between single and married pensioners.

Mr. Scott: The table shows the number of pensioners[1] with income, other than retirement pension of any category or supplementary pension, at the levels specified.

Benefits

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total number of people in receipt of supplementary benefit in the Fife, Central constituency at (a) June 1979, (b) June 1983 and (c) June 1987.

Mr. Portillo: Fife, Central constituency is served by Kirkcaldy, Cowdenbeath and Leven local offices, although the local office and constituency boundaries are not conterminous. The table shows the number of people receiving supplementary benefit for the years requested and, as the information is made available on a quarterly basis, May figures have been produced as the nearest alternative to June for each year:

Hip Operations

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the minimum, maximum and average time that he estimates that a person living in Leicester and requiring a hip replacement operation under the National Health Service would have to wait, from the date when his or her general practitioner originally recommended such surgical intervention.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. and learned Member the information he seeks. It is not held centrally. The hon. and learned Member may wish to write to the chairman of the Leicestershire district health authority who may be able to provide the information requested.

Electoral Statistics

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list in order of size those constituencies in England whose electorates are above the quota.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested is given in the table.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Moore: Details of the Government's measures designed to help small businesses are given in the White Papers "Lifting the Burden" Cmnd. 9571 (July 1985), "Building Businesses . . . not Barriers" Cmnd. 9794 (May 1986) and in the progress report "Encouraging Enterprise" published May 1987, copies of which have been placed in the Library. These publications include details of those measures to help business introduced by my Department over the last three years.

Considering ways of helping small businesses and encouraging enterprise remain important elements in the work of my Department. The Department has a system to monitor proposals which impact on business to ensure that the needs of small businesses are fully taken into account. Specific performance indicators would not be of practical assistance in monitoring achievements in this area.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what information he has sought or been offered by health authorities regarding the effect of the lifting of Crown immunity; how many authorities have had to increase their expenditure on food hygiene and health and safety; and what requests for increased funding he has received as a consequence;

(2) if he will take steps to ensure that the accounting system for health authorities will enable identification of the extent to which the lifting of Crown immunity has increased hospital spending on food hygiene and health and safety in the first year without immunity;

(3) if he will request from regional health authorities information on the additional costs so far incurred or predicted in their regions because of the lifting of Crown immunity; and if he will seek a breakdown of the nature of the costs.

Mrs. Currie: I shall let the right hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Disablement Services Authority

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many members of the new Disablement Services Authority are disabled.

Mr. Scott: Two. One amputee, and one wheelchair user.

Mr. Hannam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the new Disablement Services Authority plans to meet.

Mr. Scott: I understand that at the first meeting of the Disablement Services Authority on 1 July the following meeting dates were agreed for 1987:

30 July
26 August
6 October
5 November
1 December

Thereafter, starting on 7 January 1988, I understand that the authority intends to meet on the first Thursday of each month.

Cancer Screening

Mr. Hoyle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women have been tested for cervical cancer in the Warrington district health authority area in the last six months; how many of these tests have been fully processed; how many of the results have been sent out; and what is the average waiting time for these results.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. It is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of Warrington district health authority for the information requested.

The health authority did experience some difficulties in keeping within the one month target for sending out results. However, with the engagement of an additional medical laboratory scientific officer, the health authority expects to achieve a three-week turn round time from the end of August.

Community Care

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made as to whether mental illness patients with a hospital stay of less than a month, who cannot return to their previous accommodation, can be provided for on discharge by local housing authorities under the Housing Act 1985.

Mrs. Currie: Clinicians are expected to pay regard to the circumstances and needs of patients when arrangements for discharge are being made. Health and local authorities should work together, in collaboration with the voluntary and private sectors, to provide a range of services, including accommodation, to meet the needs of former patients.

Local housing authorities have a statutory duty under the Housing Act 1985 to secure accommodation for those whom they judge to be in priority need. The definition of priority need includes mentally ill people and housing authorities are recommended by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to consult health and social services authorities in assessing individual cases.

Community Charge

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements he proposes to make to enable those on supplementary benefit to receive compensation for their 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge; how long they will be required to wait before compensation is paid; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Government have made it clear that the decision to compensate those on income support, for the average minimum contribution towards domestic rates, will be carried through on introduction of the community charge. Details will be announced in due course.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of (a) collecting from supplementary benefit recipients their 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge and (b) the cost of paying compensation to those on supplementary benefit for their 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714) discusses in paragraph 3.43 the operational issues and cost of collecting the community charge. The cost of taking account of the minimum contributions in benefit rates will depend on the detailed arrangements yet to be announced.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the total sum to be collected from those making the 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The amount of community charge to be collected from those eligible for maximum rebate of the charge cannot yet be known. It will depend on the level of charges set by local authorities and the numbers of people qualifying for income-related benefits.

National Health Service (Cost Monitoring)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what measures he proposes to take to monitor the relative costs and performance of National Health Service regional health authorities, individual hospitals, hospital and community based services and medical procedures; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: A number and variety of measures have already been devloped to monitor the relative costs and performance of the National Health Service. A foremost example is the performance indicator package which provides managers at all levels with the means of comparing the performance of their own services with those in other authorities.

Analysis of performance indicators, together with the results of other forms of monitoring (such as scrutiny of regions' strategies, annual short-term programme implementation reports and financial and statistical returns) are channelled into the anual accountability review process. Introduced in 1982 between the Department and regional health authorities, the review process has since extended through the service and brings to an annual head the continuous process of monitoring, appraisal and review of NHS performance. Work on improving the existing arrangements continues.

The Department is also exploring new measures, like involving professional staff directly in resource management, aimed at helping all those working in the service to improve the quantity and quality of services provided to the public.

Private Contractors

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on progress made by health authorities in contracting out ancillary services.

Mr. Newton: The initiative launched by the Government in September 1983 was competitive tendering for domestic cleaning, catering and laundry services in the National Health Service. In England, health authorities continue to make good progress in putting these services out to tender thereby testing their cost effectiveness. By 31 March 1987, 78 per cent. of these services had been put out to tender.

Total annual savings generated as a result in England are estimated at £93·3 million — an increase of £7·3 million over the figure reached at 31 December 1986. £26·1 million of the total savings generated have been realised from 194 contracts let to private contractors and £67·2 million from 1046 tenders secured by in-house organisations.

Information for Scotland and Wales is for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales, respectively.

Low-income Families

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if, pursuant to the answer given to the hon. Member for Birkenhead on 7 July, Official Report, column 115, on low income families, he will detail the reasons for and the nature of the technical review being undertaken.

Mr. Scott: The technical review is being conducted by officials from the Department of Health and Social Security and the Central Statistical Office. Since the methods and assumptions underlying the low-incomes statistics have never been systematically reassessed, the review is considering a range of bases of measurement, for example, the income-unit (the individual, the family and the household), the income-period (annual, current or normal), and how adjustments are to be made for the size and composition of income units. In addition, ideas in the academic literature are being reviewed. Some alternative approaches to the measurement of low income were outlined in the Green Paper "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9519).

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he hopes to publish the 1985 low-income families tables and the figures showing the number of children living in low-income families.

Mr. Scott: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on Tuesday 7 July, at column 115.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish a table showing the value of the long-term supplementary benefit scale rates, excluding housing costs, for a single person and a married couple as a proportion of average net earnings for all males for each year from November 1978 to April 1986.

Mr. Scott: The information is as follows:

Uprating date	Scale rates as a percentage of average net earnings of all males[1]
	Single non-householder	Single householder	Couple
November 1978	24·4	30·4	45·8
November 1979	23·7	29·7	45·0
November 1980	23·2	29·1	44·4
November 1981	23·4	29·3	44·9
November 1982	24·3	30·4	46·5
November 1983	23·6	29·5	45·0
November 1984	22·7	28·4	43·1
November 1985	22·3	27·9	42·4
July 1986[2]	21·2	26·5	40·3

Supplementary benefit rates are more usually compared with male manual earnings.[1] The equivalent percentages are as follows:

Uprating date	Single non-householder	Single householder	Couple
November 1978	26·5	33·0	49·5
November 1979	25·9	32·4	48·9
November 1980	26·2	32·8	49·7
November 1981	26·7	33·4	50·9
November 1982	27·9	34·9	52·9
November 1983	27·1	34·0	51·4
November 1984	26·2	32·8	49·4
November 1985	26·0	32·4	48·9
July 1986[2]	24·8	31·0	46·7

[1] Net average earnings is gross average earnings less tax and national insurance contributions at the non-contracted out rate.

[2] Provision. The comparison is based on July benefit rates, when the uprating took place in 1986.

Mr. Gordon Brown asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate (a) the total savings, (b) the number of people affected, and (c) the average loss per person resulting from the changes in the regulations for the payment of mortgage interest for people on supplementary benefit.

Mr. Scott: Our latest estimates of the effect of the changes made in January to the amount allowed for mortgage interest in supplementary benefit for new claimants under 60 are:

(a) savings of £38 million in the year 1987-88;

(b) just over 70,000 claimants affected at any one time;

(c) an average amount of mortgage interest of £170 would not be met for someone staying on benefit the full 16 weeks.

Regional Health Authority Chairmen

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will announce the appointment of regional health authority chairmen from 1 August.

Mr. Moore: The terms of office of three of the 14 regional health authority chairmen expire on 31 July 1987. On the retirement of Sir Arthur South JP, I have appointed Mr. Colin Walker OBE to succeed him as chairman of East Anglian RHA. The chairmen of South East Thames and North Western RHAs have accepted my invitation to continue to serve in this most important position.

The appointments are as follows:

East Anglian Mr. Colin Walker OBE until 31 July 1991.

SE Thames Sir Peter Baldwin KCB reappointed until 31 July 1989.

N Western Sir John Page OBE reappointed until 31 July 1988.

AIDS

Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he is taking to enable those undertaking research into the treatment and care of people with HIV or AIDS to learn from experiences in the United States.

Mr. Newton: The Department, with funds generously donated by Abbott Laboratories, is able to offer a number of travel fellowships to the United States of America for those undertaking research relevant to the care of people with HIV infection or AIDS in hospital or the community. The fellowships are designed to provide an opportunity to meet others working in the same field and to study their research methods.

Advertisements will be placed shortly inviting applications. The fellowships, of up to three months' duration to meet travel and subsistence expenses, will be available in late 1987 or in 1988.

Health Service Commissioner (Report)

Mr. Roger King asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to receive the annual report of the Health Service Commissioner for 1986-87.

Mr. Newton: The Health Service Commissioner has, as in previous years, made a single report on the performance of his functions in England, Scotland and Wales. My right hon. Friend, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales presented the report to the House yesterday. It is being published today (House of Commons Paper No. 31) and copies are available from the Vote Office.

Departmental Publications (Languages)

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which of his Department's publications are produced in languages other than English, and which are the additional languages used.

Mr. Portillo: The leaflet "Which Benefit" has been reproduced in Gujerati, Bengali, Punjabi, Urdu, Hindi and Chinese.

Implied Marginal Tax Rates

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish tables showing (a) implied marginal tax rates as a result of income tax, national insurance contribution and withdrawal of housing benefit (or equivalent) in each year since the introduction of rent rebates, and (b) implied marginal tax rates as a result of income tax, national insurance contribution, housing benefit and family income supplement/family credit withdrawal, for each year since introduction of family income supplement; and if he will include estimates for 1988 on the assumption that national insurance contribution and income tax rates will remain as at present.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is shown in the table. In practice, the impact of the highest theoretical marginal tax rates may be mitigated by the duration of benefit award (FIS awards run unchanged for a period of one year).

Notes:
1. Implied marginal tax rates are given for private and local authority tenants only.
2. The tables start from July 1972 when the national rent rebate and allowance scheme was introduced.
3. Changes in tax rates, national insurance contributions and housing benefit tapers have been included since July 1972.
4. Precise rates for the reformed social security system have yet to be set. The marginal tax rates for April 1988 are based on the illustrative assumptions included in the Technical Annex accompanying "Reform of Social Security" (Cmnd. 9691).

Child Benefit

Mrs. Maureen Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his policy with regard to the future of child benefit payments; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: There are no plans to reduce the scope of child benefit. All families will continue to get child benefit and it will be paid to the mother. Its rate will be determined as a part of the annual social security uprating exercise, when the need for a balanced programme of family support is considered.

Invalid Care Allowance

Mr. David Martin asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the system that when a child is at a special boarding school invalid care allowance is paid only in holiday periods and not as a retainer to the person responsible for the caring; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Invalid care allowance is paid to a carer for each week he or she spends at least 35 hours caring for a severly disabled person who is living at home and receiving an attendance allowance. We have not received any representations about these rules which preclude payment of the allowance when the disabled person is living away from home at a special boarding school or other residential accommodation.

Nursing and Residential Care Homes

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what rates of board and lodging benefits are payable to persons in private, charitable or voluntary old people's homes; and when they were last reviewed;

(2) when he next proposes to review the levels of benefits payable to persons in old people's homes; and whether he will be taking full account of the real cost of accommodation and support in such homes.

Mr. Scott: Supplementary benefit claimants in independent residential care and nursing homes for the elderly can have their fees met in full up to maximum weekly amounts which are currently £130 in a residential care home (£145 where the elderly claimant is blind or very dependent), and £175 in a nursing home. An extension of up to £17·50 is payable in homes in the Greater London area. Claimants also receive a personal expenses allowance of £9·25. Increases were last made on 6 April 1987, following a review which took account of a range of information on costs and charges including a report on changes in costs by management consultants Ernst and Whinney, which has now been placed in the Library. The next general uprating of benefits will be in April 1988, and the position of people in homes will again be considered, taking account of similar factors, in advance of that date. The Department would welcome any fresh information from hon. Members or other sources which might assist that process.

Regions (RAWP Allocation)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give for each region for each year since 1979-80 its capital resource allocation working party allocation as a percentage of its weighted population share.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 30 June 1987, c. 79-80]: The information requested is set out in the table. The RAWP (resource allocation working party) formula uses regions' populations weighted to take account of age and sex distribution and mortality rates, and the value of capital stock in relation to the weighted population as indicators of relative need.

From 1979-80 to 1984-85, 85 per cent. of the national RAWP sum was distributed on a weighted population basis, the remaining 15 per cent. serving to reduce the inherited disparities in the value of regional health authorities' capital stock. A review in 1983 concluded that the stock equalisation element did not provide a fair measure of relative need and regional health authorities agreed to move, progressively from 1985-86 to 1991-92, to capital RAWP allocations based solely on weighted population shares.

Mentally-Handicapped Children

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many children were placed in long-stay mental handicap hospitals for short-stay or respite care in the last 12 months; for how long they stayed there on average, for every health district; and what alternative community provision, including specialist fostering, is available to such children in each health district and each social services authority.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 7 July 1987, c. 129]: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information she seeks. Statistics are collected centrally on admissions to, and discharges from, mental handicap hospitals and units, but these cannot be linked to individual people. Figures on discharges by age and length of stay are contained in the set of booklets "Mental Health Statistics for England", available in the Library. Comprehensive information is not collected centrally on alternative community provision, including fostering arrangements.

SCOTLAND

Psychiatric Hospitals

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the population of Scottish psychiatric hospitals; and if he will state the percentage of the psychiatric hospital population aged between each of (a) 0 to 25 years, (b) 25 to 35 years, (c) 35 to 50 years, (d) 50 to 65 years and (e) over 65 years.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest information available is as follows:

Mentally Handicapped and Disabled Persons

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of purpose-built accommodation units for disabled people completed in Scotland in each of the years 1979 to 1985.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information covering this period is not readily available.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of full-time day centres and the average number of places within them for each of the (a) mentally ill, (b) mentally handicapped and (c) physically handicapped.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The latest available information is as follows:

Day Centres for Handicapped Adults at 31 March 1986[1]

Type of Centre[2]	Number of Centres	Number of Places	Average Number of Places per Centre
Mentally Ill	2	92	46·0
Mentally Handicapped	107	6,995	65·4
Physically Handicapped	30	1,362	45·4
Multiply Handicapped	4	129	32·2

[1] Provisional
[2] Day centres are classified according to the main group attending.

All centres provide for handicapped persons to attend on a full-time basis but a number of clients may attend only part-time.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the number of purpose-built accommodation units for disabled people completed in Scotland in 1986.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Returns submitted by housing authorities indicate that 52 dwellings purpose-built to accommodate disabled people were completed during 1986.

Central Computer Service

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he is satisfied with the performance of the Central Computer Service in the National Health Service in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Scottish Health Service Common Services Agency operates a computer centre whose role is limited to support of the agency itself (including payroll and preparation of all-Scotland health statistics) and of the Lanarkshire health board. It is not a central computer for the service as a whole since the health boards also operate large computer installations, either individually or in consortia.

In order to improve the collection, co-ordination and use of information to benefit the service my right hon. and learned Friend has recently authorised the formation of a new directorate of health service information systems, within the Common Services Agency.

Common Services Agency Building Division

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the Common Services Agency building division, with regard to the period between design and completion for hospitals.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I am making arrangements for a review of the Common Services Agency building division's current activities in hospital building.

Care in the Community

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he proposes to take to ensure that adequate short term funds are made available to health boards and local authorities, to meet the high cost of setting up properly funded community care schemes for elderly, mentally ill, mentally handicapped and physically disabled people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The level of funding for particular health and social work services is a matter for decision by individual health boards and local authorities in the light of local circumstances and subject to any general guidance they may receive through my Department. Both health boards and local authorities have been made aware of the need to give high priority to community care facilities for the elderly, mentally ill, and mentally and physically handicapped. I see no case for reducing their discretion in the use of resources available to them by earmarking some of them for particular purposes.

Elderly People

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what steps he is taking to promote the setting up of joint funded homes for elderly people with mental disability in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Arrangements for joint funding of these and other projects providing persons with appropriate care outside the hospital environment have existed since 1980 and were revised and extended in 1985. The allocation of resources to particular projects is a matter for decision by individual local authorities and health boards in the light of established priorities and local circumstances.

Psychiatry (Registrar Posts)

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he proposes to correct the situation of imbalance in registrar posts in psychiatry between teaching and non-teaching health boards in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A full review of hospital medical staffing is currently being conducted in Scotland with a report expected in the autumn. Thereafter it is expected that discussions will take place with the profession and health service management on a whole range of issues on medical manpower including deployment of registrars in different specialties.

Cervical Cytology

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the average length of time taken to provide results from cervical smears for each of the health board areas in Scotland; and if he will allocate extra resources to improve cytology services.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Information on the average length of time taken to provide results from cervical smear tests is not available centrally. I am currently considering the report of a working group set up under the chairmanship of Professor John Strong to review the cervical cytology screening service in Scotland and will announce the Government's response in due course.

Higher Education

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had from Scottish universities about the proposed Scottish committee for planning of higher education in Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have seen the representations made to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science by the Standing Committee of the Scottish Universities on behalf of all the Scottish universities in support of the proposal for a Scottish committee of the new Universities Funding Council. Individual universities have also made representations.

Glasgow Airport

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will hold a public inquiry into the proposed extension to Glasgow airport; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend is still considering whether he should call in the relevant planning application so the question of holding a public inquiry does not yet arise.

Housing

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the current and capital expenditure per head on housing in Scotland during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Rifkind: Current expenditure on the housing revenue accounts of local authorities, new towns and the SSHA was £175·80 per head of overall population in 1986-87. Information on the current expenditure of housing associations is not available. Gross capital expenditure by all public housing bodies in 1986-87 was £127·27 per head.

Radioactivity (Dounreay)

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether, in the light of the recent report of R. F. Wheaton of Edinburgh Radiation Consultants, a copy of which has been sent to him, he intends to review the pattern of monitoring of radioactivity in the vicinity of the Dounreay nuclear establishment.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. The report, apart from one set of readings, does not contain information which is out of line with previously published data. The anomalous results will be followed up.

High Court of Justiciary

Mr. Menzies Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in the provision of additional accommodation in Glasgow for the High Court of Justiciary; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Several options have been examined for the provision of additional court and ancillary facilities in Glasgow for the High Court of Justiciary; and consultations have been undertaken. My right hon. and learned Friend is considering in the light of these consultations how best to meet the future accommodation needs of the High Court in Glasgow.

Court of Session

Mr. Menzies Campbell asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals there are to provide additional accommodation in Edinburgh for the Court of Session; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Plans are being prepared to provide a rear extension to Parliament House comprising three additional civil courts with ancillary facilities, accommodation for the Court of Session's public offices, for its clerks of court and for the Supreme Court's staff training unit.

Local Authority Accounts (Access)

Mr. Allan Stewart asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he has any proposals to amend the statutory provisions governing public access to local authority accounts, in the light of the High Court judgment in the case of Olivers v. Northampton borough council.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend is aware of the Scottish implications of the English High Court judgment, concerning the public right of access to personal information in local authority accounts about an authority's employees. A consultation paper is being issued today inviting comments on a proposal that at the next convenient opportunity amending legislation should be introduced to limit this right of access to information about gross pay, allowances, bonuses and overtime payments. A copy of the paper has been placed in the Library.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Forensic Science Service

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he hopes to reach conclusions about the three reports on the forensic science service, to which he referred, Official Report, column 387, 30 June; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: I expect to receive the reports shortly. I shall write to the hon. Member once I have had the opportunity to consider them.

Prison Population

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the average daily prison population for (a) 1970, (b) 1975, (c) 1980 and (d) the latest year for which figures are available, showing in each case the proportion of remand prisoners.

Mr. John Patten: The information is given in the following table. Details of the average population for each of the previous 10 years are published annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (table 1.4 of the latest issue for 1985, Cmnd. 9903) and figures for 1986 were published in April in Home Office Statistical Bulletin 6/87.

Average population of Prison Department establishments in England and Wales, 1970, 1975, 1980 and 1986

Year	Number of persons	Percentage on remand[1]
1970	39,028	12
1975	39,820	14
1980	42,264	14
1986	46,770	21

[1] Untried or convicted unsentenced.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish as a table in the Official Report the total prison population and the prison population rate per 100,000 people for each member country of the Council of Europe showing United Kingdom figures, England and Wales figures and Scotland figures separately.

Mr. John Patten: A copy of the latest figures, which relate to 1 September 1986, from the Council of Europe, showing the information required has been placed in the Library. The information about prisoners in different countries published by the Council of Europe is not likely to be strictly comparable, because it reflects different legal and administrative systems and such differences may have a substantial effect on the comparisons. These difficulties apply particularly to the figures of committals to prison per 100,000 inhabitants.

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years, and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Hurd: The Home Office, as part of the Government's policy to promote small businesses, is undertaking a number of initiatives intended to help business.

The Home Office has reviewed all the licences for which it is responsible, to ascertain whether they place a burden on business and if so to see whether that burden could be reduced. A number of changes have been made which will help small business: for example, restrictions on betting offices have been relaxed; the requirement to hold a public billiard licence has been abolished; legislation has been introduced allowing bingo clubs to participate in a national bingo game; and a requirement for pest control firms to hold Home Office authority as well as Minister of Agriculture licences has been removed.

For future developments, the Government are proposing to introduce a Bill later this Session to liberalise the laws on liquor licencing hours; new Cinema (Safety) Regulations and a guide to fire precautions in existing places of public entertainment should reduce burdens on both businesses and local authorities; the Home Office will also be publishing, as a result of the Fire Safety and Safety at Places of Sport Act 1987, a guide specifically intended to help small businesses ascertain what measures are necessary for fire safety. Performance indicators and statistics are not available to show the result of these activities, which are in the main enabling and assisting provisions.

The Home Office, in partnership with other Government Departments, the private sector and local authorities, has helped to establish and fund four enterprise agencies in inner city areas with a high ethnic minority population. Though open to all, they are especially designed to counsel and support ethnic minority small businesses. The performance of the first three agencies, opened last year, is undergoing independent evaluation, using a number of performance indicators, including the number of businesses established and their rate of survival. An estimate will also be given of the value of the benefits flowing from the agencies' work in relation to the expenditure involved. An interim report will soon be made, but meanwhile there is evidence of ample demand for the agencies' services and that small businesses are being established as a result. As the evaluation progresses, more quantitative data are expected.

The Home Office is also providing funding, through section 11 of the Local Government Act 1966, for a number of local authority posts concerned with ethnic minority business development, and a grant for similar work to an existing enterprise agency in an inner city. Routine monitoring arrangements will cover all such posts.

In addition, my Department has for many years sponsored the Community Projects Foundation, which exists to demonstrate community development techniques in a range of local projects. Several of these have led to the setting up of small businesses. The work of the foundation has been regularly reviewed and we are at present considering proposals for research into the more systematic analysis of community development project.

Jury Fixing

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what information he has about the incidence of jury fixing in important criminal trials in London and elsewhere;

(2) what efforts are being made by police forces in England and Wales to counter the practice of jury nobbling.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that the police have intelligence which indicates that attempts to bring illegal pressure to bear on jurors have been made, but that this does not support the view that the problem is widespread. The police are alert to the risks to juries, particularly in major trials, involving organised crime, and if necessary seek the authority of the trial judge to provide police protection for the jurors in order to prevent any interference.

Sir Dudley Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, when he last met the Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis, he raised with him allegations of the suborning of juries in important trials; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: This subject has not been discussed at my right hon. Friend's meetings with the Commissioner.

Election Counts (Police)

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for reports from the chief constables concerned about whether there were police video cameras present filming the crowds outside the count as results were declared on 12 June in the constituencies of Caernarfon, Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, Ynys Môn and Carmarthen.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The use of surveillance equipment (including video cameras) by the police is governed by guidelines issued by the then Home Secretary, the right hon. and learned Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Brittan), and placed in the Library in December 1984.

The guidelines were issued to ensure, amongst other things, that surveillance devices were used only where strictly necessary and with due regard for the intrusion of privacy that might sometimes result.

It has been the long-standing policy of successive Governments not to confirm or deny whether surveillance measures have been authorised in any particular case, irrespective of whether such measures have been authorised or not. We do not intend to depart from that policy.

Government Data Network

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what conclusions were drawn in the course of preparatory studies undertaken in relation to the proposed Government data network, about the potential cost savings resulting from the transfer of relevant data between (a) his Department and Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, (b) his Department and the Inland Revenue and (c) his Department and the Department of Health and Social Security.

Mr. Hurd: With one exception, no transfers of data are planned between the Home Office and the three other Departments which are expecting to participate in the initial implementation of the Government data network, and no cost savings resulting from the transfer of data between my Department and those departments are foreseen. The exception is the properly authorised transfer of data, through existing networks, to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise, which provides an inquiry-only service on the vehicle keepers index held on the police national computer. A decision whether the police national computer network should be transferred to the Government data network will not be made this year.

Drug Offenders (Malaysia)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about his consideration of the Malaysian Government's methods of dealing with drug offenders, as raised with him in the last Parliament by the hon. Member for Christchurch.

Mr. John Patten: Our consideration of Malaysian methods of dealing with drug offenders, insofar as they are different, does not lead us to propose any changes in our law.

Petty Officer John Black

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis regarding the progress of the investigation into the unlawful killing of Petty Officer John Black in Spain over Christmas 1983.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that the investigation into Petty Officer Black's death requires further inquiries to be undertaken in Spain. The permission of the Spanish authorities has been sought for British police officers to go to Spain to conduct these inquiries and their reply is awaited.

EMPLOYMENT

Bridge Programmes

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has for the future of bridge programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Cope: The funding by the Manpower Services Commission of a distinct bridge programme for unemployed executives and managers was withdrawn from the end of March 1987 as part of a wider redevelopment of resources to provide more help for the long-term unemployed. The commission is, however, continuing to provide similar assistance through other schemes.

Training in job hunting skills, similar to that previously offered by bridge courses, will continue to be available within the commission's job training scheme and jobclubs for those who have been unemployed for at least 26 weeks.

For executives and managers with shorter periods of unemployment, the commission is arranging to provide possibilities for equivalent help through its wider opportunities training programme.

Manpower Services Commission

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals he has to alter the composition of the Manpower Services Commission.

Mr. Fowler: As I announced to the House during the debate on the Loyal Address on Tuesday 30 June 1987, at column 468, I intend to increase employer representation on the commission by creating up to six extra seats.

Wool Textile Industry (Yorkshire)

Mrs. Peacock asked the Secretary of State for Employment what was the number of people employed in the Yorkshire woollen textile industry in each year from 1972 to 1979 inclusive.

Mr. Lee: The available information is as follows and relates to June each year from 1972 to 1978 when censuses of employment were taken. No census was taken in 1979.

Employees in Employment in Yorkshire in the Woollen and Worsted Textile Industry (Minimum List Heading 414 of the 1968 Standard Industrial Classification)

Community Programme

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will detail the proportion, broken down by regions of Great Britain, of those members of the community programme who are successful in obtaining employment on leaving the scheme.

Mr. Lee: There is no up-to-date regional information, but information for Great Britain is available from the latest (4th) survey of former community programme participants undertaken from November 1986:

29 per cent. of respondents obtained a job immediately on leaving the programme.
36 per cent. of respondents were in employment at the time of the survey, an average 11 months later.
59 per cent. of respondents had had at least one job during the 11 month period.

Regional information will be available in due course, and, when completed, a copy of the report of the survey will be placed in the Library.

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline his plans for the community programme.

Mr. Lee: We are planning to improve the community programme in a variety of ways. We intend to make it full-time and to pay participants a premium over and above their social security entitlements. This will make the programme much more attractive to long-term unemployed people with families. We also propose to enhance significantly the training and job search content of the programme.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Terrorism

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support has been received from other Commonwealth countries for the Government's proposals for combating terrorism.

Mr. Mellor: The discussion of terrorism has figured prominently at recent Commonwealth fora. We have actively urged all Commonwealth members to accede to and ratify the various international conventions to combat terrorism. This has drawn wide support amongst Commonwealth members, who have committed themselves to increased co-operation in this field.

Colonies and Dependent Territories

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the remaining British colonies and dependent territories indicating in each case his latest estimate of the annual cost to the Exchequer of administering them.

Mr. Eggar: I shall write to the hon. Member and place copies of my letter in the Library of the House.

International Organisations

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those international organisations, including the European Economic Community of which Britain is a member indicating in each case the latest figure for the annual cost of membership.

Mr. Eggar: A list of international organisations for which the Foreign and Commonwealth Office is responsible and the estimated costs of membership for 1987-88 were published in class II, vote 2, sections A and B, and vote 5, section C, of the Supply Estimates. The estimated cost of membership of the European Communities is to be found in the public expenditure White Paper (Cmnd. 56.II) in part 3.2. The costs of membership of other international organisations for 1987-88 will be found in the appropriate Supply Estimates. Copies of all these documents are available in the Library of the House.

Nizametdin Akhmetov

Mr. Anthony Coombs asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government have made about the fate of Nizametdin Akhmetov, imprisoned since 1966 in Soviet labour camps, and now incarcerated in a psychiatric prison in Kazakhstan.

Mr. Mellor: Nizametdin Akhmetov was released from Chelyabinsk special psychiatric hospital in June of this year.

We had previously raised his case with the Soviet authorities and we welcome his release. We shall continue our efforts on behalf of others unjustly detained in Soviet psychiatric institutions.

Middle East

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to whether, following the meeting of the Palestine National Council in Algeria, there has been any movement by the Palestine Liberation Organisation to meet Her Majesty's Government's publicly stated conditions regarding the unambiguous recognition of Israel and the ending or armed violence prior to any meeting being possible at Cabinet Minister level with representatives of that organisation.

Mr. Eggar: We have regular contacts with the PLO, but a meeting at Cabinet Minister level remains difficult while the PLO's policies remain ambiguous on Israel's right to exist within secure and recognised boundaries and on the use of violence.

We have no information of a recent change in PLO policy on these issues.

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the response by the Palestine Liberation Organisation to the public statement of support given by Her Majesty's Government to the proposal for an international conference on the middle east, following the recent meeting between the Prime Minister and Mr. Shimon Peres.

Mr. Eggar: We regret that the PLO should have misinterpreted the statement issued on 23 June as hostile to the Palestinian people. We remain committed to the search for a peaceful settlement of the Arab/Israel dispute, to ensure justice and security for all the peoples of the area.

Western Sahara

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the achievement of independence for the Western Sahara.

Mr. Mellor: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) on 3 July, at column 190.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Jury Panel Lists

Mr. Evennett asked the Attorney-General to whom jury panel lists are currently made available; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Under section 5(2) of the Juries Act 1974, any party to proceedings involving trial by jury, or his representative, is entitled to reasonable facilities for inspecting the jury panel.

Under section 5(4) of the Act the court may, if it thinks fit, grant facilities for inspecting the panel to any other person at any time. This is intended to provide for the legitimate needs of persons such as research students.

Juries (Interference)

Mr. Evennett asked the Attorney-General whether the Lord Chancellor intends to conduct any inquiries regarding interference with juries.

The Attorney-General: Interference with juries is a criminal matter of great gravity, and its investigation must be a matter for the police. But there is no evidence to suggest that it is widespread.

Land Registry (Nottingham)

Mr. Alexander asked the Attorney-General what delays are being experienced by applicants at HM land registry, Nottingham district, for first registration of their property titles; what is the reason for these delays; what arrangements he is making to overcome these delays; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The average completion time at Nottingham district land registry for applications for first registration, where they are correctly lodged and no requisitions arise, is 170 working days. The delays are due to the exceptional increase over the last 12 months in the number of applications received. Measures being taken to reduce delays include the working of overtime, the recruitment of new staff, the opening of new offices and improvements in practice and procedures.

Crown Prosecution Service

Mr. Latham asked the Attorney-General what are the instructions given by the Director of Public Prosecutions to the Crown Prosecution Service in Leicestershire regarding bringing young persons under the age of 18 years before the courts who are alleged to have been involved in theft or malicious damage; and whether local prosecutors retain the discretion to insist upon a prosecution.

The Attorney-General: Paragraphs 15 to 18 of the "Code for Crown Prosecutors", a copy of which has been placed in the House of Commons Library, set out the guidelines for dealing with juvenile offenders. No specific guidelines have been issued in respect of juveniles accused of offences of theft or malicious damage. Local Crown prosecutors have a discretion in all cases, including cases involving juveniles, either to discontinue or continue prosecutions which have been initiated by the police, or to institute proceedings where the papers have been submitted to the Crown Prosecution Service by the police for advice.

This policy is followed by all chief Crown prosecutors in England and Wales, including the chief Crown prosecutor for the Crown Prosecution Service area of Leicestershire and Northamptonshire.

Mr. Latham asked the Attorney-General in what proportion of cases coming before magistrates' courts in Leicestershire the case for the Crown is put by a full-time employee of the Crown Prosecution Service; and what is the approximate equivalent proportion for the use of a solicitor in private practice retained by the service for that case.

The Attorney-General: Since 1 June 1987 full-time Crown Prosecution Service lawyers have appeared to prosecute in 11 per cent. of the courts in the Leicestershire area. The remaining 89 per cent. of courts have been covered by solicitors in private practice employed as agents. The relative proportion of cases within these figures cannot be ascertained incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Latham asked the Attorney-General what is the total number of persons employed by the Crown Prosecution Service in Leicestershire; how many of them are qualified solicitors; and what is the estimated cost to public funds of the service in Leicestershire during the current financial year.

The Attorney-General: Seventy three persons are employed by the Crown Prosecution Service in the Leicestershire and Northamptonshire area. Of these, 42 are employed in Leicestershire. The number of qualified solicitors for the whole area is 18 and for Leicestershire is eight. The budget for the current financial year for the whole area is £2,571,321. Of this £1,240,604 represents salaries, of which approximately 60 per cent. is paid to staff working in Leicestershire.

PRIME MINISTER

Middle East

Mr. Latham asked the Prime Minister whether in her recent meeting with Mr. Shimon Peres, she raised with him the consequences for the middle east peace process of the continuing level of armed violence initiated by members of the Palestine Liberation Organisation.

The Prime Minister: No. My talks with Mr. Peres were concerned with how to keep up the momentum towards peace. The Government have repeatedly called on all concerned to refrain from acts of violence which can only obstruct progress towards a peaceful settlement.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Department has a relatively small purchasing budget and the scope for helping small businesses is limited. In 1986-87 we purchased from small firms goods to a total of £955,000, mainly in the information technology field. Information is not available for earlier years. The Department will continue to use small firms when it is appropriate to do so. The introduction of performance indicators is under consideration.

Staffordshire (Reorganisation)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has yet received a reply from the chief education officer of the Staffordshire county council to his Department's letter regarding the Staffordshire local education authority's proposals to reorganise educational provision in the Stafford area generally, and at Broadacres school at Hixon in the Mid-Staffordshire parliamentary constituency particularly.

Mr. Dunn: A reply has been received and is at present under consideration.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Salaries

Sir Barney Hayhoe asked the Lord Privy Seal if he will set out in tabular form the sum recommended by the relevant review body for the salary of a Member of Parliament in October 1964, January 1972, June 1975, June 1979 and June 1983, respectively, together with (a) the amount and (b) the percentage by which the value of the salary currently payable falls short in real terms of each of those previously recommended sums.

Mr. Wakeham: The information requested is as follows:

	Sum recommended by TSRB	Sum recommended by TSRB in June 1987 prices[1]	Current Salary	Shortfall between current and recommended salary	Shortfall between current and recommended salary

WALES

Water Supplies

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has as to how many communities in Wales are supplied by private water undertakings, as to what size of communities these supply and as to how many of these undertakings are registered as charities.

Mr. Grist: Two statutory water companies in Wales, the Wrexham and East Denbighshire water company and the Chester water company supply water to 148,000 and 112,500 persons in their areas respectively. Information in respect of the number of other communities in Wales supplied by a private water undertaking or the size of those communities is not held centrally but is available from individual local authorities in Wales, who have a duty under section 11(2) of the Water Act 1973 to ascertain the sufficiency and wholesomeness of water supplies within their area. The question of the number of such undertakings registered as charities should be addressed to the Charity Commission.

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales what guidance Her Majesty's Government give to water authorities regarding the criteria to be used in determining the eligibility of rural communities in Wales (a) to receive water supplies and (b) to obtain an expansion in their supply; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Grist: The Welsh water authority has a general duty under the Water Act 1973 to supply water within its area. Grants are available to the authority under the Rural Water Supplies and Sewerage Acts 1944 to 1971 for the provision of services to rural localities not previously served, or for the strengthening of services for the benefit of existing commitments, or for the improvement of a source which has an unacceptable quality or unreliable yield.

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will provide assistance to the Cwmdu water undertaking, Powys, in its current programme of essential renewal works to meet EEC requirements on drinking water supply; and what is his policy towards assisting for the purpose other similar water undertakings which charitable status.

Mr. Grist: There are no funds available from my Department to assist the owner of any private water undertaking requiring remedial works to meet the standards of the EC drinking water directive. It is, of course, open to any owner of property served by a private water supply to apply to the relevant water authority for a mains water supply. A mains supply to a number of properties in rural area might qualify for grant and under the Rural Water Supplies and Sewerage Acts 1944 to 1971.

Caridgan Bypass

Mr. Geraint Howells asked the Secretary of State for Wales what are the latest developments regarding the construction of the Cardigan bypass; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: A public local inquiry into objections to draft line, side roads, and compulsory purchase orders was held on 7 and 8 July 1987. The inspector's report is now awaited. Subject to the satisfactory completion of statutory procedures and engineering design and to the availability of resources the scheme is expected to start in the period January 1988 to December 1990.

Water Pollution

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Wales what were the number of incidents of water pollution recorded in Wales for each of the past five years in which there was loss of fish life; in how many of these cases there was a successful prosecution; and on how many an unsuccessful prosecution; what was the average level of the penalties imposed; what were the maximum penalties imposed; in how many cases compensation was awarded for the specific purpose of replacing fish stocks; and what were the average and the maximum of the amounts so awarded.

Mr. Grist: Information on fish kill incidents in the area covered by the Welsh water authority is contained in the "Environmental Digest for Wales", published by the Government Statistical Service, a copy of the table from the latest edition (No. 2 1985) is reproduced in the following table. Information on prosecutions is not held by this Department but I have asked the chairman of Welsh water to write and let the hon. Gentleman have such information that is available.

ENERGY

Electricity Supply Industry

Mr. Michael Brown asked the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make a further statement on his plans to introduce legislation to privatise the electricity supply industry.

Mr. Parkinson: A provision designed to pave the way for privatisation of the electricity supply industry is being included in a public utilities Bill. This provision will clarify the powers of the industry to ensure that it has adequate statutory backing to prepare for privatisation. Our main legislation on electricity privatisation will follow later.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Net Book Agreement

Mr. Butler asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when the Director General of Fair Trading last reviewed the question of the net book agreement; and what plans he has to do so again.

Mr. Maude: The Restrictive Practices Court considered the net book agreement in 1962 and found that it was not contrary to the public interest. Under the legislation, the Director General of Fair Trading may obtain leave to apply to the court to review its judgment only if there is prima facie evidence of a material change in the relevant circumstances. He must therefore consider in particular whether there has been sufficient change in respect of those matters on which the court relied in reaching its judgment. The Director General keeps such matters under regular review but considers that at present there are insufficient grounds for an application to the court to review its judgment.

Fertiliser Products

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will estimate the balance of trade figures in volume and value terms in fertiliser products between the United Kingdom, the European Economic Community as a whole and Saudi Arabia.

Mr. Alan Clark: The information is in the following table:

Trade with Saudi Arabia in fertiliser products[1]

	United Kingdom			European Community[2]

Urea

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been Her Majesty's Government's involvement in the policy decision of the European Community to impose additional import duties on urea products from Saudi Arabia; and what are the reasons for this policy.

Mr. Alan Clark: Provisional anti-dumping duties were imposed on imports of urea from a number of countries, including Saudi Arabia, after a preliminary investigation by the European Commission indicated that dumping of urea was causing injury to the Community fertiliser industry. All EC members were consulted before the provisional duty was imposed and Her Majesty's Government were satisfied on the evidence available that the measures were necessary.

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will estimate the total quantity of urea used in Britain's fertiliser production; and what percentage of this comes from the United Kingdom, other European Economic Community countries, and Saudi Arabian sources.

Mr. Atkins: I regret that I am not able to do so. Some of the information requested cannot be given without prejudicing company confidentiality. Furthermore, whilst the majority of urea is sold as straight nitrogen fertilizer, my Department has no information on the quantity used in the production of compound fertilizer. Nor is data available segregating urea for fertilizer use from urea used for industrial purposes. Recent total imports into the United Kingdom from other member states of the EEC and from Saudi Arabia are:

Inventor Protection

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assessment he has made as to the adequacy of investor protection for the purchasers of financial services in the period prior to the introduction of the compensation fund.

Mr. Maude: The Financial Services Act was introduced and passed because the previous arrangements did not offer an adequate level of protection to investors. It is not therefore possible to be satisfied with the protection afforded to investors until the whole of the regulatory structure established by the Act, including the proposed compensation arrangements, has been brought into operation.

Intermediaries (Professional Indemnity)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will have further discussions with the Securities and Investments Board regarding the desirability of all intermediaries authorised under the Financial Services Act 1986 holding professional indemnity cover; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude: The regulation of persons authorised under the Financial Services Act is a matter for the board. The board's draft rules, which were before the House when it approved the delegation order transferring the relevant powers to the board, made clear the board's preference for a widely drawn compensation scheme rather than a requirement to hold professional indemnity. However, I know that the Board shares my view that there will continue to be substantial advantages to firms in taking out professional indemnity cover.

EC (Scientific Collaboration)

Mr. Strang asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster why Her Majesty's Government have refused to approve the budget allocation for the framework programme for scientific collaboration in Europe; what research into AIDS has been delayed because of this refusal; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have always made clear our commitment to the concept of a framework programme for European Community research and indeed have been willing to see increases in funding in those areas aimed at improving Europe's industrial competitiveness. However, we have been concerned by the scale and scope of the proposals and have worked throughout the negotiations to secure a more effectively targeted and high quality programme. In her statement to the House on 1 July reporting on the European Council on 29 and 30 June my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear our agreement to the content of the framework programme and to spending continuing at present levels. We hope therefore that work can proceed quickly on this basis.

A programme of AIDS research, a significant part of which comprises the co-ordination of national research activity in member states, forms part of the medical and health programme within the framework. Work to prepare this AIDS programme is at an advanced stage and we have indicated our willingness to agree to the commencement of the AIDS programme as soon as the way is clear. The Government's commitment to a programme of AIDS research in this country has been clearly demonstrated and will continue alongside the support we are giving to the EC programme.

"Spycatcher" (Import Licence)

Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether the Government intend to issue an amendment to the general import licence so as to render the importation of the book "Spycatcher" by Peter Wright subject to licensing.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Import of Goods (Control) Order 1954 provides powers to require goods to be subject to import licensing. I have no plans to amend the licensing requirements to cover this book.

Post Office (New Services)

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if, pursuant to his answer of 8 July, Official Report, column 337, he will outline the proposed new services to be carried out by the Post Office.

Mr. Butcher: We are still considering with the Post Office the range of services that counters might undertake with wider powers and I am not yet able to announce our conclusions.

Textile Quota (Taiwan)

Mr. Curry asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the adoption of a European Community regulation on the textile quota regime for Taiwan.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Council of Ministers adopted on 21 May a regulation amending textile import quotas for Taiwan. Quota levels for Taiwan had previously been reduced by 20 per cent. pending proof that Taiwan was not discriminating against the Community in its treatment of certain imports. Taiwan subsequently provided satisfactory evidence in this respect and the regulation reinstated the quota levels to 100 per cent. Withholding the United Kingdom's formal agreement would have given rise to uncertainty for the United Kingdom industry. I therefore judged that it was in the United Kingdom's interest not to delay adoption of the regulation until the House had completed its consideration of the Commission's proposal. I regret that the normal procedures were not followed on this occasion, but I hope the House will understand the special reasons why the Government agreed to the adoption of the regulation in these circumstances.

Yarns

Mr. Curry asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the adoption of a European Community Directive setting a mandatory range of sizes for knitting and rug yarns.

Mr. Maude: The Council of Ministers adopted on 25 June a directive setting a mandatory range of sizes for knitting and rug yarns. This is a harmonisation measure which sets a simple range of sizes in which such yarns must be packed throughout the Community. The sizes which have been agreed are those which were suggested by the relevant EC trade association. They have the full support of United Kingdom manufactureres who have been pressing for the measure to be adopted at the earliest opportunity. It will also benefit consumers by allowing them to make easier value-for-money comparisons between sizes. The outcome of negotiations might have been called into question had the United Kingdom delayed adoption beyond 1 July, the date on which the Single European Act came into force. In these circumstances and given the wish of all other member states to see the measure adopted as soon as possible. I judged that it was not in the United Kingdom's interest to continue to withhold agreement until the House had completed its consideration of the Commission's proposal. Although I regret that normal procedures were not completed on this occasion, I hope the House will understand the reasons why the Government agreed to the adoption of the directive.

Credit and Suretyship Insurance

Mr. Curry asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the adoption of European Community directives on credit and suretyship insurance, and on legal expenses insurance.

Mr. Maude: The Council of Ministers adopted on 22 June two directives on credit and suretyship insurance, and legal expenses insurance. These directives bring to an end a temporary dispensation which had enabled Germany to require that credit, suretyship and legal expenses insurance may be performed only by undertakings specialising in the relevant class of insurance. They also provide for further harmonisation of the conduct of credit insurance and legal expenses insurance. In both cases the United Kingdom had obtained significant improvements during negotiations to meet our own concerns. Among these improvements were the exclusion of state export credit insurers from the scope of the directive on credit insurance and in the directive on legal expenses insurance we secured provision enabling the motoring associations to be exempted from certain of the directive's requirements. These and other improvements might have been called into question had the United Kingdom delayed adoption beyond 1 July, the date on which the Single European Act came into force. I therefore judged that it was in the United Kingdom's interest not to delay adoption of the two measures until the House had completed its consideration of the Commission's proposals. I regret that the normal procedures were not followed on this occasion, but I hope the House will understand the special reasons why the Government agreed to the adoption of the two directives in these circumstances.

Assembled Products

Mr. Curry asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the adoption of a European Community Regulation on the dumping of assembled products.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Foreign Affairs Council adopted on 22 June a regulation designed to prevent the circumvention of anti-dumping duties by assembly operations within the Community with little or no added value. It would do so by extending these duties to a product assembled in the Community where assembly or production has been started or substantially increased after the opening of the anti-dumping investigation; where assembly or production is carried out by a company which is related to a manufacturer whose exports of the like product are subject to anti-dumping duty; and where the value of the parts used in the assembly operation and originating in the country of exportation exceeds the value of all other parts by at least 50 per cent. (that is, by a ratio of 40:60). The United Kingdom welcomed the Commission's original proposal and had pressed for a Community decision as soon as possible in order to close a loophole in the Community's existing controls and prevent continuing uncertainty which would have been unfair on genuine overseas investors. It would therefore have been undesirable to delay its adoption. I regret that the normal procedures were not followed on this occasion, but I hope the House will understand the special reasons why the Government agreed to the adoption of the regulation in these circumstances.

Consumer Products (Imitations)

Mr. Curry asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the adoption of a European Community Directive on dangerous imitations of consumer products.

Mr. Maude: The Council of Ministers adopted on 25 June a directive prohibiting the sale of products which are made or packaged to resemble other products and may as a result mislead and injure consumers, especially children. Examples are scented lamp oil and scented erasers. The United Kingdom had obtained substantial improvements during negotiations to meet our own concerns; we limited the scope of the directive to products resembling food or drink where there was a risk, and we blocked a proposal to give the Commission greater powers to require member states to ban particular products. These improvements might have been called into question had the United Kingdom delayed adoption beyond 1 July, the date on which the Single European Act came into force. I therefore judged that it was in the United Kingdom's interest not to delay adoption of the measure until the House had completed its consideration of the Commission's proposal. I regret that the normal procedures were not followed on this occasion, but I hope the House will understand the special reasons why the Government agreed to the adoption of the directive in these circumstances.

Mr. Ivor Williams

Mr. Chapman asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster when Mr. Ivor Williams, a constituent of the hon. Member for Chipping Barnet, will receive a substantive reply to his letter dated 12 January to the Office of Fair Trading regarding his complaint about the conduct of his estate agent; why the reply has not yet been given; and why the Office of Fair Trading has not yet acted on the complaint.

Mr. Maude [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1987]: The Director General of Fair Trading has responsibility for the day-to-day activities of his office. I have therefore asked him to write to the hon. Member directly.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many civil servants are employed in his Department; and what is its budgeted expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Stanley: On 1 April 1987 there were 26,489 civil servants employed in the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments. This figure includes those in administrative grades, and also scientific officers and professional and technical officers. It excludes prisons service grades, civilian search unit staff and a small number of casual staff. Total planned public expenditure for the Northern Ireland Office and the Northern Ireland Departments for the current year is £4,877 million (the "Government's Expenditure Plans 1987-88 to 1989-90", Vol. II, table 3.18 p.291).

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons under 21 years of age were unemployed in Northern Ireland at the latest date; and how this compares with 1967, 1977 and 1982.

Mr. Viggers: At 14 May 1987, the latest date for which figures are available, there were a total of 22,106 unemployed claimants under 21 years of age in Northern Ireland. Figures on the number of unemployed claimants in this age group are not available for earlier years.

Fishing Fleets

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many and what amounts of grants have been made to fishing fleets in the South Down ports of Ardglass and Kilkeel in each of the last three years.

Mr. Viggers: Fishermen can obtain assistance to construct and modernise fishing vessels from both United Kingdom and EC funds. Information on United Kingdom grant-aid in respect of individual ports could only be obtained at disproportionate cost but the figures for Northern Ireland as a whole are as follows:

Northern Ireland

Year ending	Number of projects	Total grant paid (£)
31 March 1985	82	157,000
31 March 1986	148	559,000
31 March 1987	118	604,000

Grant-aid from the European Community has been:

	Kilkeel		Ardglass
Year ending	Number of projects	Total grant paid (£)	Number of projects	Total grant paid (£)
31 March 1985	2	44,456	Nil
31 March 1986	4	100,039	3	64,956
31 March 1987	9	277,319	1	31,389

Teachers

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many teachers are presently unemployed; and how this compares with 1967 and 1977.

Mr. Viggers: At 14 May 1987 the number of unemployed claimants in Northern Ireland whose normal occupation was given as teacher was 1,495. The corresponding figure for unemployed registrants at 9 June 1977 was 451. Information for 1967 is not available.

Action for Community Employment

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the current sponsors of action for community employment schemes in Northern Ireland, indicating the number of action for community employment places and tasks undertaken in each case.

Mr. Viggers: Information in the form requested could be compiled only at disproportionate cost. There are currently some 500 sponsors providing over 6,000 jobs throughout Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will indicate the amounts of money allocated to the action for community employment programme in Northern Ireland, outlining the means by which the use of such money is monitored and evaluated.

Mr. Viggers: £106·31 million has been made available since the scheme was introduced in 1981. All applications from potential ACE sponsors are carefully scrutinised to ensure that they satisfy the aims and objectives of the scheme and regular on site inspections of projects are carried out. Expenditure on the ACE programme is evaluated through surveys and through monitoring against annual cost per job target.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will detail the Government's plans for the action for community employment programme in Northern Ireland indicating the type of work, scheme or area which will have priority.

Mr. Viggers: The overall objective is to sustain an average of at least 6,200 jobs in the current financial year. Priority is given to projects which are likely to promote the creation or development of longer term jobs and to those which provide services for disadvantaged groups and jobs for the unskilled. Priority is also given to projects in areas where ACE provision is relatively low in relation to the local incidence of long-term unemployment.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement indicating what role he envisages for the action for community employment programme in relation to the care in the community policies promoted in Northern Ireland's strategic plans for health and social services.

Mr. Viggers: The Department of Health and Social Services "Regional Planning Guidelines 1987-1992" put forward a strategy for the development of community care which is long-standing and will proceed independently of the ACE programme. It is, however, estimated that about one third of ACE places are currently engaged in "community care" activities.

Mr. Hume asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the Department of Economic Development maintains a list or other records of current action for community employment.

Mr. Viggers: Yes, manual records are kept in respect of each ACE sponsor and it is hoped to computerise these in the very near future.

Equal Opportunities

Dr. Twinn asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action he proposes to take to follow up the publication of the consultative paper, "Equality of Opportunity in Employment in Northern Ireland."

Mr. Tom King: There has been a general welcome and a substantial number of responses to our consultative paper. Further consultation is proceeding and we expect to receive shortly a report on the outcome of the current review of anti-discrimination legislation being undertaken by the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights. In the light of these I wish to proceed as quickly as possible to make a number of changes.

A major issue raised in the consultative paper was whether change should concentrate on the single dimension of religion, or also encompass sex and disability. In the light of the comments received, I have decided to concentrate legislative and other action on the vital religious issue. The promotion of equality of opportunity in relation to sex and disability will continue to be addressed in the same way as in the rest of the United Kingdom.

Work has now started on the preparation of new measures. It will proceed in parallel with further consultations, and considerations of the Standing Advisory Commission's report. Detailed proposals will be brought forward as soon as possible.

Pending new legislation, action is now being taken, in respect of the religious dimension, to strengthen the promotion of equality of opportunity in employment. A new guide to effective practice will be published in September. It will make clear our commitment to ensuring that recruitment, selection and promotion take place solely on the basis of merit; and to the active promotion of employment equality through "affirmative action" where necessary. We shall also be introducing a support scheme to assist employers to improve the practice of employment equality in the private sector. Educational initiatives, in both the public and private sectors, will be carried forward over the next few months by the Departments of Finance and Personnel, and Economic Development. In advance of the wider changes to its role which we envisage, the Fair Employment Agency will be provided with additional resources, and we shall discuss with the agency how they can best be deployed.

The Government are totally committed to equality of employment opportunity for both communities in Northern Ireland. These actions demonstrate the further progress we will be making to fulfil that commitment.

Royal Ulster Constabulary

Mr. Lawrence asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the present position on the investigations by Mr. Colin Sampson into allegations concerning the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Mr. Tom King: As I have already informed the House, I wish to make a statement as soon as I can about those aspects of the investigations which fall within my area of responsibility. I regret that I am not yet able to do so. In the meantime, however, I can inform the House that in response to one particular recommendation made by Mr. Sampson it has been agreed that certain matters of organisation and procedure should be more fully examined by way of a special inspection by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. With the agreement of the Chief Constable, Her Majesty's chief inspector is arranging for a special inspection to be undertaken by one of Her Majesty's inspectors forthwith. I shall of course, take account of its findings when I make my statement to the House.

Rev. Martin Smyth asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish the list of sponsors of action for community employment Schemes which was made available to ACE sponsors in 1986 for the elections to the Northern Ireland Federation of ACE Sponsors.

Mr. Viggers [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: The list of ACE sponsors as given to the Northern Ireland Federation of ACE Sponsors, in October 1986, was confined to those employing more than 10 ACE workers and is as follows:

Antrim Borough ACE Scheme
Ardoyne Industrial Development Ltd.
Carrickfergus Youth Services Ltd.

TRANSPORT

Staveley Bypass

Mr. Jopling asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the dates for the start and the completion of the Staveley bypass on the Kendal-Windermere road.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The A591 Staveley bypass is a local road proposal for which Cumbria county council is responsible. I understand that construction work is to start in the autumn and will take two years. The Government are supporting the scheme by transport supplementary grant.

Commercial Vehicles (Noise)

Mr. Waller asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information is available to him about highway authorities which have made local traffic orders requiring commercial vehicles to meet noise requirements other than those prescribed in the Road Vehicles (Construction and Use) Regulations 1986.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I know of no such local traffic orders. The London night time and weekend lorry ban mentions efforts to reduce noise emissions as one of the factors which may be taken into account in issuing exemption permits.

Aircraft Noise

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will specify for which aircraft types 95 perceived noise decibels footprint diagrams will be included in his future consultation document on night restrictions.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: This matter is still under consideration.

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what change there has been in the aircraft noise contours around Gatwick airport between 1984 and 1985; and what action he intends to take as a consequence.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The area within the 35 noise and number index contour which is generally taken to indicate the onset of disturbance was 225 sq km in 1984, 299 sq km in 1985 and 288 sq km in 1986. We continue to pursue the policies in relation to aircraft noise described in the airports policy White Paper of June 1985. The ban on non noise-certificated subsonic jets will apply to foreign registered aeroplanes from 1 January 1988. We shall continue to press, in international negotiations, for the eventual phasing out of chapter 2 aircraft, such as the BAC1-11, which is one of the noisier aircraft using Gatwick.

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will initiate an update of aircraft noise infringement limits.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: BAA plc is considering, together with the Civil Aviation Authority and officials of the Department, the introduction of an integrated noise and track-keeping monitoring system for Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted. When we know the capability of the equipment we shall consider the criteria against which it should be operated, including revised noise limits.

Chelmsford Bypass (Noise)

Mr. Burns asked the Secretary of State for Transport if the testing of noise levels on and around the A12 bypass at Chelmsford has been completed; and when the results will be made public.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The noise measurements have been completed. The report is being prepared. I shall write to my hon. Friend as soon as I have studied it.

Passenger Vehicles

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to prescribe procedures for conducting appeals against refusals to remove prohibitions from larger passenger vehicles.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have today laid regulations before Parliament to prescribe procedures for these appeals, which were provided for in section 31 of the Transport Act 1985. These regulations also rationalise existing subordinate legislation on:—

(i) appeals against refusals to remove prohibitions from goods vehicles;
(ii) appeals against refusals to issue certificates of initial fitness and public service vehicles certificates of conformity; and
(iii) circumstances in which vehicles may be driven in contravention of a prohibition without committing an offence.

The new regulations prescribe time limits of 14 days for appeals against refusals to remove prohibitions, and 28 days for appeals against refusals to issue certificates of initial fitness and public service vehicle certificates of conformity. The regulations require all appeals to be lodged at the Department's Goods Vehicle Centre Public Service Vehicle Centre, Swansea.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Government Data Network

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what stage has been reached in the consideration of responses to the issued service requirement for the proposed Government data network; and when the final decision for the award of any contract can be expected.

Mr. Brooke: Following the evaluation of suppliers' responses, a short list was announced on 25 March 1987. Further discussions and demonstrations are in progress. It is hoped to complete the tendering stage and award a contract by the end of 1987.

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made as to how far the type of network envisaged by the Central Computer and Telecommunication Agency's Government data network service requirement could potentially be used to eliminate the duplication of data processing, either by allowing the controlled transfer of data between Departments or by facilitating shared access to suitable data; and whether the Government data network will eventually be used in such a way as to realise its potential in this respect.

Mr. Brooke: The proposed Government data network service is being created primarily to facilitate the transmission of data between sites within Departments. Initially, four Departments are expected to take advantage of the service. Economies of scale are expected because the Government data network will obviate duplication of communication facilities which would arise if each of the departments installed and managed separate networks.

Where interdepartmental exchanges or access to data are planned the use of the GDN will not alter the requirement for the originating Department owning the data to authorise such a transfer.

Development (Tax Incentives)

Mr. Adley asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will establish a system for provision of tax incentives to developers in blighted inner-city areas, combined with tax disincentives for development in designated areas of prosperity suffering from over-development.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I have noted my hon. Friend's suggestion.

Coinage

Mr. Wheeler asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on future changes in the United Kingdom coinage.

Mr. Lawson: In May, at the ceremony of the Trial of the Pyx, I announced that the Royal Mint would be issuing a pamphlet describing some options for future changes in the coinage, including smaller versions of the 10p and 5p coins. The aim is to meet public dissatisfaction with the overall weight of the present coinage. The pamphlet is being published today, Wednesday 15 July.

I hope that everyone — not just industry and commerce, but the general public and groups with a special interest such as the blind — will let us have their views.

And I can give this assurance: we will not take any decisions about what changes should be made to the coinage — or indeed whether any changes should be made at all — until we have had the opportunity to consider thoroughly all the views and comments we receive.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give details of the consultation process in relation to the proposed changes in the coinage; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke [pursuant to my hon. Friend's reply, 13 July 1987]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend gave the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Mr. Wheeler) earlier today.

DEFENCE

Coach House, Giffen

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will describe the circumstances under which the Ministry of Defence raised objections to the establishment of licensed premises at the Coach house, Giffen, by Dalry; and to what purpose.

Mr. Freeman: The Ministry of Defence invoked its statutory right and objected to the conversion of stables into a public house at the Coach house, Giffen by Dalry. The development lay within the safeguarded zone surrounding the royal naval armament depot, Beith and my Ministry was not prepared to accept an increase in the number of persons potentially at risk, in the albeit unlikely event of an accidental explosion at the depot.

Tornado Aircraft, Stretton

Mr. Latham asked the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether he will outline the action which has been taken to check the detailed lists of incidents which have been supplied by two residents of Walnut close, Stretton, either directly or through the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton, showing substantial numbers of cases where Tornado aircraft fly directly over their houses rather than in accordance with the approved flight path;

(2) whether he will make a statement on the level of complaints (a) to RAF Cottesmore and (b) to his Department, from residents of Walnut close Stretton, Leicestershire, about Tornado aircraft flying directly over the houses, contrary to the approved flight path; and what action is being taken to prevent this nuisance.

Mr. Freeman: Residents of Walnut close, Stretton, Leicestershire, have since August 1985 submitted 78 complaints to RAF Cottesmore and five to the Ministry of Defence.

RAF Cottesmore has checked the lists of alleged overflying of Walnut close and while it can confirm that the figures more or less reflect the number of aircraft in the air at the time, it is not possible in retrospect to establish whether or not their flight paths took them over Walnut close.

It remains the policy to the station to fly the circuit agreed with my hon. Friend and local residents, (as acknowledged in my letter of 23 April). However, even experienced aircrews' are unable to hold the course exactly because of the wind factor. Action taken to prevent the nuisance caused includes ending night circuit flying, modifying landing procedures to reduce reverse thrust noise, and modifying the circuit pattern for runway 23 to avoid specifically overflying Stretton.

Morocco

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether he has any plans to supply to Morocco military equipment which could be used against the population of the Western Sahara.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have nothing to add to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on 14 July.

Foreign Nationals (Military Training)

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will now answer questions about the details of military training given to foreign nationals in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: No. Details of the military training provided for foreign nationals at Ministry of Defence establishments in the United Kingdom are confidential between Her Majesty's Government and the Government concerned.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Civil Servants

Mr. Batiste asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many civil servants are employed by his Department in (a) London and the south-east, (b) the south-west, (c) the midlands and (d) the north of England; and what is the budgeted expenditure of his Department for the current year in each of these regions.

Mr. Donald Thompson: The number of staff employed in London and the Department's five regions on 1 April 1987 was as follows:

	Number
London and South-East Region	4,658
Midlands and Western Region	1,329
South Western Region	1,083
Eastern Region	1,724
Northern Region	1,066

There were also 622 staff in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland, and 512 temporary employees.

On budgeted expenditure, some 60 per cent. of the Department's running costs are decentralised, partly to the regional organisation and partly to line management commands on a national or HQ basis. Details are published in the Supply Estimates 1987-88 for class IV, vote 5. A breakdown of costs as requested could be achieved only at disproportionate cost.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. David Martin asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the procedures and practice governing the export of live animals; and what steps are taken to ensure that these requirements are properly observed in Portsmouth.

Mr. Donald Thompson: In Great Britain the export of live food animals is regulated by the Export of Animals (Protection) Order 1981 which prohibits such exports except in accordance with a licence. The animals must be rested for 10 hours immediately before export at an approved lairage near the port of departure. At the lairage the animals must be offered food and water and be inspected for fitness to travel before their loading for international transport is officially supervised. These controls are applied stringently, at Portsmouth and elsewhere, by the state veterinary service and by local authorities.

Morocco (Fisheries)

Mr. Beith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards the proposal that the European Economic Community fisheries agreement with Morocco should extend only to the area of sea which is internationally recognised as Moroccan waters.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Livsey asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if, in view of the effects of delay on United Kingdom dairy farmers, he will immediately allow the Milk Marketing Board to organise milk quota leasing in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1987]: As my right hon. Friend has already reported to the House on 1 July at column 511, it was agreed as part of this year's price-fixing settlement that measures would be implemented to permit the continuation of quota leasing. Although the Council agreed in principle to this measure, the absence of the European Parliament opinion, which is required on the proposal, means that formal adoption of a regulation will be delayed until after the summer holidays. My officials are already discussing detailed arrangements with the Milk Marketing Board that can be put into operation as soon as the necessary regulation is formally adopted.

SCOTLAND

Psychiatric Hospitals

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state capital spending plans for Scottish psychiatric hospitals for the next year.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Each health board determines its capital expenditure priorities within the block capital allocation made annually by my right hon. and learned Friend. Full details are not held centrally and at this stage in the year it is not possible to say which individual project each board will decide to take forward, but the following major projects for psychiatric hospitals are currently at detailed planning stages or under construction:

Project	Total Cost	Current Year Estimated Expenditure
	£ million	£ million
1. Royal Cornhill, Aberdeen	8·2	0·2
2. Parkhead, Glasgow	4·6	2·3
3. Ailsa Hospital, Ayr	1·3	0·8
4. Hairmyres, East Kilbride	3·1	0·1

In addition the West Lothian district general hospital, phase II, includes provision for psychiatric patients. Other smaller projects are being undertaken by boards.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of people admitted to Scottish psychiatric hospitals for each of the years 1980 to 1986.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The total number of admissions (including re-admissions) is as follows:

Scottish psychiatric hospitals[1] Admissions

	Admissions
1980	27,896
1981	28,510
1982	[2]25,571

	Admissions
1983	28,387
1984	29,167
1985	29,947

[1] Mental illness and mental handicap
[2] Influence of industrial action in Health Service
Information for 1986 is not yet available

The above figures reflect a reduction in lengths of stay in hospital and an increase in readmissions, both of which are matters of clinical judgment. The number of residents in psychiatric hospitals has been falling in recent years.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of Scottish hospitals which meet the suggested target of 40 trained psychiatric nurses for every 100 psychiatric patients.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The target of 40 trained psychiatric nurses for every 100 psychiatric patients is not one which has been recommended by the Scottish Home and Health Department and its source has not been verified. The number of mental illness hospitals, mental handicap hospitals and those with units for the mentally ill and handicapped which have 40 or more trainee nurses (whole-time equivalents) for every 100 weighted[1] patients at 31 March 1986, the latest figures available, are shown in the table.

Trained nurses include both registered mental illness and mental handicap nurses and enrolled nurses. Information on registered nurses alone cannot be provided except at disproportionate cost.

	Psycho-geriatric	Mental illness	Mental handicap
Mental hospitals
Number	19	26	17
Number with 40 or more nurses per 100 weighted[1] patients	2	3	1
Other hospitals with mental units
Number	16	13	4
Number with 40 or more nurses per 100 weighted[1] patients	7	13	1

Note: Hospitals with patients falling into more than one of the three categories of mental illness shown will be counted separately in each line as appropriate.

[1] Weighted to take account of in-patients, out-patients, day patients and day cases.

Central Institutions (Staff Morale)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state his policy towards the problem of the low morale among staff in Scottish central institutions; and if he will outline his plans to increase morale.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Staff morale is a matter for the boards of governors and for the management of the institutions. We warmly welcome the positive way in which the central institutions are responding to the Government's policies of improving access to higher education and seeking better value for money.

Occupational Therapists

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the number of qualified occupational therapists in Scotland specialising in long-stay or psychogeriatric care.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The number of qualified occupational therapists based in long-stay hospitals at 30 September 1986, the latest figure available, was 184.4 (whole-time equivalents). This figure does not include staff employed in long-stay units of general hospitals as information collected centrally does not separately identify these staff.

Leukaemia

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what studies are currently in progress to investigate unexplained clusters of cases of leukaemia in the east of Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on 13 July at col. 247.

Earnings

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will estimate the number of workers in Scotland who earn less than £3 per hour and the percentage which they constitute of the total Scottish work force.

Mr. Lang: The table gives information about the distribution of average gross hourly earnings for some groups of workers. The figures are from the April 1986 New Earnings Survey, which is conducted by the Department of Employment and covers a 1 per cent. sample of employees who are members of PAYE schemes. The results of the April 1987 survey should be available at the end of the year.

Adult employees in Scotland whose earnings were not affected by absence

April 1986	Percentage with average gross earnings less than £3.00 per hour
Full-time
males	18.3
females	46.6
employees	28.2
Part-time
males	not available
females	77.3
employees	not available

The figures are subject to sampling errors, and cannot be assumed to apply to the whole working population because they do not cover, for example, the self-employed, members of the armed forces, private domestic servants, those who are not on adult rates, and those who are not members of PAYE schemes.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing average weekly earnings for men and women in Scotland and in each of the Scottish regions for each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: Estimates of average gross weekly earnings for Scotland as a whole, and for the larger Scottish regions, are published each year in the tables of the New Earnings Survey, part E, which are available in the Library of the House. The results of the April 1987 survey should be available at the end of the year.

Prison Population

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state the total prison population in Scotland and the prison population rate per 100,000 people in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The population of the Scottish penal system on 30 June 1987 was 5,394. This is equivalent to 105·3 inmates per 100,000 of the Scottish population.

Job Training Scheme

Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the job training scheme sponsors in Scotland; how many unemployed people are involved at the latest date; and what accounts he is taking of the views of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Scottish Trades Union Congress in reviewing the scheme.

Mr. Lang: The following organisations had, at 10 July 1987, signed contracts with the Manpower Services Commission to act as managing agents in Scotland for the new job training scheme:

Aberdeen Chamber of Commerce
A. D. M. Ltd. (Alan d'Morias)
AMARC (TES Ltd.) (Associated Marine and Related Charities (Training and Education Services Ltd.))
Borders Regional Council
British Shipbuilders
Buckhaven Parish Church
Dumfries and Galloway Regional Council
Dundee Skillcentre
Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce
Grampian Regional Council
Hotel and Catering Training Board
Hillington Skillcentre
J. H. P. Training Ltd.
Lanarkshire JTS Ltd.
Lloyds British Testing Ltd.
Mentor
Metcon
The Microcomputer Training Centre
Radix Training (Scotland) Ltd.
Reid Consultants
R. R. W. Associates
Sight and Sound
Suliven Ltd.
Training Services (Fife) Ltd.
Westwood Training Services Ltd.
Whiteleys
Work Start

At 3 July 1987 1,391 unemployed people were participating in the new job training scheme.

The views of the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities and the Scottish Trades Union Congress have been noted: I very much regret that they are seeking to deny the unemployed the opportunity to receive training which will enhance their future employment prospects.

School Placements

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had from parents about school placements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I receive many representations from parents about school placing requests. Most are inquiries as to how to make an application or requests for advice on the appeals procedures. Since 1982, over 93,000 placing requests have been made to Scottish education authorities; almost 95 per cent. have been successful.

Stobhill Hospital

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with Greater Glasgow health board about the future of Stobhill hospital; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. Future developments at Stobhill hospital will depend on the outcome of the reviews of services currently being carried out by the Greater Glasgow health board for the whole of its area.

Accident and Emergency Departments (Glasgow)

Mr. Galbraith asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Greater Glasgow health board about the future of the accident and emergency departments in Glasgow; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: None. The board will be reviewing its accident and emergency services as part of its review of acute services generally.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each local authority area in Scotland the number of houses made available to people under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act for each of the last five years; and what percentage this represented of the total number of houses available for new tenants for each year.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is shown in the table attached for each of last four financial years. Corresponding information for 1982-83 is not available.

[1] Information not recieved from the authority.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to those areas from which people applying for housing under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act have emanated.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Although information is available centrally on the numbers of homeless applications to individual local authorities, this information is not held on a basis which would identify the areas from which applicants have emanated.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those local authorities in Scotland which have been required to provide homes for people who have declared themselves homeless under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: All districts and islands authorities in Scotland have provided housing under the Act.

Housing Waiting List

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each local authority in Scotland the number of people on council housing waiting lists; and if he has any information to indicate how many of these people are on the waiting lists of other local authorities.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Consistent reliable information on numbers of people on local authority housing waiting lists is not held centrally, nor is information on numbers applying to more than one authority.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to the number of applicants on local authority housing waiting lists who have made multiple applications in different local authority areas.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: This information is not available centrally.

Housing Costs

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will state (a) in general terms and (b) by individual local authority the percentage of the cost of construction of new local authority housing borne (i) by the ratepayer and (ii) by the taxpayer in Scotland for each of the last 10 years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is not available.

Housing Investment

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial inducements are available to private sector developers to generate housing investment in areas designated by his Department as stress areas or deprived inner-city areas.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Private sector developers can apply to local authorities for improvement and repairs grants for the repair and improvement of property for subsequent sale and rent. In addition, the local enterprise grants for urban projects scheme (LEG-UP) is available to help attract private sector development, including housing, to urban areas which might not otherwise be considered for investment.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Adely asked the Secretary of State for Scotland, for each of the last 10 years in Scotland, what percentage of (a) newly constructed houses and (b) renovation of older houses has been undertaken by local authorities and what percentage by private developers.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The table shows the percentage of new dwellings completed in each of the last 10 years by local authorities and by the private sector.

New dwellings completed in Scotland, per cent. of total dwellings completed in year.

Year	Local Authority	Private Sector
1977	33·4	44·4
1978	26·0	56·1
1979	20·0	63·8
1980	24·5	59·4

1982	14·3	70·2
1983	12·9	73·5
1984	11·3	74·9
1985	10·8	78·6
1986	9·4	80·0

No information is available about the extent of renovation undertaken by private developers or individuals without the aid of a grant. The information available centrally about grants paid to private owners does not distinguish between owner occupiers and private developers for every year in the series.

Empty Housing

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total number of local authority houses in each individual local authority area in Scotland making up the total number of currently empty local authority houses.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information requested is listed, showing the position at 31 March 1986

SDA (Grant Aid)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the total value of grants made by the Scottish Development Agency to companies or projects in Scotland in each year since 1979 in (a) cash terms and (b) real terms on 1987-88 prices.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 33]: The information is as follows:

Year	£ million value in cash terms	£ million value in real terms on 1987-88 prices
1979-80	0·1	0·17
1980-81	0·1	0·14
1981-82	0·6	0·80
1982-83	0·7	0·87
1983-84	5·5	6·50
1984-85	10·6	12·10
1985-86	10·7	11·51
1986-87	19·9	20·79

The figures contain expenditure under the agency's recognised grant schemes such as the development of rural area workshops, programme for rural initiatives and developments and the local enterprise grants for urban projects and also include development grants to, for example enterprise trusts, the training and employment grant scheme and better business services scheme.

Closures

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how many closures have been reported in Renfrew, West and Inverclyde constituency in each year since 1979; and how many jobs have been involved.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1987]: Information given to the department of Employment under the redundancy handling provisions of the Employment Protection Act are given in confidence and because of this a detailed breakdown cannot be given for the years 1979 to 1981. The details are not in precisely the form requested, but relate to the number of closures involving 10 or more workers confirmed to jobcentres covering areas wholly or partly within the constituency.

	Number of closures	Number of redundancies
1979	[1]	[1]
1980	22	843
1981	13	[1]
1982	16	873

Scottish Development Agency (Expenditure)

Mr. Graham asked the Secretary of State for Scotland how much has been spent by the Scottish development Agency in each year since 1979 in Renfrew, West and Inverclyde constituency; and what proportion of all spending by the agency this figure represents.

Mr. Lang [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1987]: As a result of changes in constituency boundaries information is only available from 1983-84. It is as follows.

	£	Per cent.
1983-84	1,686,000	1·70
1984-85	2,182,000	2·23
1985-86	2,434,000	2·22
1986-87	1,344,000	1·21

These figures represent annual expenditure on investments, land and buildings, environmental development grants and development planning and projects. Agency expenditure under the following categories is not allocated on a constituency basis:

Maintenance, dilapidations, estate land maintenance, security, land marketing signs, fire and engineering insurances.

Land and building, plant and equipment, notice boards, owner controlled insurance, gas, water and electricity supplies, feasibility studies and surveys.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Midwives

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what representations he has received about the number of midwives presently serving in the National Health Service; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what steps he is taking to recruit more midwives.

Mr. Newton: While we are aware of the evidence presented by the Royal College of Midwives to the pay review body, we have not received any formal representations about the number of midwives presently serving in the National Health Service. We have however received a number of letters referring to midwife recruitment difficulties in particular localities. Nationally the total number of qualified midwives employed in the NHS in England continues to increase and at September 1985 there were 18,260 whole-time equivalents, which is an increase of 14 per cent. since 1981. Although the number entering training in the year ended 31 March 1987 decreased by 6·8 per cent. to 2,759 over the previous year, the proportion passing their examinations increased from about 78 per cent. to 95 per cent.

Individual health authorities are responsible for recruiting staff. However, central initiatives intended to help with the recruitment and retention of midwives include funding in the present financial year a feasibility study into direct entry midwifery by the English National Board; a review by the management and staff sides of the nursing and midwifery staffs negotiating council of the grading structure for nursing and midwifery staff with the aim of providing a more flexible structure which can recognise individual skills and responsibility; and a joint NHS/DHSS working group on equal opportunities for women with particular reference to management of the career break.

Board and Lodging

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will consider reviewing the situation whereby a local authority cannot top up a person's board and lodging payment to a private or charitable nursing or old people's home, but must instead meet the full cost, if Department of Health and Social Security rates are insufficient.

Mr. Scott: Local authorities can already top up supplementary benefit payments for residential care for people under pension age or for older people whose payments have been topped up for two years before they reach pension age. The possibility of extending this arrangement to all elderly people in residential care, which would require primary legislation, is one of the matters considered by the joint central and local government working party on supplementary benefit and residential care, whose report will be published shortly. The findings of the working party, as well as the position of people needing care in other settings outside hospital, including nursing homes, will need to be looked at in the context of the overview of community care which Sir Roy Griffiths has been asked to carry out by the end of the year.

Dr. Moonie asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether attendance allowance, where payable, generally is deducted from the payment made for board and lodging allowance to persons in old people's homes.

Mr. Scott: For supplementary benefit claimants in residential care and nursing homes, attendance allowance is taken into account as a resource in the calculation of their benefit. This is because supplementary benefit can be paid up to substantially higher levels than in ordinary board and lodging establishments, in recognition of the fact that care is provided. Not to take attendance allowance into account in such a system would in effect be double provision.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what are the diagnostic and other criteria governing the admission and discharge of patients to and from mental hospitals and units in the National Health Service on which the statements in paragraph 13 of his Department's statistical bulletin 4/86 are based;

(2) whether, in the light of the reference in paragraph 29 of the Audit Commission Report, "Making a reality of Community Care", about the existence of much tighter admission criteria for long-stay patients in mental hospitals, if he will make a statement on admission criteria;

(3) what is his policy in the light of paragraph 80 (c) of the Audit Commission Report, "Making a reality of Community Care", towards setting up services for those who do not gain access to long-stay places in mental hospitals under current admission policies.

Mrs. Currie: With the exception of part II of the Mental Health Act 1983 there are no other statutory requirements relating to hospital admissions or discharges. The responsibility of the Secretary of State for such matters is delegated by him to health authorities and it is for the health authority to ensure that there is a clear local agreement on how admissions (including admissions to longer term care) and discharges are handled. Procedures will vary from hospital to hospital and from one locality to another but decisions will normally be taken by the professionals involved and will be a matter of clinical judgment in each individual case.

When the decision taken is not to admit a person to hospital, treatment can be offered instead in a day hospital, or at the person's home. Appropriate medical, nursing, social work and therapy services need to be provided locally to meet the needs of people treated in these settings.

National Health Service Planners (Seminars)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether the seminars for National Health Service planners about provision of hospital hostels which he intended arranging early in 1987 have now been held.

Mrs. Currie: Dates and venues have now been agreed for five seminars to spread knowledge of the best ways of providing long-term in-patient care for those people chronically disabled by mental illness, without creating the institutional environment of traditional long-stay wards. The first will be held on 16 October in Birmingham.

Schizophrenia

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will arrange for the numbers of patients with a diagnosis of schizophrenia to be analysed by frequency of re-admission to hospital.

Mrs. Currie: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks. Statistics are not collected centrally on the number of patients in hospital with a particular diagnosis, and data about admissions to hospital cannot be linked to individual people. During 1986 there were 25,046 admissions of people to NHS mental illness hospitals and units with a main diagnosis of schizophrenic psychoses, and of these 22,523 (90 per cent.) were re-admissions. Further information can be found in Statistical Bulletin 1/86 "Mental Illness Hospitals and Units In England: Schizophrenic Statistics 1981-84", a copy of which is in the Library.

NHS (Construction Projects)

Mr. Trotter asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will publish a list of the new hospitals and major extensions to health service buildings now under way in each health authority and a similar list of proposed work, indicating the likely start date in each case.

Mrs. Currie: From information held centrally on health building schemes, each costing over £1 million, list 1 shows schemes currently under construction and list 2 schemes at the planning or design stage with, where available, the year in which construction is planned to start.

NHS (Hospitals)

Mr. Ralph Howell asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list all National Health Service hospitals (a) of over 800 beds, and (b) which have been added to since 1980 to make the combined old and new building over 800 beds.

Mrs. Currie: Information available centrally shows that the acute-general hospitals listed provide over 800 beds. Of these Ipswich hospital, Addenbrookes hospital, Queens medical centre and Leicester general hospital have had phases added since 1980 to bring their total number of beds over 800.

National Aids Trust

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when the National Aids Trust last met; whether a director for the National Aids Trust has been appointed; what progress or action the National Aids Trust has made or taken; whether the fund raising committee has met and what developments it made; whether the voluntary and support bodies in the field are prepared to co-operate with the National Aids Trust; and what consideration is being made to the problems in Scotland, Wales, and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Newton: I understand that those who have agreed to serve as trustees have held two meetings and that a further meeting is to be held this month. The National Aids Trust will be an independent charitable body and will shortly be advertising for a chief executive. I understand that considerable progress has been made in formulating policies and priorities and that initial discussions with others in the voluntary sector have been fruitful. There is, of course, a good deal of work still to be done.

The trust is being established as a United Kingdom body and will therefore give consideration to the problems in Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and England. The trust's chairman is Sir Austin Bide. He can be contacted through the Trust's offices at

HIV Infection

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what special arrangements are being made for intravenous drug users to combat the spread of HIV infection; and, in particlar, whether the needle exchange programmes have been evaluated.

Mr. Newton: We are taking the following measures designed both to reinforce our anti-drugs strategy and to curb the spread of AIDS among drug misusers and from them into the general population.

First, we are continuing to give priority to our strategy for the prevention of drug misuse, and expect to highlight the dangers of injecting in the next phase of our AIDS and drugs publicity campaigns.

Second, we are providing an extra £1 million in 1987-88 to help drug misuse services play a growing role in the fight against AIDS.

Third, we have established 15 pilot schemes in different parts of the United Kingdom where injecting drug misusers can both receive counselling and exchange used needles and syringes for sterile equipment. These schemes are being monitored and evaluated to help assess their effect on the behaviour of their users. We hope to receive a preliminary report by the end of the year.

In addition, the Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs has set up a working group to consider urgently what further measures could be taken.

AIDS

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make additional funds available so that all those who could benefit from AZT and other drugs can be treated.

Mr. Newton: Health authorities are expected to make provision for the costs of Retrovir (AZT) and other drugs from the resources allocated to them. In recognition of the particular burden they are carrying however, we have allocated an additional £1·6 million towards the costs of treatment with Retrovir to the three Thames regions which together are caring for the majority of people with AIDS.

Mr. Strang asked the Secretary of State for Social Services on what dates the group established to co-ordinate action against AIDS by the Health Ministers of European Economic Community countries has met; and whether he will make available reports of the meetings.

Mr. Newton: The European Community ad hoc working party of officials on AIDS had its first meeting on 24 June and will next meet in the autumn. It is not the practice to make available reports of meetings of Community groups of this kind.

NHS Resources (Trent)

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give, for the Trent region and each of its districts, for each year since 1979-80, its capital resources allocation working party allocation as a percentage of its weighted population share.

Mr. Newton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) on 14 July in respect of the Trent region.

Information on district health authorities is not held centrally. The hon. Member may therefore wish to approach the chairman of Trent regional health authority.

Waiting Lists

Mr. Burns asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people living within the Mid Essex health authority area are waiting for non-emergency operations and treatment; what the figures were 12 months ago and 24 months ago; and what was the average waiting time 24 months ago, 12 months ago and the latest available figures.

Mr. Newton: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will enumerate those health authorities where waiting lists for in-patient treatment exceeded 18 per thousand in 1985 and 1986; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will enumerate those health authorities where present waiting lists for in-patient treatment exceed 18 per thousand; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton [pursuant to his reply, 10 July 1987 c. 312]: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend all the information he seeks. Current information is not held centrally. The available information for 1985 and 1986 is given in the table.

A significant, though varying, proportion of patients on the waiting list are referred by general practitioners in other districts. The relevant population for comparison is therefore the "catchment" population which can, and in many cases does, vary substantially from the resident population. The figures for district health authorities may therefore have little significance. Any comparisons between districts based upon these percentages could be seriously misleading.

Disabled Persons

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when sections 5 and 6 of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act will be implemented; and what consultation has taken place with voluntary organisations over the guidelines for those sections.

Mr. Scott: My predecessor had a meeting in April about the implementation of the Act, including sections 5 and 6, with the steering group established by voluntary organisations. We have since received papers from the steering group about the implementation of sections 5 and 6 which are being studied.

On the timing of implementation of the various sections of the Act, I cannot add to my replies to the hon. Members for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley), for Halifax (Ms. Mahon) and for Monklands, West (Mr. Clarke) on 30 June, at column 75.

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the voluntary organisations which have made representations to him about the implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986.

Mr. Scott: Since 1 January 1987 representations about implementation of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986 have been received from the steering group set up by many of the major voluntary organisations representing disabled people to monitor implementation of the Act and from the following individual organisations:—

Alzheimer's Disease Society
Arthritis Care
Association of Professions for Mentally Handicapped
Backpain Association
Batley and District Society for Mentally Handicapped Children and Adults
Bury and District Disabled Advisory Council
Barnsley Action Group for the Physically Disabled
Barnsley Metropolitan District Association for Disabled People
Central Northumberland Spastics Society

Tunbridge Wells and Tonbridge Spastics Society Group
Walsall Society for Mentally Handicapped Children
Waltham Forest Cerebral Palsy Group
Wandsworth Disablement Association
Worcester Association for the Blind
York MIND (National Association for Mental Health)

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what consultation with the voluntary organisations is planned with regard to all sections of the Disabled Persons (Services, Consultation and Representation) Act 1986, not already implemented.

Mr. Scott: I am unable to add to my reply to the right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) on 7 July, at column 119.

Cervical Cancer

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many women in Cornwall and the Isles of Scilly are currently waiting for a colposcopy for the treatment of cervical cancer; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: I regret that this information is not collected centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairman of the Cornwall and Isles of Scilly district health authority.

Childminding (Exhibition)

Ms. Harman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if his Department has considered an application for an exhibition relating to "10 Years of Childminding —Share the Care" to be displayed in the Upper Waiting Hall.

Mr. Newton: I understand that under procedures agreed by the Service Committee, arrangements have been made with the authorities of the House for the exhibition to be held in the Upper Waiting Hall from 20 July 1987 until 24 July 1987.

Radon Gas

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he has any proposals to conduct an epidemiological study of those people living in areas with a high radon gas presence.

Mrs. Currie: Detailed proposals for such an epidemiological study are already under consideration by the Department together with the Department of the Environment and the National Radiological Protection Board.

Overseas Voters

Mr. Kaufman asked the Secretary of State for Social Services, for each United Kingdom parliamentary constituency, how many overseas voters were registered; and how many overseas votes were cast in the general election on 11 June.

Mrs. Currie: A table showing the number of overseas electors in each constituency on the 1987 electoral register has been placed in the Library. Information on overseas votes cast is not available as such votes are not separated from other ballot papers.

Crown Immunity

Mr. Ashley asked the Secretry of State for Social Services (1) what information he has sought or been offered by health authorities regarding the effect of the lifting of Crown immunity; how many authorities have had to increase their expenditure on food hygiene and health and safety; and what requests for increased funding he has received as a consequence;

(2) if he will take steps to ensure that the accounting system for health authorities will enable identification of the extent to which the lifting of Crown immunity has increased hospital spending on food hygiene and health and safety in the first year without immunity;

(3) if he will request from regional health authorities information on the additional costs so far incurred or predicted in their regions because of the lifting of Crown immunity; and if he will seek a breakdown of the nature of the costs.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 14 July 1987]: Central guidance has, for a number of years, indicated that health authorities are expected to establish working practices as if they were not immune from legal penalty. We are aware of a number of recent instances where authorities have, following the implementation on 7 February 1987 of Sections 1 and 2 of the National Health Service (Amendment) Act 1986, decided to adjust spending priorities and alter building programmes. Health authority procedures have also changed as a result of the Crown immunity changes: circular HC(86) advises them that an annual report on environmental health officer reports on an authority's units and action taken in response, should be taken in public session. We do not believe that a special exercise into the impact of the removal of Crown immunity from the areas in question is called for.

Food (Radiation Levels)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what testing methods are recommended or approved for importers to ensure that food imports have not been treated with ionizing radiation; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 13 July 1987]: At present, there are no tests available to detect whether food has been irradiated. Under the Food (Control of Irradiation) Regulations 1967, it is illegal to import irradiated food. Port health authorities are watchful for any indication of irradiation as evidenced by accompanying documentation or markings on the packaging. It is hoped that research in the United Kingdom and elsewhere will lead to the development of testing methods within the next few years.

ENVIRONMENT

Rate Support Grant

16. Mr. Corbett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to give provisional details of the 1988-89 rate support grant settlement.

Mr. Chope: I hope to announce my proposals for the main elements of the 1988-89 rate support grant settlement before the House rises for the summer recess.

38. Mr. Allan Roberts asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how much rate support grant has been withdrawn from the councils of the Merseyside area; and by how much their housing investment programmes have been reduced since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: Since the introduction of block grant in 1981-82 local authorities in the area of the former Merseyside county council have received total rate support grant as follows:

	£ million
1981-82 4th SR	378·3
1982-83 3rd SR	372·1
1983-84 3rd SR	381·3
1984-85 3rd SR	371·0
1985-86 3rd SR	411·0
1986-87 2nd SR	388·0
1987-88 1st SR	418·0

Their share of the total block grant payable in England in this period has risen by 7 per cent. The system prior to 1981-82 is not comparable.

Total HIP allocations for the Merseyside authorities since the introduction of the capital control system in 1981-82 are as follows:

	£ million
1981-82	64·2
1982-83	76·2
1983-84	66·6
1984-85	65·7
1985-86	57·6
1986-87	49·0
1987-88	46·1

The system prior to 1981-82 is not comparable.

Local authorities' spending power from capital receipts, which can be used in addition to capital allocations has grown substantially in recent years. In 1986-87 the Merseyside authorities would have been able to spend a further £57·1 million of capital receipts from all services, in addition to their £49·0 million HIP allocations.

World Student Games

17. Mr. Bill Michie asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to promote the holding of the world student games in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Moynihan: Sheffield's bid to host the 1991 world student games has my wholehearted support. Both my predecessor and I have offered the Sheffield team every diplomatic, promotional and administrative assistance.

Inner Cities

19. Mr. Fatchett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about his plans to improve the quality of housing in the inner cities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I receive many representations on this subject. The Government are presently considering two proposals for improving housing in the Chapeltown area of Leeds. I am particularly encouraged at the possibility of private sector involvement in refurbishment work in the Hillcrest area.

27. Mr. Duffy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he is satisfied with the present scale and allocation of urban programme funds for inner city renewal.

Mr. Trippier: Yes. The resources are subject to the normal annual review in the public expenditure survey.

47. Mr. Rooker asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he proposes to speed up renewal of inner city housing in areas where ownership is split between occupiers, and tenants of housing associations and private landlords.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government are taking forward a range of housing initiatives which will contribute to the renewal of inner-city housing. These include reform of the improvement grant system to target resources where the needs are greatest; a new power for local authorities to provide assistance for privately rented accommodation; deregulation of new private sector lettings so as to bring new investment into the private rented sector and more private investment into housing associations; and housing action trusts which will take responsibility for run-down housing in designated areas, improve it, and pass it on to different tenures and ownerships. The existing range of inner-city programmes will also be available to play a part in this process of renewal.

50. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the representations which he has received on his recent proposals for the regeneration of the inner cities.

Mr. Trippier: Our manifesto proposals have been well received.

Rating Reform

18. Mr. McLeish asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the funding of the administration costs of the proposed community charge.

Mr. Howard: The Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (para 3.43) made it clear that the Government would consult the local authority associations about the new costs arising from the community charge and would take account of them in setting the level of aggregate Exchequer grant.

20. Mr. McNamara asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to issue a White Paper in respect of the proposed community charge.

Mr. Ridley: The Government's proposals for reforming the rating system were set out in a Green Paper published in January 1986. Consultation on the proposals ran until October of last year. On 15 December I published a further document "Paying for Local Government; the Community Charge", in which we confirmed our intention to proceed with the main elements of the Green Paper proposals and set out details of the operation of the community charge. The commitment was included in the manifesto on which the Government convincingly won the election.

21. Mrs. Ann Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the likely level of community charge for English local authorities.

Mr. Chope: Since we first published illustrative community charge figures on 1 April last we have received 205 representations about the likely level of the community charge.

28. Mr. Darling asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to ensuring that the register on which the proposed community charge in England and Wales is to be based is as accurate and up to date as possible.

Mr. Howard: The procedures for preparing and maintaining the register were described in some detail in the document on the operation of the community charge, which was placed in the Library on 15 December 1986. It will be the responsibility of each local authority to ensure that their register is accurate and up to date.

29. Mr. Michael J. Martin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what provisions he intends to incorporate in the legislation to introduce a poll tax in England and Wales to take account of the preparations for implementing the tax in Scotland.

Mr. Chope: It has always been the Government's intention that the Community charge systems in Scotland and in England and Wales should be broadly compatible.

34. Mr. McFall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration he has given to the establishment of a rebate scheme in respect of the proposed community charge.

Mr. Howard: As the Government have repeatedly made plain, rebates of up to 80 per cent. of the community charge will be available for those on low incomes.

42. Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to implement plans for a poll tax.

Mr. Howard: It is intended that the community charge should be introduced in England and Wales on 1 April 1990.

43. Mr. Rathbone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the Government's plan for a community charge in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My Department received 1,217 responses before 31 October 1986 when the consultation period on the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714) ended. My right hon. Friend placed a summary of those responses in the Library on 15 December 1986. We continue to receive representations about our detailed proposals.

49. Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received on the estimated impact on the inhabitants of the Leeds, West constituency of the proposed community charge; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Since we first published illustrative community charge figures on 1 April 1987, we have received three representations about the community charge from individuals residing in Leeds.

53. Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate he has made of the number of people who will be required to pay his proposed poll tax at the full rate.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to figure J9 of the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714) for an estimate of housing benefit case load associated with the new local government finance system. There will, in addition, be a number of people who will benefit from the exemptions, for the severely mentally handicapped, the elderly in residential homes and the concession for students previously announced. There will be considerable overlap between the estimate of housing benefit cases and those who will benefit from these concessions.

61. Ms. Walley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a White Paper on the proposed community charge for England and Wales.

67. Mr. Lofthouse asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a White Paper on the proposed community charge for England and Wales.

Mr. Howard: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend gave to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara) earlier today.

68. Mr. O'Brien asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the difference in the cost of collecting local revenues under (a) the existing rating system and (b) the proposed poll tax in west Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: Our preliminary estimate is that the cost of collecting the community charge may be, broadly, up to twice the cost of collecting domestic rates. However, the cost to any individual local authority will depend on the extent to which they can reduce unit costs. We estimate that almost twice as many people will pay the community charge as pay domestic rates.

74. Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many letters he has received from the general public on the proposals by Her Majesty's Government to abolish domestic rates and to impose a uniform business rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: 479 responses were received from the general public before 31 October 1986 when the consultation period on the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714) ended. Since we first published illustrative community charge figures on 1 April we have received 181 representations from members of the general public.

81. Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from organisations representing local government about the proposed community charge.

Mr. Howard: The Department received 1,217 responses before 31 October last when the consultation period on the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714) closed, of which 454 were from local authorities and organisations representing local government.

Ms. Quinn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate the Government have made of the likely effect on house prices in the different regions of the United Kingdom as a result of the introduction of the community charge.

Mr. Howard: Annex E of the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714), published on 28 January 1986, contained an analysis of the likely impact of the abolition of domestic rates on the housing market.

PRC Houses

22. Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the Government's current policy on grants for PRC houses that need repairs and modernisation.

Mr. Waldegrave: The housing defects legislation provides the framework for assistance to eligible owners of designated properties; local authorities are then responsible for its administration. My Department's circular 14/86 gave general guidance on reinstatement procedures; we look to local authorities to implement the legislation in a reasonable way.

39. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to increase provision made for local housing authorities to enable defective PRC dwellings to be reinstated or repurchased in good time; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: We generally expect local authorities to be able to meet their housing defects obligations from within their normal sources of spending power. Fourteen million pounds extra HIP resources were put aside, for 1987-88, for authorities facing particular HDA difficulties; Epping Forest was allocated an additional £350,000. We are currently discussing with the local authority associations the HIP distribution arrangements for 1987-88.

Sporting Events (Drugs)

23. Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is taking to combat the taking of drugs in sport.

Mr. Moynihan: I announced on 8 July a major review of the misuse of drugs in sport. This I am undertaking personally with the assistance of Sebastian Coe, deputy chairman of the Sports Council. I am determined to see every possible step taken to stamp out drug abuse in sport and I hope the review will help in bringing this about.

66. Mr. Livingstone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimates are available to him of the number of people taking drugs and other illegal substances in British sport.

Mr. Moynihan: No estimates are available of the number of people taking drugs and other illegal substances in British sport. Not all substances banned by the International Olympic Committee are illegal; some are available on prescription or in over-the-counter preparations. The drug control and teaching centre conducted 2545 tests in 1986; there were 28 adverse findings.

Bees

24. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to delete bees from any list of urban pests to be contained in guidance given to local authorities following the reference given in appendix D, paragraph D23, of the Green Paper "Air Pollution Control"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: We are giving very careful consideration to the representations submitted by beekeepers and beekeeping organisations, and by local authorities and other bodies, regarding the proposal in the consultation paper on air pollution control in Great Britain to extend the scope of section 74 of the Public Health Act 1961 to allow local authorities to deal with nuisance from various species, of which bees were given as an example.

Home Insulation

25. Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number of elderly people who received a 66 per cent. grant for home insulation under the Homes Insulation Act 1978 in each year from 1978 until the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information is not available about the number of elderly people who have received insulation grants at the rate of 66 per cent. However, 308,700 90 per cent. grants were paid to elderly people on low incomes in the period from October 1980 to June 1984, from July 1984 to December 1986 148,200 grants at 90 per cent. were paid to elderly or disabled people on low incomes, of which the majority are believed to have been to the elderly.

Sports Participation

26. Mr. Litherland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to further promote sports participation in Great Britain.

Mr. Moynihan: I am giving high priority to the development of measures to encourage greater participation in sport and recreation, especially by those living in our inner cities. I will be working with all the agencies concerned, including the Sports Council.

Callywhite Lane Industrial Estate (Fire)

30. Mr. Harry Barnes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will meet a deputation drawn from firms, councils and trade unions directly affected by an underground fire burning on Callywhite Lane industrial estate in Dronfield, Derbyshire, to discuss means by which his Department can assist in overcoming this current emergency.

Mr. Trippier: I am making arrangements to meet the hon. Member and a deputation of firms, councils and trade unions to discuss the underground fire at Callywhite Lane industrial estate.

Estate Action

32. Mrs. Mahon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received about the work of estate action; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: Estate action has stimulated a lot of interest in many quarters. About 100 local authorities have now suggested schemes for inclusion in the programme.

Local Authority Pension Funds

35. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will introduce legislation to tighten the rules on local authority pension fund investments.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend is concerned about reports that some local authorities invested part of their pension funds in the paper News on Sunday, which they must have known was unlikely to show a profit. Their decision ignored the interests of their ratepayers, who are required to make good any deficiency in the fund caused by bad investment. My right hon. Friend is considering what steps should be taken to prevent the misuse of pension fund moneys.

Green Belt

36. Mr. Chapman asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will restate the Government's policy on the 4·5 million acres of established green belt land in England.

Mr. Waldegrave: The Government's policy on green belts remains as set out in Department of the Environment Circular 14/84. There must continue to be a general presumption against inappropriate development within green belts. Planning guidelines have been issued in Circular 12/87 for redundant sites in green belts.

Hazardous Waste

37. Mr. Murphy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps his Department is taking to improve the monitoring of the disposal of hazardous waste.

Mr. Moynihan: It is the responsibility of the waste disposal authorities to license and monitor the disposal of hazardous waste. The Department has no direct locus in the licensing of disposal facilities, but Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution continues to examine the way in which WDAs perform this function. In the course of its inspectorial functions, HMIP encourages waste disposal authorities to make whatever improvements are necessary.

Local Government Finance

40. Mr. Greg Knight asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received during the last 12 months on the subject of local authority spending.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State received over 350 representations from local authorities and from the local authority associations. In addition, he received a number of deputations from hon. Members and local authorities.

45. Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether his Department intends to introduce any changes in the use of capital receipts by local authorities.

54. Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will now allow local authorities to make full use of their capital receipts.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans for any change. Authorities can already make full use of their receipts over time and I refer him to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) today.

51. Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review his ruling on the use by local housing authorities of their capital receipts from the sale of council dwellings.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend has no immediate plans for any change. Authorities can use their receipts at any time to redeem debt or for non-prescribed expenditure such as capitalised repairs. They can use their receipts in full for prescribed expenditure but with the exception of certain categories of low-cost home ownership schemes there is a limit to the percentage of each receipt which can be spent in any one year.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

41. Mr. McCartney asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he proposes to issue a White Paper on the privatisation of English and Welsh water authorities.

75. Mrs. Clwyd asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a further White Paper on the privatisation of English and Welsh water authorities.

Mr. Moynihan: We shall publish shortly a policy and consultation paper setting out our proposals for the restructuring and privatisation within the water industry.

44. Mr. Morley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what safeguards will be incorporated in his proposals for the sale of water authority services to ensure the environmental protection of water courses and catchment areas.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government last year published a consultation paper "The Water Environment: The Next Steps" which proposed a number of measures to safeguard rivers, streams and ground water sources. Proposals to establish a national rivers authority, which will provide increased protection for the environment, will be published in the near future.

Peak Park Planning Board

46. Mr. McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to visit the area of the Peak park planning board.

Mr. Ridley: I have no immediate plans to do so.

Football Association

48. Mr. Pendry asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to meet the chairman or secretary of the Football Association.

Mr. Moynihan: My right hon. Friend the Secreary of State has no immediate plans to meet the chairman or general secretary of the Football Association. I met them on 1 July and shall be meeting them again on 5 August.

Lead Plumbing

52. Mr. Sean Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many dwellings in England and Wales rely on lead plumbing; and what percentage of the total this represents.

Mr. Moynihan: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) today.

Basildon (Housing)

55. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to how many new houses have been built by the Basildon Development Corporation New Towns Commission, and how many by Basildon council, in Basildon in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Roe: The reported numbers of dwellings completed in Basildon for the district council and for the development corporation or the New Towns Commission in 1982 and 1983 appear in issue 73 of "Local Housing Statistics", and those in 1984 in issue 77 and those in 1985 and 1986 in issue 81; copies of these volumes are available in the Library. When issue 77 was published, reports had been received from the district council only for the first seven months of 1984; subsequently returns, for the other five months have been received and the completions for the council in the full year numbered 193.

Rent Arrears

56. Mr. Marlow asked the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authority has the highest level of rent arrears; and what this level is in terms of the number of weeks arrears per average household and in cash terms.

Mrs. Roe: Local authorities in England reported their rent arrears as at 1 April 1986 on their housing subsidy claim forms. The highest level of arrears, in relation to annual payments due, was reported by the London borough of Brent. This authority reported a total of £10·96 million rent arrears, which was equivalent to 33 times the average weekly rent due on its council dwellings.

Rate Capping

57. Mr. Holt asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to introduce rate-capping legislation for town and parish councils; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: The Government have no plans to legislate for this purpose.

65. Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce which councils are to be rate-capped in 1988-89; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend expects to announce his decisions on the designation of authorities for 1988-89 very shortly.

71. Mr. Stern asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will consider applying a general rate-cap for all years between 1 April 1988 and the date of full implementation of the community charge.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend intends to announce his proposals for rate limitation in 1988-89 before the summer recess. As my hon. Friend is aware, a proposal to introduce general rate limitation would require consultation with the local authority associations and be subject to the approval of both Houses of Parliament.

Local Government Bill

58. Mr. Clelland asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in response to the Local Government Bill.

Mr. Howard: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations most of which relate to dog licences. Of the rest, the majority concern part II of the Bill and welcome its provisions.

Footpath

59. Mr. Andrew F. Bennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many extra footpaths have been designated as public rights of way since the coming into operation of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1982; how many have been closed; and what has been the net effect on the mileage of public rights of way in England.

Mr. Moynihan: This information is not held centrally. The Ramblers' Association is notified of some, but not all proposals affecting footpaths. Information on the effect of those proposals on the mileage of rights of way in England and Wales is set out in the first report on the monitoring of the rights of way legislation in the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981, published by the Countryside Commission in 1985. There is a copy of this in the Library of the House.

Council House Sales

62. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council houses have been sold to sitting tenants in England since May 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: From April 1979 to March 1987, about 790,000 tenants bought their houses from English local authorities and new towns.

Gleneagles Agreement

63. Mr. John Carlisle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place between himself and the Test and County Cricket Board regarding the implications of the Gleneagles agreement.

Mr. Moynihan: I met representatives of the Test and County Cricket Board on 23 June.

I was subsequently informed of the outcome of the ICC meeting held on 26 June.

Thamesmead

64. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a further statement regarding the transfer of Thamesmead from the London residuary body to Thamesmead town.

Mr. Chope: We shall be in a position to make a full statement by early next week.

Telford Development Corporation

69. Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he has any plans to consult the tenants of the Telford development corporation about the future ownership of their homes.

Mrs. Roe: We are considering arrangements for such consultations.

Development (Berkshire)

70. Mr. Andrew McKay asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received concerning the pattern of development in Berkshire.

Mr. Trippier: My right hon. Friend has received a number of representations relating to both the scale and pattern of future development in Berkshire. There will be further opportunity for comment about this when my right hon. Friend publishes his modifications to the replacement structure plan for Berkshire.

Beaches

72. Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he is satisfied with the state of beaches in tourist areas.

Mr. Moynihan: My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) announced on 30 April (Official Report, column 186) the results of the 1986 survey of bathing water quality. These showed that about 62 per cent. of the 368 waters reported on met the coliform standards set out in the "Bathing Waters" directive of the European Community.

This survey is continuing, and some £70 million a year is being spent to improve coastal bathing water quality.

Housing Estates (Administration)

77. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his plans for the future administration of council housing estates.

Mrs. Roe: We have plans to continue our policies of giving council tenants wider opportunities and choices. We shall legislate to give local authority tenants the right to opt for transfer to approved landlords.

We shall set up housing action trusts in designated areas to take over run-down local authority housing, renovate it and pass it on to different tenures and ownership.

We shall continue to encourage local authorities to improve the condition of council housing and to introduce more effective management and maintenance.

Gazumping

78. Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received on the subject of gazumping.

Mrs. Roe: I receive letters on the subject from time to time from hon. Members and members of the public; but questions on the law and practice of conveyancing are the responsibility of my noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, whose predecessor established a standing committee at the Law Commission to bring forward proposals in this area.

House Building

79. Mr. Hardy asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take immediate steps to allow local authorities in inner cities and in areas of economic need to increase house building, in particular for the accommodation of the elderly.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local housing authorities are responsible for deciding the priorities for expenditure in their own areas and, after taking full account of what can be done by the private and voluntary sectors, for targeting new provision on those in greatest housing need, such as the elderly on low incomes.

Charities

80. Mr. Yeo asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding the effect on charities on the Government's proposals for rate reform.

Mr. Chope: A number of voluntary and welfare organisations responded to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714).

Since the consultation period of the Green Paper ended on 31 October 1986, we have received a number of further representations.

Pesticides

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the operation of the pesticides safety precautions scheme and the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986; and if he will give his assessment of whether the 1986 regulations are working effectively.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I have been asked to reply.

The pesticides safety precautions scheme was replaced on 6 October 1986 by the Control of Pesticides Regulations 1986. These regulations are coming into operation over several years and it will not be possible to assess their effectiveness fully until they have been in force for some time. However, I believe that there has been a high level of compliance with those regulations which are already in place, which have limited sale, supply and use of home-produced and imported pesticides to approved products, imposed new controls on aerial spraying, and led to additional information being given in advertisements for pesticides.

In addition, the Advisory Committee for Pesticides has been given statutory authority and its advisory panels opened to both sides of industry. Antifouling paints have been brought within the scope of the regulations from 1 July 1987. Companies submitting new pesticides for approval must now establish efficacy and, where appropriate, humaneness, and co-operate in the preparation of publicly available evaluations of safety and efficacy data. The existence of the regulations has also greatly facilitated recent control actions against certain pesticides which cause concern on both health and environmental grounds, and there has been an important increase in the training of pesticide operators and distributors in anticipation of the certification deadlines established under the regulations. Further regulations have been proposed to limit pesticide residues in crops, food and feedingstuffs.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost to the Housing Corporation of building a place in a hostel managed by a housing association.

Mr. Waldegrave: In 1986-87 the average cost was £24,060 per bedspace.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost to the Housing Corporation of maintaining a place in a hostel managed by a housing association.

Mr. Waldegrave: In 1986-87, £6·6 million in hostel deficit grant was paid by the Department of the Environment to 88 housing associations. The average grant per bedspace is not readily available.

Polychlorinated Biphenyls

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if estimates are available of the amount of dioxin in parts per million formed during the high-temperature incineration of polychlorinated biphenyls.

Mr. Moynihan: Trials have demonstrated that the amount of dibenzodioxins and dibenzofurans emitted as a result of high temperature incineration of PCBs by continuous liquid feed is constistently less than one part in 10^{12} (that is one in a million million) in stack gases.

Play Areas

Dame Peggy Fenner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if his Department issues recommendations or guidelines on safe surfaces in children's play or recreation areas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Department issued guidance to local authorities on safety in children's playgrounds in 1978. This advice, which recommended the use of impact-absorbing surface materials under play equipment, was consolidated by British Standard 5696. A new British Standard is currently being drawn up.

Shorthold

Mr. Livingstone asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information his Department collects on a regular basis concerning the operation of the shorthold tenancy scheme;

(2) what is his Department's latest available information concerning (a) the proportion of shorthold tenancies with and without regulated rents and (b) the average rent in both categories (i) in Greater London and (ii) elsewhere in England;

(3) what is the proportion of shorthold lettings to date, which have been in property (a) previously vacant, (b) previously let under a non-shorthold regulated tenancy, and (c) previously let under a shorthold tenancy (i) in Greater London and (ii) elsewhere in England;

(4) what is (a) the proportion of shorthold lettings to date, which were initially for (i) a year, (ii) more than a year, but not more than two years, (iii) more than two years, but not more than three years, (iv) more than three years, but not more than four years, and (v) more than four years, and up to five years and (b) the proportion of shorthold lettings to date which have subsequently been renewed (i) in Greater London and (ii) elsewhere in England.

Mr. Waldegrave: Over 5,000 protected shorthold tenancies were created in England and Wales in 1981, the first year after shorthold was introduced. Information about shortholds created since 1 December 1981, when the compulsory rent registration requirement for new shortholds outside Greater London was lifted, has not been collected. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys produced a report for the Department in 1986, "Recent Private Lettings 1982-84", based on a small sample of 704 occupiers and 543 landlords. This indicated that 14 per cent. of new lettings in England were shortholds; in Greater London the proportion was 8 per cent. The technical report on the survey, to be published later this year, will contain information on the rents for shorthold lettings, though not in the detail requested by the hon. Member.

Urban Development Grant

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what criteria are used in the provision of urban development grants.

Mr. Trippier: Urban development grant is available to support projects which will contribute to the economic and physical regeneration of inner urban areas by bringing about additional private sector capital investment in these areas but which would not be commercially viable without some assistance from the public sector. Priority is given to projects in the areas of those local authorities which have been invited to submit inner area programmes. The criteria for approval of grant, and the procedure by which applications are appraised, are set out in more detail in the Department's explanatory leaflet, a copy of which I am sending to the hon. Member.

Local Regiments (Freedom of City)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to allow district councils to grant freedom to local regiments or other armed forces units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: Section 249(5) of the Local Government Act 1972 already provides that district councils having the status of a city, borough or royal borough may confer honorary freedom on persons of distinction and persons who have rendered eminent services to the city, borough or royal borough. I understand that some boroughs have in the past exercised the power under section 249(5) in favour of local regiments but the interpretation of the powers conferred by section 249(5) is for the courts rather than Ministers.

Housing Statistics

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment for each of the last 10 years in England and Wales, what percentage of (a) newly constructed houses and (b) renovation of older houses has been undertaken by local authorities; and what percentage by private developers.

Mr. Waldegrave: Following are the percentages of new dwelling completions in England for local authorities and new towns and the percentages for private owners; while most private housebuilding is for owner occupation, this is generally carried out by private developers.

Housing and completions, England

	Local authorities and new towns	Private sector
		per cent. of all completions
1977	43·7	46·5
1978	38·2	52·8
1979	35·3	56·5
1980	36·5	53·8
1981	32·2	57·8
1982	21·0	71·6
1983	17·5	74·3
1984	16·5	75·7
1985	14·2	79·0
1986	11·1	82·9

Note: Other completions are for housing associations and Government Departments.

While information is available on the numbers of local authority dwellings on which improvement work is carried out each quarter, for the private sector only the number of grant-aided renovations are reported. Private developers may receive such grants if the dwellings are to be available for renting for at least five years, in which case they will be included in the reported numbers of grants paid to landlords (including housing associations) which have been about 16 per cent. of the grants paid in England in the 10-year period.

For information on housebuilding and renovations in Wales, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Private Sector Housing

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what financial inducements are available to private sector developers to generate housing investment in areas designated by his Department as stress areas or deprived inner-city areas.

Mr. Waldegrave: Urban development grant is available for private sector developments which benefit run-down urban areas. Priority is given to schemes from 57 inner area programme authorities. UDG meets the difference between the cost of a scheme and its value. So far, out of a total of 247 approved UDG schemes, 73 have been housing projects, these involve grant of £33 million and private investment of £115 million.

We have also recently introduced urban regeneration grant, under which assistance can be given direct to private sector developers with proposals for the reclamation and redevelopment of large urban sites, or for the refurbishment of very large buildings or group of buildings, for housing and other purposes.

We have enabled housing associations to combine housing association grant and private finance to develop rented housing schemes; it is hoped to draw some £70 million of private investment into such activity in the current financial year, a substantial proportion of which will be spent in inner city areas. The Local Government (No. 2) Bill will give local authorities an explicit new power to provide assistance for private rented accommodation, subject to the Secretary's of State's consent.

Estate action allocates resources to improve the environment and surroundings of run down housing estates. This helps those areas attract private skills and resources in investment in new housing and refurbishment.

We have identified, and made public, details of the thousands of acres of land owned by public bodies and currently lying idle. The land registers, on which this land is entered, are a useful source of information to private developers and my right hon. Friend has invited anyone interested in bringing any of this land back into use to ask him to use the statutory powers available to direct the owner to sell the land.

Urban development corporations and the derelict land programme may also remove obstacles to the development of new housing.

Local Authority Housing

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state (a) in general terms, and (b) by individual local authority, the percentage of the cost of construction of new local authority housing borne (i) by the ratepayer and (ii) by the taxpayer in England and Wales for each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities finance capital expenditure primarily from capital receipts or borrowing. Loan charges on borrowing attributable to the construction of new housing are debited to an authority's housing revenue account. Payments of exchequer subsidy, and the rate fund contributions made by local authorities themselves, are both related essentially to the overall position rather than to particular items of expenditure. In 1985-86 about half the 366 local housing authorities in England made a rate fund contribution, and 99 qualified for exchequer subsidy. Under the present housing subsidy system, which came into operation in 1981-82, the calculation determining an authority's entitlement to subsidy includes 75 per cent. of the actual or notional loan charges on the admissible costs of any new construction it undertakes.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the total number of empty local authority houses in each individual local authority area in England and Wales making up the total number of currently empty local authority houses.

Mr. Waldegrave: The latest available figures for English authorities are those for 1 April 1986 from their 1986 housing investment programme returns. The figures appear in column A81 of the "HIP1 (1986) All items print" which is in the Library. For information on Welsh authorities, I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Housing Waiting Lists

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what information he has as to the number of applicants on local authority housing waiting lists who have made multiple applications in different local authority areas;

(2) if he will list for each local authority in England and Wales the number of people on council housing waiting lists; and if he has any information to indicate how many of these people are on the waiting lists of other local authorities.

Mr. Waldegrave: The latest available information on the number of households on housing waiting lists is for April 1986 and it was provided by English local authorities in their 1986 housing investment programme returns: the figures appear in column B51 of the "HIP1 (1986) All items print" which is in the Library. Unfortunately, information is not available centrally on the number of applicants on the waiting lists of more than one authority.

For information on Welsh authorities I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Homeless Persons

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each local authority area in England and Wales the number of homes made available to people under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act for each of the last five years; and what percentage this represented of the total number of houses available for new tenants for each year.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities provide information on lettings to new tenants in their annual housing investment programme returns. The table gives for each English authority for each of the five years to 1985-86, the number of dwellings let to homeless households in priority need and the percentage this represents of all dwellings let to new tenants. The figures for 1981-82 and 1982-83 are for secure new tenancies only, while the later figures include also non-secure tenancies.

In fulfilling their duties to secure accommodation for homeless households in priority need, authorities also make nominations for housing in other areas under mobility schemes and for tenancies with housing associations and new towns, and find accommodation in the private sector.

For the position in Wales, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities in England and Wales which have been required to provide homes for people who have declared themselves homeless under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act.

Mr. Waldegrave: Every local housing authority in England has reported accepting responsibility for securing accommodation for some households under the provisions of the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act 1977 now contained in the Housing Act 1985. For the position in Wales, I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to those areas from which people applying for housing under the Housing (Homeless Persons) Act have emanated.

Mr. Waldegrave: Local authorities provide summary information on the whereabouts one year previously of the households for which they have accepted responsibility to secure accommodation. The latest estimates are for acceptances by all English local authorities in the first quarter of 1987 and are as follows:

Whereabouts one year ago	Per cent.
Within Great Britain:
same district or borough	86
different district or borough	11
Outside Great Britain	3

Derelict Local Authority Property

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to legalise the process whereby people occupy derelict local authority property which has been empty for more than six months, provided they are willing to renovate the property themselves at their own expense.

Mr. Waldegrave: My right hon. Friend has, at present, no plans to legalise squatting.

Homesteading (Empty Housing)

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will introduce legislation to legalise homesteading in local authority houses which have been empty for six months or more; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: "Homesteading" (selling unimproved properties for improvement by the purchaser) is already legal. My right hon. Friend has given his general consent under section 32 of the Housing Act 1985 to enable authorities to pursue homesteading policies.

Rural Areas (Services)

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will explain the institutional and functional relationship between the Development Commission and Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas; and how this will meet the increasing demand for their services in the rural areas.

Mr. Moynihan: The Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas is a company limited by guarantee, which is wholly funded by the Development Commission. Its role is to promote the economic development of rural areas in England in accordance with the powers and policies of the Development Commission. The Development Commission proposes to merge the commission and COSIRA, to enable it to be better placed to tackle the problems of rural areas. Staff and unions have been consulted on the proposals and are being kept fully informed.

Development Commission

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of staff employed by the Development Commission and Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas who work mainly outside London and Salisbury, in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: None of the Development Commission staff have worked outside London. The numbers of COSIRA staff working mainly outside London and Salisbury in the years 1978-87 are as follows:

	Number
1978	170
1979	193
1980	203
1981	179
1982	189
1983	191
1984	183
1985	202
1986	209
1987	208

In addition, COSIRA now employs 56 part-time consultants, who work mainly outside Salisbury.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the number of employees of (a) the Development Commission and (b) the Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas in each of the past 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The number of employees of the Development Commission and COSIRA in the last 10 financial years has been as follows:

Year	Development Commission	COSIRA
1978-79	38	316·5
1979-80	38	331
1980-81	35	310
1981-82	35	305
1982-83	37	303
1983-84	39	303
1984-85	44	303
1985-86	45	303
1986-87	45	308
1987-88	45	308

In addition, COSIRA now employs 56 part-time consultants on a regular basis.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional funds have been made available to the Development Commission and Council for Small Industries in Rural Areas under the Government's ALURE package in relation to the rural economy.

Mr. Moynihan: In the farming and rural enterprise package following ALURE the Government provided a further £1 million in 1987/88 for the Development Commission. This was in addition to the increase of £2 million for 1987/88 which had previously been announced.

London Docklands Development Corporation

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will state the respective dates from which he has reappointed the chairman and five other members of the London Docklands Development Corporation until 31 October; and if he will make a statement concerning the relevant periods of reappointment.

Mr. Trippier: The chairman and four members of the London Docklands Development Corporation board were reappointed on 2 July. The chief executive was reappointed as a member on 7 July. These four-month extensions were designed to give my Department an opportunity to review the composition of the entire board.

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will tabulate in the Official Report the parcels of land vested by Order in-Council in the London Docklands Development Corporation; and for each state the date of vesting, the area in hectares and acres, the previous owner, the principal purposes for which each is now in use; and, where this is housing, the approximate number of rented or owner-occupied dwellings.

Mr. Trippier: I shall write to the hon. Member.

Pollution

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what are the current maximum levels of penalty and compensation, available in the case of pollution of natural water courses; and if he has any plans to review these levels

Mr. Moynihan: The maximum penalties which can be imposed by Magistrates for water pollution offences under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 part II, are fines not exceeding £2,000 and terms of imprisonment not exceeding three months in respect of each offence. On indictment there is no limit on the fine that may be imposed while the maximum term of imprisonment is two years. In addition, water authorities frequently incur cost in seeking to remedy the effects of pollution incidents and have powers, in these circumstances, to recover the costs from those responsible. Penalties for pollution offences are kept under regular review.

Radon Gas

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to complete the guidance on measures to be taken in areas where radon gas is a problem for the construction of new buildings.

Mr. Trippier: Full guidance will depend on the results of the two-year study being carried out by the Building Research Establishment. Meanwhile, my Department has held a meeting with building control officers in Devon and Cornwall. On the basis of information, they and the National House-Building Council are providing about common constructions in the region, and the best advice currently available, interim guidance will be made available in the autumn.

Bathing Water

Mr. Fearn asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to accept European Economic Community recommendations on standards of bathing water.

Mr. Moynihan: 391 bathing waters in the United Kingdom are accepted as being within the scope of Council directive 76/160/EEC. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, West (Mr. Waldegrave) announced on 30 April, at Column 186, the results for the 1986 survey of bathing waters in England, Northern Ireland and Wales. These showed that more than 60 per cent. of these waters already meet the directive's standards. Our intention is that all indentified waters should do so.

Cornwall (Beaches and Sewerage)

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how the South West water authority's plans to clean the beaches of Cornwall will be affected by the Government's proposals for privatisation; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how the South West water authority's plans to install and update sewerage systems in Cornwall will be affected by the Government's proposals for privatisation; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government propose that the water and sewerage functions of the water authorities will be transferred to new public limited companies, which will then be offered for sale. It will be for the companies to determine their own investment programmes, taking account of their obligations under domestic and European Community legislation and of the limits which will be placed on their permitted level of charges increases.

Planning Zones

Mr. Ian Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what progress is being made towards the introduction of simplified planning zones.

Mr. Waldegrave: I am today issuing for comment draft regulations which prescribe procedures for preparing simplified planning zones, together with a draft circular and advice note.

Simplified planning zones are based on the planning regime successfully pioneered in enterprise zones. They provide planning authorities with a new method of attracting private investment to areas in need of development or regeneration. For developers and landowners, they provide the certainty of knowing what types of development can be carried out in an area. They save the authority and developers the work and expense involved in making and processing individual planning applications. Simplified planning zones cannot be introduced in national parks, AONBs, SSSIs, conservation areas, or approved green belt. Proposals for setting up SPZs have to be advertised and those who wish to object to these proposals have the opportunity to do so. Where necessary a public local inquiry is held by an independent inspector.

The drafts are being sent to the local authority associations and others for comment by 15 September 1987. Copies of the consultation letter and the drafts are being placed in the Library.

Acid Rain

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, in view of the recent report of the United Nations co-operation programme for the monitoring and evaluating of long-term transmission of air pollutants in Europe, whether he will conduct an urgent review of the evidence of serious damage to conifer trees in Britain by acid rain.

Mr. Moynihan: The Department already undertakes regular reviews of the state of tree health in the United Kingdom in consultation with the Forestry Commission, the Nature Conservancy Council, the Natural Environment Research Council and the Friends of the Earth.

31. Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on his Department's proposals to reduce acid rain.

Mr. Moynihan: We aim to reduce emissions of sulpher dioxide (SO_2) and nitrogen oxides (NOx) by 30 per cent. on 1980 levels, by the end of the 1990s. To facilitate this, we have endorsed plans by the Central Electricity Generating Board to retrofit three major coal-fired power stations with flue gas desulphurisation equipment, and to fit all 12 coal-fired power stations with low NOx burners. All new fossil-fuel fired power stations will also be equipped with the technology to abate acid emissions.

"Paying for Local Government"

Mr. Alfred Morris asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration has been given to the views of Co-operative Union Ltd. on the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government", what response was made; and if he will now make a statement about the views expressed.

Mr. Howard: We considered all the comments received in response to the proposals in the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714). The Co-operative Union Ltd. was sent an official acknowledgement to that effect. The Government have responded generally to these representations by confirming their intention of proceeding with the main proposals; by changing some of the operating procedures for the community charge and by announcing transitional arrangements for the move to a national non-domestic rate poundage. We are still considering other aspects of the responses.

73. Mr. Eastham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will now publish all the responses received by him in response to "Paying for Local Government", Cmnd. 9714.

Mr. Chope: I do not have the permission of those who submitted comments to publish their views. But my right hon. Friend placed a summary of the responses we received in the Library on 15 December 1986.

Water Supplies

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what (a) grants and (b) loans are available from Her Majesty's Government to (i) commercial and (ii) charitable private water undertakings to bring their supplies up to EEC standards.

Mr. Moynihan: Grants are available under the Rural Water Supplies and Sewerage Acts towards the cost of first time connection to mains water supplies. These are payable to water authorities to reduce the cost to local authorities or private bodies requisitioning schemes. In some instances local authorities may be able to give home improvement grants to improve private water supplies within the curtilage of the property. Local authority assistance may also be given under the Building Act 1984 and Public Health Act 1936. Loans are not available from the Government for this purpose.

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what (a) grants and (b) loans are available from the European Communities to private water undertakings to bring their supplies up to EEC standards.

Mr. Moynihan: Grants of up to 50 per cent. from the European regional development fund are available to statutory water companies towards cost of infrastructure projects. To be eligible for grant, projects must be located within an assisted area, and must contribute to, or enhance the prospects for, regional development through the expansion or regeneration of industry or by encouraging tourism. Loans are not available from the EC for this purpose.

Mr. Livsey asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration is being given in the preparation of legislation for the privatisation of the publicly owned water authorities to the position of communities already served by small private water undertakings.

Mr. Moynihan: The privatisation proposals for the water industry will have little effect themselves on the position of private water supplies. The regulation of such supplies, in so far as it is required under the Water Recources Act 1963, will be transferred from the present water authorities to the proposed National Rivers Authority. However, the Government intend in the privatisation Bill to strengthen the application of the EC drinking water directive to private water supplies. This was the subject of a consultation paper, which the Government published in February 1986.

33. Mr. Chris Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what efforts the Government are making to enable the quality of the water supplied in England and Wales to comply with European Economic Community requirements with regard to nitrate levels.

Mr. Moynihan: The Government support efforts by water undertakers to keep nitrate concentrations in water supplies below the limit in the EC drinking water directive. Where supplies exceed that limit, derogations have been given provided that the supply does not exceed 80 milligrams of nitrate per litre on a three-monthly average and a maximum of 100 mg per litre. This is consistent with advice received from the Chief Medical Officer. The Government are looking carefully at the recommendations for limiting nitrate levels in drinking water which were included in the report of the nitrate co-ordination group published in December 1986.

60. Mr. Haynes asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what safeguards are proposed to ensure the quality of water supplied to domestic users if his proposals for the sale of water authority services in England and Wales are implemented.

Mr. Moynihan: Ensuring the quality of drinking water supplies will remain the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, and of the local authorities, who will continue their monitoring role. Under the privatisation legislation, we propose to take powers to clarify and strengthen the legal basis for drinking water quality standards, including those standards required by the EC drinking water directive. This was the subject of a consultation paper which the Government published in May 1986.

76. Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number of domestic users in England and Wales presently receiving water supplies with nitrate levels in excess of 50 milligrams per litre.

Mr. Moynihan: Some 950,000 people are supplied with water with nitrate levels in excess of 50 milligrams per litre.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 16 July 1987

PRIME MINISTER

Scottish Parliamentary Business

Q18. Dr. Godman asked the Prime Minister what plans she has to reconsider the present basis for treatment of Scottish business in the House.

The Lord Privy Seal: I have been asked to reply.

The arrangements for Scottish business are being handled in the usual way.

Foreign Policy (Office Staff)

Q23. Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister how many officials in No. 10 Downing street had responsibility for foreign policy issues in (a) May 1979, (b) June 1983 and (c) June 1987.

The Prime Minister: On each of the dates there was one official in No. 10 Downing street with responsibility for foreign policy issues. In addition, there was one special adviser in June 1983 and June 1987 with responsibility for advising on foreign policy issues.

Isle of Thanet

Q30. Mr. Gale asked the Prime Minister when she expects to receive the report of the joint committee studying the economic development of the Isle of Thanet.

The Prime Minister: The joint committee is due to report by the end of September.

Scottish Devolution

Q32. Mr. David Marshall asked the Prime Minister if she plans to take any steps to seek to ascertain the extent of demand for devolution in Scotland.

The Prime Minister: The Government have no plans to do so.

Bradford, South

Q52. Mr. Cryer asked the Prime Minister when she next intends to visit Bradford, South.

The Prime Minister: I have at present no plans to do so.

Armed Forces (Pay)

Mr. Leigh asked the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the pay of medical and dental officers in the armed forces.

The Prime Minister: The Armed Forces Pay Review Body has submitted to me a supplementary report on the pay of medical and dental officers in the armed forces. It recommends increases of between 5·5 and 7·6 per cent. according to rank with effect from 1 April 1987.

These awards are derived as usual from those to civilian doctors and dentists that I announced in the House on 23 April 1987, at column 655, and the Government have decided to accept them in full.

The report has been published as Command 176 and copies are available in the Vote Office.

Engagements

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 16 July.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House I shall be having further meetings later today, before departing for Washington this evening.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Post-School Activity

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the post-school activity, by social class, in terms of full-time employment, unemployment or YTS, full-time further education and other activities by number and percentage for each social class, in the latest available year; and what were the corresponding figures for 1980.

Mr. Dunn: Information from the youth cohort study, a series of longitudinal surveys of young people aged 16 to 18, jointly sponsored by the Manpower Services Commission, the Department of Education and Science and the Department of Employment, is shown in the table. The percentages are of a sample of 14,000 young people in spring 1986 who had reached school leaving age in maintained schools in England and Wales in the academic year 1984-85.

	Social background
	All	Non-Manual		Manual			Unclassified[1]
		Professional	Other	Skilled	Semi-skilled	Unskilled
Percentage from each social background	100	15	14	41	12	3	15
Percentage within each social background who in Spring 1986 were:
in full-time education	39	62	54	33	29	26	27
in full-time employment	22	19	18	25	24	21	20

	All	Social background
		Non-Manual		Manual			Unclassified [1]
		Professional	Other	Skilled	Semi-skilled	Unskilled
in YTS	28	15	21	32	33	34	33
out of work	10	3	5	9	12	15	19
other	1	1	1	2	2	3	1
TOTAL	100	100	100	100	100	100	100

[1] The unclassified category includes those reporting a miscellaneous group of occupations, and those who did not state their parental background or who gave an incomplete response.

Corresponding information of the participation of young people analysed by social class is not available for 1980. Estimates of the numbers of young people in 1986 in the categories shown above could be derived from the percentages quoted but the sampling and other errors would give rise to large margins of uncertainty.

Schools (Reorganisation)

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will publish details of the scheme for schools opting out of their local authority education system.

Mr. Dunn: The Government intend to issue shortly a consultative document which will give details of the possible shape and nature of the scheme.

Mr. Colvin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether the scheme for schools to opt out of their local education authority system will be applicable to primary schools with fewer than 100 pupils.

Mr. Dunn: The Government intend that initially the scheme should apply to secondary schools and to primary schools with more than 300 pupils. We shall be prepared to consider its possible extension to smaller primary schools at a later date.

School Defects

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science which Ministers have visited Bradford to examine school defects; if he will list the schools and the dates of the visits since 1983; whether officials have submitted reports on the state of Bradford schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dunn: The previous holder of my right hon. Friend's office visited Bradford on 20 and 21 September 1984 as part of his general programme of visits to local education authorities. In the course of that engagement he visited the following schools on 21 September 1984:

Waverley Middle School
Grange Upper School—Skills Foundation Centre
Tong and Yorkshire Martyrs comprehensive Schools—TVEI Unit
Whetley First School

In addition, I visited the following Bradford schools on 16 October 1986 at the invitation of the constituency Member:

Wellington First School
Pollard Park Middle School
Thornbury First School
Bradford Moor First School
Lapage Middle School

Records of those visits, of visits by officials and material submitted by the Bradford local education authority are available to my right hon. Friend.

Welsh Language Teaching

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will place in the Library a copy of the University Grants Committee's formula and the special recognition made therein for Welsh medium teaching referred to by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) on 30 April, Official Report, column 469.

Mr. Jackson: The UGC's current resources allocation process is described in circular letters of 19 November 1985 and 20 May 1986. Copies of both are in the Library. The UGC takes account of the cost of Welsh-medium teaching as a special factor but does not identify this as a separate element in the block grant for each relevant university institution. In addition, a separate block grant allocation is made for the University of Wales registry.

Merseyside

Mr. Ron Davies asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the sums allocated under each education support grant heading to the local education authorities on Merseyside for 1986-87 and 1987-88.

Mrs. Rumbold: The information requested is given in the following tables:

Expenditure supported through Education Support Grants
(a) in 1986-87

	Knowsley (£000s)	Liverpool (£000s)	St. Helens (£000s)	Sefton (£000s)	Wirral (£000s)	Total (£000s)
Teaching of Mathematics in Schools	37·5	91·0	40·6	52·7	53·9	275·7

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Social Security Commissioner (Wales)

Mr. Win Griffiths asked the Attorney-General when the Lord Chancellor intends to appoint a successor to Mr. Roderic Browne QC as social security commissioner for Wales.

The Attorney-General: On 22 July 1986 the Lord Chancellor announced, at columns 120-23, the closure of the Cardiff office of the social security commissioners. I understand from my noble and learned Friend that between 1 April 1986 and 31 March 1987 commissioners sat only 17 days on oral hearings of appeals in Cardiff, and that he has no plans at present to appoint a social security commissioner resident in Wales. Oral hearings will continue to take place in Cardiff.

Legal Aid

Mr. McWilliam asked the Attorney-General if he will list the total sum expended on legal aid from each of the area offices over the last five years, together with the figure this represents per 10,000 of population for each area.

The Attorney-General: The total sums expended on legal advice and assistance (the green form scheme), "Assistance by Way of Representation", criminal legal aid in the magistrates' courts, the court duty solicitor scheme and the 24-hour duty solicitor scheme are as follows, by area office, together with the figure this represents per 10,000 of the population for each area. The magistrates' court duty solicitor scheme started in October 1983 and sums expended on it are included from 1984-85 onwards. The 24-hour duty solicitor scheme started in January 1986 and sums expended on it are included from 1985-86 onwards. Information is not obtainable without disproportionate cost for civil legal aid or for criminal legal aid in the higher courts.

WALES

Museums and Libraries

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the expenditure since 1976-77 (a) on museums and galleries in Wales, (b) on the Council for Museums in Wales and (c) any other expenditure on museums in Wales.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Expenditure on the Council of Museums in Wales from 1976-77 to 1986-87 was £1,403,000. Information about expenditure on museums and galleries in Wales (other than the National Museum of Wales) is not held centrally.

Mr. Fisher asked the Secretary of State for Wales what expenditure has been made since 1976-77 on (a) the national museum of Wales, and (b) the national library of Wales, in respect of capital expenditure, revenue costs and purchase grants.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Expenditure on the National Museum of Wales and the National Library of Wales between 1976-77 and 1986-87 was as follows:

	National Museum £	National Library £
Net salaries/general administrative expenditure	44,030,000	17,000,000
Purchase grants	7,109,000	3,267,000
Capital	7,347,000	5,215,000
Total	58,486,000	25,482,000

Note:
Outturn in 1986-87 is provisional.

Higher Education

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the present membership and period of office of the committee of the Welsh advisory body for local authority higher education.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The committee of the Wales advisory body for local authority higher education consists of four members nominated by the Welsh Counties Committee and four members nominated by the Welsh joint education committee. It is chaired by myself. Members are not appointed for a specific period of office. The current membership is as follows:

Nominated by the Welsh Counties Committee:
Councillor E. Currie Jones CBE
Councillor J. Griffiths
Councillor J. A. Harries CBE
Councillor J. E. Roberts

Nominated by the Welsh Joint Education Committee:
Councillor G. Jenkins
Councillor W. A. Jones
Councillor F. J. Kingdom
Councillor P. Squire CBE

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the dates for 1987 of the proposed meetings of the committee of the Welsh advisory body for local authority higher education.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The committee is due to meet on 6 November 1987 and 11 December 1987.

Milk

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales whether he will consider exempting the first 200,000 litres per annum of themilk for milk producers in Wales from controls on production; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Walker: No. The problems of small producers have already been recognised by restoring them to their base year production levels.

SCOTLAND

Charities (Rate Relief)

Mr. Andrew Welsh asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make provision for preserving the existing rate relief for charities in the form of a discount from collective community charges; what estimates he has of the effects of the community charge proposals on churches and charities in Scotland; and what representations he has received on this matter.

Mr. Lang: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 6 July to the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Steel) at columns 28-29.

My right hon. and learned Friend has made no estimate of the effects of the community charge proposals on churches and charities in Scotland. He has received 32 representations from church organisations and individual churches, and some 50 further representations from other charities, about the implications for them of the community charge proposals.

Police (Lothian and Borders)

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from the Lothian and Borders police board on the level of the establishment of the Lothian and Borders police force.

Mr. Rifkind: The board wrote to my Department on 1 June indicating that it had in mind to submit an application for an increase in the force establishment in due course. The application has not yet been received.

Mr. Steel asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the level of establishment of the Lothian and Borders police force in each year since 1975.

Mr. Rifkind: The establishment of the Lothian and Borders police force since 1975 is as follows:

31 March	Police Establishment
1975[1]	2,368
1976	2,368
1977	2,368
1978	2,361
1979	2,361
1980	2,361
1981	2,362
1982	2,362
1983	2,362
1984	2,386
1985	2,395
1986	2,395
1987	2,393

[1] The 1975 figure is at 30 June, following reorganisation.

Although the police establishment has increased by only 25 officers since 1975, a civilisation programme has released a further 85 officers for operational duties.

Forestry Commission

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Forestry Commission to discuss tree-planting policy.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. and learned Friend meets the chairman of the Forestry Commission from time to time, but he has no plans at present to meet him to discuss this subject.

Cold Water Fibrosis

Mr. Charles Morrison asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has made of the threat to Scottish rivers from the salmon disease cold water fibrosis in the light of damage already caused to Norwegian rivers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My information is that although this disease has led to mortalities in farmed salmon in Norway it has not affected wild stocks.

Although there have been two outbreaks in Scotland affecting farmed salmon the disease is very restricted and there is no immediate cause for concern to wild or farmed stocks. The marine laboratory at the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland is continuing, however, to monitor the situation.

The Diseases of Fish Act 1937 prohibits the import into Great Britain of live salmon and trout and this safeguards against the more obvious risks of disease being introduced to native stocks.

Road Accident Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) what statistical information he has, on an annual basis, covering the number of drivers and passengers killed in motor vehicle accidents where consumption of alcohol by one or more of the drivers is shown to be a significant factor;

(2) what statistical information he has, on an annual basis, regarding the number of pedestrians killed or injured by motor vehicles where consumption of alcohol by a driver is shown to be a significant factor;

(3) what statistical information he has, on an annual basis, regarding the number of cyclists killed or injured by motor vehicles where consumption of alcohol by a driver is shown to be a significant factor;

(4) what information he has regarding the periods of the day in Scotland when road accidents in which alcohol is a contributory factor are most likely to occur.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Statistics of road users killed or injured in accidents in which alcohol was a significant factor are not available. However, the results of breath tests which motor vehicle drivers or riders may be required to undertake after being involved in an injury road accident are included in standard statistical returns held centrally. The table shows casualties associated with accidents in which at least one driver or rider failed a breath test in 1986:

Casualties	Severity of Injury
	Fatal	Serious	Slight	Total
Motor vehicle drivers/riders	7	250	594	851
Motor vehicle passengers	16	221	421	658

Casualties	Severity of Injury: Fatal	Serious	Slight	Total
Pedestrians	11	63	74	148
Pedal cyclists	0	1	3	4
TOTAL	34	535	1,092	1,661

The number of drivers and riders involved in injury road accidents, the number breath-tested, and the number of failures at different times of the day are given in table 15 of "Road Accidents, Scotland 1986", published today by the Government Statistical Service.

Information about the blood alcohol concentrations of a limited number of road users aged 16 or more who died within 12 hours of involvement in a road accident is also available: and inferences from these statistics as regards the numbers of deaths of car travellers and pedestrians in which alcohol was a factor are to be found in paragraphs 5.4 and 5.5 of "Road Accidents, Scotland 1986".

Labour Statistics

Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish figures showing unemployment by age group in Greenock and Port Glasgow.

Mr. Lang: On 9 April 1987 (the latest date for which information is available) the number of unemployed claimants by age group in the Greenock and Port Glasgow parliamentary constituency was as shown in the table.

Age Group	Unemployed Claimants
Under 17	154
Aged 17	275
18	379
19	339
20-24	1,703
25-29	1,230
30-34	932
35-39	791
40-44	746
45-49	714
50-54	626
55-59	603
60 and over	84
TOTAL	8,567

This information is available in the Library.

Electricity Industry (Privatisation)

Mr. Salmond asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the reasons for the deadline for the submission of tenders from merchant banks to handle the privatisation of the Scottish electricity boards and the North of Scotland Hydro Electric Board.

Mr. Lang: In bringing forward proposals for the privatisation of the electricity supply industry in Scotland many complex issues arise on which expert financial advice is required at the earliest possible stage.

Gualin National Nature Reserve

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has as to whether the agreement between the Nature Conservancy Council and the owners of Gualin national nature reserve permits vehicular access through the reserve for the purposes of letting fishing to third parties.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I understand that the agreement between the Nature Conservancy Council and the owners of Gualin national nature reserve does not expressly provide for, or on the other hand prohibit, vehicular access through the reserve for fishing purposes.

AIDS

Mr. Bill Walker asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the Government have any plans for the setting up of AIDS units in Scotland.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: We have decided to set aside funds within the health programme to enable hospital units to be established in Edinburgh, Glasgow and Dundee to care for AIDS patients. The health boards concerned are being asked to submit detailed plans, including costings, as soon as possible and we shall be making specific allocations to meet additional capital and running costs in 1988-89, 1989-90 and 1990-91 of 15-bed units in Edinburgh and Glasgow and a 10-bed unit in Dundee.

In reaching the view that these units should be set up, we have taken account of the recommendations of the working party under the general manager of Lothian health board which we set up last November to examine the health service implications of HIV infection in Scotland. The Government's response to the report has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses and is being sent to all health boards asking them to take account of the recommendations in their forward planning for AIDS and HIV infection.

Sheep Annual Premium

Sir Hector Monro asked the Secretary of State for Scotland whether any progress has been made in obtaining the agreement of the European Community to the payment to Scottish crofters and farmers of sheep annual premium on untupped shearlings.

Mr. Rifkind: I am pleased that the Government's persistence has been rewarded by the agreement at a recent meeting of the Council of Agriculture Ministers of the European Community that crofters and farmers who keep untupped shearlings of specified breeds in certain areas of north and north west Scotland should in future be eligible to claim sheep annual premium on these animals. This decision will come as welcome news to the producers concerned, who farm in a very harsh environment.

Scottish Development Agency (Grant Aid)

Mr. Dewar asked the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the total numbers of applications for grant-aid made to the Scottish Development Agency in each year since 1979 and the number and percentage of these which were accepted in each year.

Mr. Rifkind [pursuant to his reply, 6 July 1987, c. 33]: Applications for grant-aid under the development of rural area workshops, programme for rural initiatives and developments and the local enterprise grants for urban projects (the agency's current recognised schemes of grant assistance), together with development grants to, for example, enterprise trusts, the training and employment grant scheme and better business scheme, are as set out in the table. Details of applications before 1983-84, prior to the inception of the grant schemes, are not available, but it is understood these were few in number.

Year	Applications	Approved
		Number	per cent.
1983-84	1,169	208	17·8
1984-85	1,611	276	17·1
1985-86	7,857	2,120	27·0
1986-87	11,671	3,455	29·6

The apparent high percentage rate of applications refused is accounted for by the large number of inquiries for assistance under TEGS which do not result in formal applications because they do not meet the geographical, unemployment or age criteria. A number are also turned down because the firm is unable to provide training of the desired quality or is already in receipt of public sector assistance.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what percentage of local government expenditure in England and Wales is represented by spending on education other than the payment of teachers' salaries;

(2) what percentage of local government expenditure in England and Wales is represented by the payment of teachers' salaries.

Mr. Chope: In 1985-86 local government expenditure in England and Wales on teachers' salaries amounted to 22 per cent. of local authority gross spending on the rate fund revenue account. On education other than the payment of teachers' salaries and excluding school meals and milk it amounted to 21 per cent.

Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of local government income in England and Wales comprises funds provided by central Government.

Mr. Chope: In 1985-86 Government grants and subsidies accounted for 43 per cent. of local government gross income from all accounts, in England and Wales.

Professional Boxers

Mr. Hayward asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has made to the British Boxing Board of Control regarding the board's powers over professional boxers licensed by the board.

Mr. Moynihan: I have drawn to the British Boxing Board of Control's attention my concern over apparent mismatches in bouts involving British boxers. The board shares my concern. All boxers licensed in Britain have to reach very high standards of all round fitness and their licences are subject to annual re-examination. Every effort is made by the board to ensure that opponents are fairly matched. This is a matter for constant review by the board, which is now conducting a survey of the standard of foreign boxers being allowed to compete in Britain.

British boxers must seek written permission from the board before taking part in a contest overseas. The record of the intended opponent is checked before permission is granted and a number of requests by British boxers to compete abroad have been turned down in recent months. In addition, the board has decided that if in the future it is concerned that an intended opponent for a British boxer is not of a sufficiently high standard it will convey that concern to the commission under whose jurisdiction the contest is taking place.

Every British boxer travelling abroad must have the international licence which has been developed by the World Boxing Council, largely at the instigation of the British board. I share the board's hope that this licence will become accepted worldwide and that all countries will adopt safety standards in line with those applied in Britain.

Nottingham

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by classification those projects approved and rejected for the Nottingham inner area programme for 1987-88.

Mr. Trippier: A list of newly-approved and rejected projects is as follows, classified by the four main urban programme objectives. In addition, projects deferred for further consideration are listed.

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the rate support grant for each of the years from 1979 in constant prices for the city of Nottingham.

Mr. Chope: The figures requested are provided in the table:

	£ million
1979-80	29·157
1980-81	27·055
1981-82	14·953
1982-83	14·805
1983-84	16·018
1984-85	15·021
1985-86	16·404
1986-87	15·361
1987-88	15·852

Notes:

i. For 1979-80 and 1980-81, rate support grant comprised needs and resources elements and domestic rate relief grant, and was not paid on a basis comparable with later years.

ii. From 1981-82 onwards, rate support grant comprises block grant and domestic rate relief grant.

iii. The rate support grant figures for the years 1979-80 to 1982-83 are final entitlements. The domestic rate relief grant elements for 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86 are also final entitlements; those for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are first estimates. The block grant elements for 1983-84, 1984-85 and 1985-86 are entitlements after holdback based upon provisional outturn; those for 1986-87 and 1987-88 are entitlements based on budgets.

iv. The figures are expressed in 1987-88 prices using the GDP

Beechdale Engineering, Nottingham

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in favour of an urban development grant to assist Beechdale Engineering, Nottingham to relocate to the Blenheim industrial estate, Bulwell.

Mr. Trippier: None.

Empty Houses (London)

Mr. John Marshall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how many council-owned houses and flats are vacant in each of the London boroughs.

Mr. Waldegrave: The latest available information is for 1 April 1986 and was provided by London boroughs in their 1986 housing investment programme returns. The figures for each authority's vacant dwellings within its own area, including any awaiting demolition, appear in columns A99 and A97, respectively, of the "HIP1 (1986) All items print" which is in the Library.

Rent Arrears (London)

Mr. John Marshall asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the level of rent arrears in each of the London boroughs.

Mr. Waldegrave: The latest information available to this Department on rent arrears is for 1 April 1986 and it was supplied in local authorities housing subsidy claim forms. The figures for individual London boroughs are in the tables of "Local authority rent arrears (England) at April 1986", which were placed in the Library on 10 December 1986.

Rating Reform

Ms. Quin asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations the Government have had with local authorities in England and Wales concerning the introduction of the community charge.

Mr. Howard: 454 local authorities and associated bodies in England responded to the Green Paper "Paying for Local Government" (Cmnd. 9714). There have been discussions with the local authority associations in the Consultative Council on Local Government Finance and in a working group of officials set up under the auspices of CCLGF. My Department also has frequent contacts with individual local authorities, at both ministerial and official level, about the community charge.

I understand that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has conducted similar consultations with Welsh local authorities.

Council House Purchase, Southwark

Mr. Gerald Bowden asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has as to the reasons for delay in the purchase by Mr. and Mrs. Hunt of their council home at 16 Harfield gardens, Grove lane, S.E.5; and when he now expects Southwark council to complete the transaction.

Mr. Waldegrave: Mr. and Mrs. Hunt's purchase was originally held up by a dispute over their discount entitlement and then was further delayed while the council obtained counsel's opinion on the terms of the lease. I understand that a completion date of 17 August is now proposed.

Local Authority Housing (Midlands)

Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will provide a list of the number of local authority homes in each local authority in the east and west midlands which were considered to be in need of repair in each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: Information is not available in the form requested. The numbers of local authority dwellings which are unfit, fit but lacking basic amenities, and others needing major renovation are provided by local authorities in their annual housing investment programme returns. Figures appear in columns A31, A41, and A51 of the "HIP All items print" for 1984, 1985, and 1986, which are in the Library. For earlier years the corresponding figures appear in authorities' individual HIP returns, which are also in the Library.

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment how the Government intend to proceed with their proposals for the restructuring and privatisation of the water authorities in England and Wales.

Mr. Ridley: I have today published, together with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Wales and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food a policy and consultation paper entitled "The National Rivers Authority — a public regulatory body in a privatised water industry." This paper sets out our revised proposals for the restructuring of the water authorities, under which their utility functions of water supply, sewerage and sewage treatment and disposal, will be transferred to public limited companies, which will be offered for sale to the public; and their regulatory and river management functions will remain in the public sector and be given to a new National Rivers Authority. We consider that creating a regulatory body responsible for these functions and answerable to the Government will provide clear and comprehensible framework for the private sector operation of the utility functions which represent by far the largest part of water authorities' business.

The proposals set out in the paper published today are the result of much careful consideration, but there are a number of aspects on which we are keen to receive comment from interested parties. These include of course the water authorities themselves, and we shall consult them closely in taking the policy forward. We intend to make rapid progress in our consultations so that we can draw up and introduce the necessary legislation as soon as practicable.

Meanwhile, we are today introducing a Bill which will clarify the powers of the water authorities to prepare for the restructuring and privatisation which we propose for the industry, and also to facilitate the carrying-out of domestic metering trials.

I have arranged for copies of the policy and consultation paper to be deposited in the Library of the House.

Live Turtles

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields on 13 July about the implementation of CITES conferences resolution 2.12, how many live turtles have been imported into Grand Cayman from Nicaragua since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: I shall answer this question shortly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Inner City Task Forces

Ms. Armstrong asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what plans he has for the future of the inner city task forces.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I announced an expansion of the inner cities initiative to 16 task forces on 27 April 1987, at column 31. Leaders and other staff of the task forces are now being appointed and premises found in the city areas they cover. Task forces are intended to promote local initiative and to improve the targeting of Government programmes in the chosen area. We are not committed to 16—task forces will be ended when they have completed their work, and new ones formed in areas which appear promising for this kind of pilot initiative.

Rolls-Royce and British Airports Authority

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the titles of those newspapers in which advertisements for the offers of sale of shares in Rolls-Royce and British Airports Authority were placed.

Mr. Butcher: Public application forms for the sale of shares in Rolls-Royce plc were available in the following newspapers:

Rolls-Royce plc
Daily Mail
The Daily Telegraph
Financial Times
Guardian
The Independent
The Times
London Evening Standard
Glasgow Herald
The Scotsman
Mail on Sunday Observer
Sunday Telegraph
The Sunday Times
Birmingham Post
Coventry Evening Telegraph
Derby Evening Telegraph
Lancashire Evening Telegraph
Leicester Mercury
Liverpool Post
Manchester Evening News
Nottingham Evening Post
Sunderland Echo

Yorkshire Post

The sale of shares in BAA plc was the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Research Funding

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what is the comparison of gross domestic product at 1987 prices between (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the United States of America, (c) Japan, (d) West Germany and (e) France, of the amount allocated by each country to military research.

Mr. Butcher: The available information relates to Government funding of research and development for defence purposes in 1985 and is given in the table. For countries other than the United Kingdom the information is obtained from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development.

Government funding of R and D for defence purposes as a percentage of gross domestic product:

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what are the comparisons, as a percentage of gross domestic product at 1987 prices between (a) the United Kingdom, (b) the United States of America, (c) Japan, (d) West Germany and (e) France, for research funding in academic institutions by central Government and private industry.

Mr. Butcher: The available information for countries other than the United Kingdom relates to 1983 and is obtained from the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development. The data are shown in the table.

Textiles (US Trade Bill)

Mr. Latham asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what representations he has made to the Department of Commerce of the United States of America regarding the threat to the United Kingdom textile industry posed by the Textile and Apparel Trade Bill, currently before the Congress; and what reply he has received.

Mr. Alan Clark: When he was in Washington in March, the previous Secretary of State for Trade and Industry made clear to the United States Administration and to Members of Congress the United Kingdom Government's strong opposition to the Textile and Apparel Trade Bill. The United States Administration are also opposed to the Bill.

Mr. Rupert Murdoch

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what occasions during the past 12 months the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has met Mr. Rupert Murdoch.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. and noble Friend has met the proprietors of all the major newspaper publishing companies during the last 12 months. He last met Mr. Murdoch on 21 May 1987 at Wapping, when he was Secretary of State for Employment. This was their only meeting during the period.

News International Ltd.

Mr. Fisher asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what occasions during the past 12 months the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has visited News International Ltd. at Wapping.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My right hon. and Noble Friend has visited the News International plant at Wapping on only one occasion, when he was Secretary of State for Employment. This was on 21 May 1987.

Textiles (Statistics)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) if he will publish as a table in the Official Report the United Kingdom imports and exports of textiles and clothing from and to (a) other individual European Community countries, (b) the rest of the world and (c) the European Community for each year since 1970;

(2) what are the figures for imports and exports of textiles and clothing between the United Kingdom and, separately, the European Community and the rest of the world in real terms for each year since 1975.

Mr. Alan Clark: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what information he has regarding average unit labour costs in the textile and clothing industries of each country involved in the multi-fibre arrangement;

(2) if he will publish as a table in the Official Report the average hourly labour costs within the textile industries of Switzerland, Sweden, Denmark, Norway, West Germany, the Netherlands, Belgium, the United States of America, Italy, Japan, France, Austria, the United Kingdom, Hong Kong, South Korea, Taiwan, China, Macao and Thailand for the latest year for which figures are available, showing the costs in £ sterling and as an index with the United Kingdom as 100.

Mr. Alan Clark: This information is not collected by the Department and I can not readily identify a published source of the information to which the hon. Gentleman could be referred.

Toxic Household Goods (Safety)

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what regulations control the packaging of bleaches, weedkiller, drain cleaners and other toxic household goods to ensure the safety of children.

Mr. Maude: The Classification, Packaging and Labelling of Dangerous Substances Regulations 1984, which came into operation on 12 December 1984, set out packaging and labelling requirements for hazardous household chemicals to warn parents to keep them away from small children. The Child Resistant Packaging (Safety) Regulations 1986, which come into force on 1 December this year, prescribe child resistant packaging for the more hazardous household chemicals, including weedkiller, drain cleaner, oven cleaner, white spirit and paint stripper. Whilst ordinary household bleach is only classified as an "irritant" and child resistant containers are not therefore mandatory, I understand that many suppliers are now using them of their own volition. I welcome this responsible action.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Facsimile Machines

Mr. Heddle asked the Lord Privy Seal if he has any plans to introduce further facsimile machines for the use of right hon. and hon. Members.

Mr. Wakeham: No. Right hon. and hon. Members may make use of the facsimile transmission machine in the Central Lobby Post Office on repayment or, alternatively, they may purchase machines for their personal use from their secretarial allowance.

Ministers' Pay

Mr. Andy Stewart asked the Lord Privy Seal, if he will make a statement about Ministers' pay.

Mr. Wakeham: The salaries of Ministers and other paid office holders were last increased from 1 January 1987 under the terms of the Ministerial and Other Salaries Order 1983, and will remain at these levels until they are superseded by a new order. The Government have considered possible changes to ministerial salaries against the background of the 21·9 per cent. increase in the salaries of Members of Parliament that will take place on 1 January 1988 if the House decides to confirm the resolution of 26 July 1983 linking the parliamentary salary to a Civil Service pay scale. The Government do not consider that a similar percentage increase in the salaries of Ministers and other office holders would be justified. Instead, they propose that all Ministers and office holders should receive the same cash increase of £4,048 as Members of Parliament are due to receive from 1 January 1988. Ministers and other office holders in the House of Commons will receive an increase of £3,036 in their parliamentary salaries from 1 January 1988 under the terms of the resolution of 26 July 1983. It is proposed to award them cash increases of £1,012 in their ministerial salaries to bring their overall increase up to £4,048. The salaries of Ministers and other office holders in the House of Lords will also be increased by £4,048. The details are set out in the table. I have today laid the draft Ministerial and Other Salaries Order 1987 to implement these changes.

Notes:

(a) The Prime Minister has elected to receive the same salary as a Cabinet Minister in the House of Commons.

(b) The Lord Chancellor's salary is governed by the Lord Chancellor's Salary Order 1987 and is not affected by this order. (He receives £82,690 rising to £83,000 from 1 October 1987).

(c) The Solicitor-General for Scotland's salary has been adjusted because the holder of the office is no longer a Member of the House of Commons. His previous ministerial salary has been increased by the difference between the ministerial salaries of the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for England and Wales. Prior to 1981 the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for England and Wales received the same salary. However, from 1981 the Lord Advocate, who was no longer a Member of the Commons, benefited from the higher ministerial salary that Ministers in the Lords receive compared with their Commons counterparts. Now that the Solicitor-General for Scotland is not a Member of the House of Commons his previous ministerial salary will be increased by the differential between the ministerial salaries of the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor-General for England and Wales. If the holder of the office of Solicitor-General for Scotland were again to be a Member of the House of Commons this arrangement would lapse.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

2,4,5-T

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what restrictions apply to use of the weedkiller 2,4,5-T in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson: Products containing 2,4,5-T are approved for professional use for the control of weeds in pastures, on non-edible crops, as a pre-sowing, pre-planting or post-crop emergence herbicide on any edible crop, as a control of scrub in forestry and plantations and for the control of heather and woody weeds in coniferous plantations. Only dilute formulations are approved for amateur use.

Only those products containing 2,4,5-T which have specific approval from Ministers may be used. From 1 January 1988 users must comply with the conditions of approval related to use, which are concerned with areas of use, protective clothing, application rates and precautions. These are specified on product labels.

Saithe Catch Quotas

Mr. Randall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to compensate those companies which did not exceed the saithe catch quotas allocated to them for area six before the closure of this fishery; and what corresponding action he will take with those companies which exceeded their quotas in this area.

Mr. Gummer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. John asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will set out the amounts of common agricultural policy surplus production held in each of the stores used for that purpose in the United Kingdom;

(2) what is the location, by town, of the stores used for the storage of common agricultural policy surpluses in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Donald Thompson [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1987]: At 31 March 1987 intervention stocks at each location in the United Kingdom were:

EMPLOYMENT

Women

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will list the number of women which comprise (a) the 139 per cent. increase in the number of women managers, (b) the 282 per cent. increase in women engineers and scientists, (c) the 134 per cent. increase of women in construction craft occupations as stated in the Home Office report "The Nairobi Forward-Looking Strategies for the Advancement of Women: A Review" and (d) the proportion of women within the total work force in each of these occupations since 1971.

Mr. Nicholls: The figures underlying the percentage increases quoted in the report were derived by the Institute of Employment Research at Warwick university from the results of the 1971 and 1981 censuses of population and are reproduced in the table.

Women in Employment in Selected Occupation Groups[1]

Occupation group[1]	1971		1981
	Number (000's)[2]	Per cent	Number (000's)[2]	Per Cent
Managers and administrators	23	0·3	56	0·6
Engineers and scientists	8	0·1	32	0·4
Construction craft occupations	3	—	7	0·1
All occupation groups	8,690	100	9,134	100

Notes:

[1] The occupational classifications used are the "Warwick Occupational Categories" defined by the Institute of Employment Research at Warwick university.

[2] Estimated numbers in employment were derived from the 10 per cent. sample of census returns that were coded for occupation.

— denotes percentage less than 0·1.

Job Training Scheme

Mrs. Maureen Hicks asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the job training scheme.

Mr. Cope: Over 13,000 trainees are currently participating in the scheme with the support and co-operation of rapidly increasing numbers of employers, both large and small. I regret the irresponsible attempts of trade unions to obstruct the new job training scheme, which is designed to bridge the gap between the skills that industry wants to employ and the skills that those out of work for six months or more have to offer. I am convinced that the scheme will go from strength to strength and that trade unions will fail in their attempt to prevent long-term unemployed people receiving the training they need for employment.

Growth Strategy

Ms. Quin asked the Secretary of State for Employment what discussions have taken place between the Government and trades unions, including the Trades Union Congress, concerning the commitment to implement the European Commission's co-operative strategy for more employment.

Mr. Nicholls: The draft summary and conclusions of the European Commission's Annual Economic Report", which called on the Community to press ahead with the co-operative growth strategy, were discussed at the December 1986 meeting of the National Economic Development Council. Employment issues have also been discussed at several other NEDC meetings.

Textile and Clothing Industries

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has concerning the number of people employed as full-time equivalents in the textiles and clothing industries for each quarter in the last eight years.

Mr. Lee: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Age Allowance

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of those aged 65 years or over liable to income tax who fail to claim the age allowance; and whether he will takes steps to grant the age allowance automatically to those aged 65 years or over without the obligation to claim.

Mr. Norman Lamont: No information is available on the number of those aged 65 and over who have failed to claim age allowance, but there is no evidence to suggest that the figure is substantial.

In order to give the benefit of age allowance the tax office needs to know the date of birth of the taxpayer (and his wife). A taxpayer is asked to show this information on his tax return if either he or his wife will be aged over 60 or over during the coming year. Although most taxpayers are not now regularly asked to complete tax returns, where a taxpayer retires from full-time employment he will normally be asked to make a return, and this will give him the opportunity to supply the information. If he does so he can normally expect age allowance to be given at the appropriate time without any further action on his part, provided that his income (including his wife's income) is within the appropriate limit.

If my hon. Friend has a particular case in mind I should be glad to look into it if he will let me have the necessary details.

Privatisation

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer why advertisements for the offers for sale of shares in state companies are restricted to newspapers published in Great Britain; why no such advertisements are placed in newspapers published in Northern Ireland; and if he will ensure that United Kingdom citizens in Northern Ireland are given the same opportunity to apply for these shares.

Mr. Lawson: It is a matter for the Government Department responsible for each sale to decide advertising policy for that sale. It is usual practice for offer for sale advertisements to be placed in several newspapers available throughout the United Kingdom so that all United Kingdom citizens are equally well informed about application procedures for shares in privatised companies.

Departmental Staff

Mr. John Townend asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the number of staff-in-post in central Government Departments at 1 April.

Mr. Major: At 1 April 1987 there were 597,814 staff in post in central Government Departments. Of these, 507,460 were non-industrials and 90,354 were industrials.

Income Tax

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of raising the income tax threshold to £4,000; how many people this would take out of tax altogether; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1987]: The estimated full-year cost of changing all income tax thresholds to £4,000 would be just over £5½ billion at 1987-88 levels of income and 2·2 million tax units (single people and married couples) would be taken out of tax. These figures assume that the single person's allowance, the wife's earned income allowance, the married man's allowance and the age allowances are all changed to £4,000. This means that the age allowances for married couples would be lowered from their present levels and, as a consequence, 200,000 married couples aged 65 or over would be brought into tax. Overall, there would be 2 million fewer single people and married couples paying tax as a result of the measure.

TRANSPORT

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Channon: Achievements over the last three years are as follows:

For bus, minibus and taxi operators:

—the many more business opportunities provided in the Transport Act 1985 by the deregulation of local bus services.

For bus and lorry operators:

—an increased flexibility in drivers' hours arrangements allowed by changes successfully negotiated in EC regulations, and the removal of some controls imposed by the Transport Act 1968.

For international hauliers:

— the agreed removal of quantity restrictions on international road haulage within the EC.

For business men with roadside premises:

—a relaxation of my power to direct refusal of planning applications, and the proposed removal of local highway authorities' powers in England and Wales to block applications, for certain roadside developments.

For airline operators:

—new bilateral agreements with Belgium, Switzerland, the Netherlands, the Federal Republic of Germany and Luxembourg.

For helicopter operators:

— the scrapping by the Civil Aviation Authority of licensing requirements for services to oil rigs outside the United Kingdom.

For shipowners:
— simpler and less costly arrangements for bringing secondhand ships onto the United Kingdom register.

For shipowners in coastal trade:
— an agreement with the West German Government, allowing United Kingdom vessels access to German coastal trades on a reciprocal basis.

For MOT garages:
—provision to allow MOT testing stations to use fewer forms.

For the supply industry:
—the British Railways Board were asked to obtain more supply and support services, including rail and station catering, from the private sector.
—the procurement organisation recently set up to direct all the Department's purchasing, will take steps to encourage the use of small firms where appropriate.

The procurement organisation is in the process of establishing suitable performance indicators to monitor the use of small firms, and the Transport and Road Research Laboratory is monitoring the effects of bus deregulation under the Transport Act 1985. The other measures do not lend themselves in the same way to the use of statistical performance indicators.

BAA (Share Offer)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Transport in which newspapers published in (a) Wales, (b) Scotland and (c) Northern Ireland the offer for sales of shares in the British Airports Authority was advertised.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The BAA full and abridged prospectuses containing application forms for BAA shares were published only in national newspapers or those that enjoy a large circulation in the vicinity of BAA plc's airports. The following newspapers were used:

The Aberdeen Press and Journal
Daily Express
Daily Mail
The Daily Telegraph
Financial Times
Glasgow Herald
The Guardian
The Independent
London Daily News
The London Evening Standard
The Mail on Sunday
The Scotsman
Sunday Express
The Sunday Times
The Times

Ship Registration

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Transport what responses were received to the consultative document on ship registration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. David Mitchell: Some 50 responses to the March 1984 consultative document were received. The Merchant Shipping Bill to be introduced this autumn will take forward some of the proposals in the consultative document, in particular those on eligibility to register and on the categorisation of dependent territory registers.

British Rail

Dr. Marek asked the Secretary of State for Transport which parts of British Rail are currently under consideration for disposal to the private sector; for each part, how much profit or loss was made in each of the last five years; and how much was spent on infrastructure and maintenance.

Mr. David Mitchell: The Railways Board is currently considering disposal of British Transport Advertising and of Doncaster Wagon Works Ltd. BTA previously acted for the Railways Board and its other principals on a non-profit making agency basis. Doncaster Wagon Works was part of the Doncaster works of BREL until April this year, and no separate historical financial information is available.

Herald of Free Enterprise (Report)

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive the report of the formal investigation into the loss of the Herald of Free Enterprise.

Mr. Channon: I understand that Mr. Justice Sheene intends to deliver his report in court on Friday 24 July.

A47 (Dual Carriageway)

Mr. Carttiss asked the Secretary of State for Transport if, in view of recent fatal accidents, he will make an early statement on the priorities he plans to give to constructing the A47 Acle to Great Yarmouth Straight to dual carriageway standards.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: There are no early plans for dualling this length. Norfolk county council, as the Department's agent, was asked in mid-May to assess the justification for its improvement. Its study will have regard to the accident record.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if, pursuant to his answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 63, he will publish the contractual terms of the Trident programme.

Mr. Sainsbury: It is not the practice to release details on contractual arrangements as these are commercially confidential. However, given the parliamentary interest in the break clause of the contract for the first Trident submarine, my predecessor placed a copy of this in the Library of the House on 8 May 1986 after first obtaining the agreement of the company.

Nerve Gas

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the expenditure and projected expenditure on the procurement of nerve gas detection equipment for each of the years 1979 to 1995.

Mr. Sainsbury: Expenditure on procurement of nerve gas detection equipment for the years in question was as follows:

	£ million
1979-80	nil
1980-81	1·21
1981-82	0·58
1982-83	3·63
1983-84	5·95
1984-85	4·50
1985-86	4·51
1986-87	9·37

Expenditure in future years is, of course, a matter to be considered in the light of future needs and cannot be usefully speculated upon here.

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Defence who are the main suppliers of nerve gas detection equipment to his Department.

Mr. Sainsbury: The current main suppliers of nerve gas detection equipment to the Ministry of Defence are Thorn EMI Electronics Ltd. of Nottingham and Graseby Ionics Ltd. of Watford.

Mr. Key asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the use of members of Her Majesty's forces in experiments at the Chemical Defence Establishment, Porton Down, near Salisbury.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many service personnel have been exposed to nerve gas at Porton Down in each year since 1962; over how long a period these experiments have been conducted; how many of those exposed have subsequently left the service; how their reactions are monitored; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Chemical Defence Establishment is responsible for research and development aimed at providing effective protection for our service personnel against chemical and biological warfare agents, should these ever be used against them. As part of this essential work, volunteers are invited from the armed services to participate in a range of studies, one element of which involves exposure to very low and medically-safe concentrations of potential chemical warfare agents in order to determine the ability of unprotected personnel to operate normally in such an environment.

Studies of this nature have been conducted ever since the CDE was established during world war 1. A precise figure for the total number of volunteers over the years is not available but since world war 2 approximately 3,500 service personnel have participated in studies involving exposure to safe concentrations of potential chemical warfare agents. A year-by-year breakdown of this figure cannot be given for security reasons—since such data could enable an informed observer to gain a useful insight into the scope and direction of our chemical defence programme. Information is not available on the number of volunteers who have since left the services.

Studies involving such exposures are permitted only after approval by both CDE medically-qualified personnel and a panel of distinguished medical authorities from outside the Ministry of Defence. Before any volunteer study is authorised, a clear need for it must be identified and fully adequate arrangements defined for the safety and welfare of volunteers. Guidelines approved by the Royal College of Physicians are observed throughout.

Volunteers are invited from all branches of the armed forces and no one is put under any pressure whatever to apply or, having applied, to continue. Indeed, it is made clear to those who come to the CDE that they are free to withdraw at any time for whatever reason and without prejudice to themselves. They are also given full information on the nature, object and duration of the tests for which they have volunteered in the presence of a service officer who is not involved in the programme and whose role it is to safeguard the interests of the volunteers.

All volunteers are given a thorough medical examination on arrival at the CDE and before their departure. Each volunteer's participation is recorded in his/her medical file. Service medical records are available, if required, to civilian medical practitioners after Service personnel have returned to civilian life.

Mr. O'Neill asked the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has as to how many members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Alliance allow members of their service personnel to be exposed to nerve gases.

Mr. Sainsbury: National practice in such areas is a matter for the Governments concerned. It would not be appropriate for Her Majesty's Government to comment.

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the use of members of Her Majesty's forces in experiments involving exposure to nerve gases and other toxic chemicals; how many individuals have been so exposed in each of the past 10 years; and if they are required to sign any document that would have the effect of waiving their rights to sue for compensation under the terms of the Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 in the event of injury or death.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply today to my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury.

The repeal of section 10 of the Crown Proceedings Act 1947, which was brought about by the Crown Proceedings (Armed Forces) Act 1987 and which came into effect on 15 May 1987, gives service personnel participating in volunteer studies at the CDE and their dependants the right to sue the Ministry of Defence, its servants or agents in common law for any negligent act or omission which has resulted in personal injury, disease or death. This position is made clear to service personnel participating in volunteer studies and they are not required to sign any document which would have the effect of waiving this right.

120 mm DS/T Shot

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence when he intends to place the second part of the 1987-88 order for 120 mm DS/T shot; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Provided that satisfactory prices can be agreed, we intend to place an order for a further tranche of our 1987-88 requirement for 120 mm DS/T Shot as soon as is possible.

RAF Boulmer

Mr. Beith asked the Secretary of State for Defence how many married quarters at RAF Boulmer have been vacant for more than 12 months.

Mr. Freeman: I shall reply shortly.

FH70 Ammunition

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement about the non-delivery of FH70 ammunition from Rheinmetal GMbH relating to orders placed more than two years ago.

Mr. Sainsbury: Deliveries of L15 high explosive shell under the current contract with Rheinmetal GMbH in April 1986 and have been maintained steadily since then. Ninety five per cent. of the shells due under this order have been delivered.

Service Voters

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he is satisfied with the percentages of service personnel in each of the armed forces who are registered on the index of service voters; and what steps he proposes to take to ensure that in future nearly half the Royal Air Force, one third of the Army and one quarter of the Royal Navy, together with many of their spouses are not disfranchised in future elections.

Mr. Freeman: Responsibility for registration rests upon the individual and it is not within our power to compel service personnel to register. However, we shall continue to strive for higher numbers on the index by a constant process of encouragement. This will include: advice during training; the production of Defence Council instructions advising commanding officers of their obligation to encourage maximum registration; notice board information material; articles; broadcasts; advertisements and advisory booklets (in conjunction with the Home Office), and liaison with electoral registration offices.

End User Certificates

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Defence which companies from which his Department has ordered arms or equipment over the last five years have been prosecuted for illegally supplying arms or equipment with false end user certificates; and what was the result of each such prosecution.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Ministry of Defence does not hold the information in the form requested. However, I can assure the hon. Member that before any contracts are placed all the relevant circumstances relating to the award of the contract are taken into account. This would, of course, include the reputation of the suppliers in question.

Support Services, Germany (Privatisation)

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place a copy of the special study on the privatisation of support services for British forces in Germany in the Library.

Mr. Sainsbury: The report is a classified document which is commercially sensitive and is, in any case, still under consideration. I will, however, arrange for the hon. Member to receive a copy of the consultative document which has been issued to work force representatives.

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Defence whether the special study examining the scope for extending the use of contractors to provide support services for the British forces in Germany has been completed and recommendations submitted to the Commander-in-Chief; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: A study into the scope for extending the use of contractors to provide supporting services to the British forces in Germany was completed in 1986. The study examined the factors surrounding the application of competitive tendering in the theatre, and put forward a strategy for efficiency and competition aimed at securing better value for money, including the formation of a joint efficiency team reporting to the Commanders-in-Chief Committee (Germany). Representatives of the civilian work force have been consulted and their views will be taken into account in reaching decisions on the implementation of the study's recommendations.

Aircraft Losses

Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of aircraft damaged beyond repair by all services in routine flying exercises since 1979; and what is the total cost of these losses in (a) lives lost and (b) cash.

Mr. Freeman: In each year's "Statement on the Defence Estimates" are set out the details of all accidents involving loss of, or serious damage to, aircraft of the three services, as well as resultant fatalities. In the time available, it has not been possible to separate out or cost the information asked for without disproportionate effort.

Exercise Purple Warrior

Mr. Wilson asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the proposed locations of the amphibious landings and parachute assault landings in Galloway, Arran and Kintyre during Exercise Purple Warrior in November in the current year; how many troops will be involved in each of these landings; what type of aircraft will be involved in Exercise Purple Warrior, listing the numbers of each type; whether there will be any United States military participation in Exercise Purple Warrior; if he will provide details of the facilities being made available to Warsaw Treaty Organisation observers at Exercise Purple Warrior; what is the estimated cost of Exercise Purple Warrior; if he will list the names of all properties on and over which Exercise Purple Warrior will be conducted, indicating the owner of the land in each case; and if he will list the nature, location and extent of any planned live firing during Exercise Purple Warrior.

Mr. Stewart: I shall answer shortly.

ENERGY

Hinckley Point Power Station

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he has received a safety report on the alleged welding malpractice at Hinckley Point power station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The NII has investigated the alleged welding malpractice at Hinckley Point and has concluded that there is no evidence to support the allegations. A copy of the NII's report has been placed in the Library of the House.

Coal Industry Act 1987

18. Mr. Ashby asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he intends to lay orders under sections 6 ad 7 of the Coal Industry Act 1987.

Mr. Michael Spicer [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: My right hon. Friend has today laid orders under sections 6 and 7 of the Coal Industry Act 1987. The orders fulfil the Government's promise to ensure that all substantial groups of coal industry employees are represented on the management of the coal industry social welfare organisation and the mineworkers pension scheme. I hope that British Coal and all the unions concerned will now work together constructively on both sides.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Women

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department finances research on the problems of recruiting and selecting women trainees on British aid-funded scholarships; and what research has been done by his Department on how the proportion of women on the technical co-operation training programme can be increased.

Mr. Chris Patten: We intend to finance research on the constraints to increasing the proportion of women benefiting from ODA-funded training awards. Terms of reference for such a study have been prepared and we are in the process of identifying a suitably qualified researcher.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Overseas Development Administration provides funds to publicise issues of women and development, and to establish what proportion of the aid programme is of direct benefit to women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: The objective of our aid is to benefit the people of developing countries, including women. It is impracticable to state what proportion of the aid programme benefits women separately.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether all aid documents issued from his Department carry an assessment of the impact of their projects or programmes on women; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: Since last year it has been standard ODA procedure for evaluations to include an assessment of the impact of the aided activity on women where this is relevant. The evaluation reports issued will include these assessments.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will establish a cross-departmental group of Overseas Development Administration officers to develop British policy on women and development; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am satisfied that our policy on women in development already reflects extensive consultation within the ODA.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will create a special fund to finance projects of specific interest to women giving priority to funding projects established by Third world women's organisations; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will increase the number of women's advisers to form a fully-funded and resourced women's unit designed to initiate policy on women and development and to oversee its implementation.

Mr. Chris Patten: Our policy is to integrate concern for women into all ODA activities. ODA officials are aware of the importance attached to taking account of the impact of our activities on women and our social development advisers provide the expertise needed. I believe that a separate women's unit or special fund would tend to "marginalise" women's interests.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if his Department consults British non-governmental organisations and women's groups on women and development policy; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chris Patten: We hold regular discussions with members of the women's organisations interest group of the National Council for Voluntary Organisations and other Women in Development experts.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if any major evalution has been funded to assess the impact of the aid programme on women in major recipient countries of British aid; and if issues concerning women and development are raised at aid planning meetings.

Mr. Chris Patten: In concert with other development assistance committee donors, our evaluations now include a consideration of the impact of projects on women. The DAC will be preparing a synthesis study of the results. In this way we hope to obtain in a cost-effective manner the lessons of experience for a considerable number of projects in many countries.

Women and development issues are raised at meetings of aid consortia and consultative groups and other aid planning meetings.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the Overseas Development Administration will make representations to the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank urging them to expand their policies in relation to women and development; in the light of his Department's support for the International Monetary Fund's economic aid in Tanzania, how much of the £50 million that has been pledged to the Tanzanian Government will go to programmes involving women and development; and in what places and for which projects.

Mr. Chris Patten: The International Monetary fund agrees broad economic targets, largely related to the balance of payments, as part of its lending programmes. Longer-term domestic issues are addressed by the World Bank. I believe that the bank is already making determined efforts to integrate a concern for women into its financing activities.

The bulk of the British aid recently pledged to Tanzania will be used to finance essential imports and to support the railways sector. The remainder, about £12 million, will be used to finance specific projects and programmes, including the development of maternal and child health care and family planning in southern Tanzania.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish in the near future a White Paper including a plan of action on women and development policy in the aid programme.

Mr. Chris Patten: The ODA booklet "Women in development", copies of which are in the Library of the House, sets out our policy in this area. Since its issue in 1986 we have confirmed the policy and further clarified it.

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to conduct a study on the proportion of women in the Overseas Development Administration; and if he will publish in the Official Report the changes in that proportion in the past five years.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Overseas Development Administration already monitors the proportion of women in its employment, their access to training and relative success in career advancement. The proportion of women employed in the Overseas Development Administration on 1 April in each of the last five years and on 1 July 1987 is:

Year	Total staff	Number of women	Percentage
1982	2,035	771	37·89
1983	1,927	714	37·05
1984	1,753	684	39·02
1985	1,617	641	39·64
1986	1,608	635	39·49
1987	1,548	622	40·18

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the present women's adviser post will be reformulated within the aid programme so that it is held by one woman who has no additional responsibilities.

Mr. Chris Patten: Specialist advice on women's issues is provided by the ODA's social development advisers. This ensures that our concerns for women's role in development and measures taken to enhance it are understood in a broader social context; I believe this makes our work more effective.

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the number of women, and the percentage they constitute, who obtain places on technical co-operation training courses.

Mr. Chris Patten: Women received 980 (16·8 per cent. of the total) new training awards in the year ending 31 March 1987.

Mapping

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what arrangements his Department now has, following the abolition of the Directorate of Overseas Surveys, for providing aid in mapping to developing countries; and what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that such arrangements are effective.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Directorate of Overseas Surveys was absorbed into the Ordnance Survey as its Overseas Surveys Directorate in 1984. It continues to provide a range of services to aid recipient countries. These include surveys, advice and institutional support. Under arrangements agreed between the Ordnance Survey and the Overseas Development Administration, such work is commissioned and funded on a project basis. In addition, the Overseas Development Administration provides funding for certain core services which amounted to about £1·3 million in 1986/87.

The Overseas Surveys Directorate programme and funding are reviewed at an annual meeting between the Ordnance Survey and the Overseas Development Administration.

Shelter-Related Projects

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of his Department's budget has gone on aid to shelter-related projects in each year since 1977.

Mr. Chris Patten: Information in the form requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

East African Army Worm (Ethiopia)

Mr. Spearing asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has received any request from the Government of Ethiopia for assistance in respect of combating locusts or the East African Army worm; and what information he has concerning the threat from the pests to the assistance already given by the United Kingdom to that area of Africa.

Mr. Chris Patten: We have received no such request from the Government of Ethiopia. We have received a report from the United Nations Food and Agriculture Organisation of threats to Ethiopia and neighbouring countries from swarms of desert locusts and are monitoring the situation closely.

Britain has provided over £3 million for migratory pest control in Africa over the past 12 months, including £790,000 to combat locusts and army worm in Ethiopia.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Parliamentary Boundary Commission

Mr. Madel asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he expects the Parliamentary Boundary Commission to publish major proposals for changing the parliamentary boundaries of constituencies in England before 31 December 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. The Parliamentary Boundary Commission is required to present its reports on all the constituencies in England not less than 10 and not more than 15 years after the date of submission of its previous report. The report of the last general review of England, the third periodical report, was submitted on 1 February 1983. The Commission's fourth periodical report may therefore be submitted at any time between 1 February 1993 and 31 January 1998.

Telephone Tapping

13. Mr. Skinner asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many warrants authorising telephone taps have been issued in 1987 to the present time.

38. Mr. Cryer asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many telephone tapping warrants he has issued in 1987 to the most recent practicable date.

Mr. Hurd: The number of telecommunication warrants issued by the Home Secretary in force on 31 December 1986 was 206. The figures were given in an annex to the report of the Commissioner, the right hon. Lord Justice Lloyd, on the first year of operation of the Interception of Communications Act 1985 which was presented to Parliament in March 1987 (Cmnd 108). I do not propose to publish statistics additional to those in the Commissioner's Report.

Entry Certificates

15. Ms. Short asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that no one who has already applied for an entry certificate will be subjected to the harsher tests for entry proposed in the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Renton: We will announce our detailed proposals for handling outstanding entry certificate applications once the forthcoming Bill has been published.

Metropolitan Police

16. Mr. Jessel asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what further action the Government intend to take to support the work of the Metropolitan police.

Mr. Hurd: Spending on the Metropolitan police this year will be over 50 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1978-79 and the cash limit of £929 million for 1987-88 which I announced in February is 9 per cent. more than last year. I announced in May 1986 manpower increases of 1,200 in the police establishment and 600 in the civil staff ceilling over four years. So far I have approved increases of 600 policemen and 400 civilian staff; and I am prepared to approve further increases of 600 policemen and 200 civilians over the next two years subject to being satisfied that earlier increases have been effectively used and that satisfactory progress has been made with civilianisation. The programme of civilian manpower increases should release at least 400 officers for operational duty. Actual police strength has not kept pace with the establishment increases. The force is at present about 600 below the level which I have authorised.

47. Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current strength of the Metropolitan police compared with 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The strength of the Metropolitan police on 30 June was 27,105, an increase of some 4,800 officers over May 1979.

AIDS

18. Mr. Cohen asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to monitor the incidence of AIDS in prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Since March 1985 prison medical officers have been required to report identified cases of HIV infection that is, (those in which a positive result to an HIV antibody test has been obtained) and cases of diagnosed AIDS. In June 1987 medical officers were asked to make a separate report following a diagnosis of PGL (Persistent General Lymphadenopathy) or ARC (AIDS Related Complex). A central statistical record based on the reports is maintained by the Director of Prison Medical Services.

39. Mr. Page asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to amend the law covering the effects of activities of a known AIDS carrier towards a third party.

Mr. John Patten: We have no present plans to amend the criminal law in this respect.

Thames Valley Police

20. Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the establishment of the Thames Valley police authority.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have received representations from most members with constituencies in the Thames Valley police force area about the latest application by the police authority for additional police posts. The application is under consideration.

52. Mr. Andrew MacKay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on police manning levels in the Thames Valley force.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Since May 1979 the strength of the Thames Valley police has increased by 811 and its establishment by 470. I understand that the force has recruited up to its establishment. The Thames Valley police authority has applied for 200 additional police posts and this is under consideration.

33. Mr. Watts asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will now approve a further increase in the establishment of the Thames Valley police.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: An application by the Thames Valley police authority for additional police posts is under consideration.

Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis

22. Mr. Campbell-Savours asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to discuss his annual report.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend is in regular touch with the Commissioner on various matters covered by the report.

Tamils

23. Mr. Nellist asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many of the original 64 Tamils who arrived in Britain at the beginning of the year have subsequently been given temporary admission; and how many are still being detained.

Mr. Renton: As at 15 July, 39 of the group of 64 Tamils who arrived in Britain on 13 February 1987 had been granted temporary admission. Another nine had been released on bail, and bail has been granted in principle to 15 others subject to satisfactory sureties and the outcome of inquiries by the immigration service.

Crime Prevention

24. Mrs. Virginia Bottomley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the work of the ministerial group on crime prevention.

Mr. Hurd: The ministerial group on crime prevention will soon publish a report on its first year's work. The group has proved an important means of co-ordinating and stimulating crime prevention activity. Under the new chairmanship of my hon. Friend the Minister of State, the Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten) it will continue to develop this role.

37. Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received making proposals for dealing with the rising crime rate.

Mr. John Patten: We receive representations from a variety of sources. Their contents cannot easily be summarised, but there is a high level of support for the Government's crime prevention initiatives.

50. Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has for new initiatives to promote the prevention of crime.

Mr. John Patten: In addition to a new national crime prevention publicity campaign, we plan to publish a handbook setting out a range of examples of how all those who are concerned about crime can make a positive and practical contribution to preventing it. We are working up plans for a new national crime prevention organisation which might support and encourage local crime prevention activity. Opportunities for establishing more local projects and initiatives are being explored.

Birmingham Pub Bombings

27. Mr. Clay asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Devon and Cornwall police have completed their investigation of the claims made by former police constable Tom Clarke regarding the treatment in custody of persons held in connection with the Birmingham pub bombings; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We look forward to receiving the chief constable's report shortly.

Prison Statistics

28. Mr. Knox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were in prison at the most recent count.

Mr. John Patten: On 10 July 1987 the total prison population in England and Wales was 50,381. This does not include 648 in police cells.

Offensive Weapons

29. Mr. Favell asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation to make it a criminal offence to sell offensive weapons to people under 18 years of age.

32. Mr. Evennett asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to introduce legislation to regulate the sale and possession of knives as martial arts weapons.

46. Mr. Simon Hughes asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any proposals for the control of the sale of heavy duty catapults, spiked shoe straps, and other offensive weapons available by mail order; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are committed to bringing forward proposals on the sale of offensive weapons which have no legitimate uses. In addition we have already set in hand a study of how the law relating to the possession of knives and other sharp bladed instruments might be reinforced and we shall be considering urgently how best to take matters forward in the light of that study.

Police Surgeons

30. Dr. Godman asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police surgeons are employed in England and Wales; and how many are women.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to a question from the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) on 7 July.

Police Stations

31. Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to his policy on the provision of police stations in rural towns and villages in England and Wales.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: It is for each chief constable to determine the most suitable methods of policing for his force area.

Identity Cards

34. Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department to what extent his refusal to introduce identity cards is based on the experience of other countries where they have been obligatory; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The experience of other countries is only one of the relevant factors. We are not persuaded that the balance of advantage lies in introducing identity cards in this country.

Non-metropolitan Police Forces

35. Mr. Colin Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present rate of recruitment into the non-metropolitan police forces.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: About 3,700 police officers were recruited to the non metropolitan forces (that is all forces in England and Wales except the Metropolitan Police, and the City of London, Greater Manchester, Merseyside, Northumbria, South Yorkshire, West Midlands and West Yorkshire forces) in the year ended 30 June 1987. They were recruited either to replace officers who retired or resigned or to enable forces to implement increases in establishment. Between May 1979 and May 1987 strengths in these forces increased by 4,041 police officers, from 60,277 to 64,318.

Police Manpower (Norfolk)

36. Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give figures for the number of police in Norfolk for each of the following years: 1979, 1983 and 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is as follows:

	Authorised Establishment	Actual Strength
31 December 1979	1,265	1,237
31 December 1983	1,273	1,278
31 May 1987	1,318	1,318

Independent Television Network

25. Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to meet the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority to discuss the future structure of the independent television network.

Mr. Renton: I shall be meeting the chairman of the Independent Broadcasting Authority on 22 July to discuss a number of matters of current interest.

Crime Prevention (Insurance Companies)

19. Mr. Rowe asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has any plans to involve insurance companies further in the fight against crime; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Insurance companies, either individually or through the Association of British Insurers already make a significant contribution to crime prevention. For example they have offered insurance discounts and other incentives to policyholders for taking certain security precautions; they have provided security advice through literature and videos; they have participated in crime prevention panels; they have set up a register of total loss vehicle claims; and they have given valuable support to the Home Office Standing Conference on Crime Prevention. I am shortly to meet representatives of the Association and I am confident that insurance companies will continue their active involvement in a range of crime prevention activity.

Crime (Bristol)

41. Ms. Primarolo asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will fund a crime survey in the Bristol area.

Mr. John Patten: The Department has recently awarded a research grant to the Avon and Somerset constabulary for this purpose.

Obscene Publications Act 1959

42. Mr. Gerald Howarth asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to introduce legislation to extend to broadcasting the provisions of the Obscene Publications Act 1959.

Mr. Renton: Such a provision will be included in the Broadcasting Bill which we plan to introduce as soon as practicable.

Illicit Drugs

43. Sir David Price asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress has been made in the Government's programme to reduce the traffic within the United Kingdom of illicit drugs.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are continuing to step up action on all aspects of our anti-drugs strategy. Recent developments include the allocation by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer of 460 further posts for customs work, including 110 more specialist drugs investigators, support and legal staff; the establishment of 17 regional crime squad drugs wings manned by 221 additional police officers; further strengthening of the national drugs intelligence unit; and implementation of the Drug Trafficking Offences Act 1986. In 1986 customs broke up more than 80 drugs organisations, and police successes included the detection of 11 illicit amphetamine laboratories. Following last month's United Nations conference on drug abuse and illicit trafficking in Vienna, the United Kingdom is playing a leading role in current intergovernmental discussions concerning a proposed new United Nations convention on drug trafficking.

National Unity

44. Mr. Stanbrook asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, within his departmental responsibilities, he will propose further administrative and legislative action designed to promote the unity of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hurd: Only some of my responsibilities extend to the United Kingdom as a whole; but Home Office policies, in particular for broadcasting, race relations, immigration, crime and policing in England and Wales, respect the territorial, constitutional and social unity of the United Kingdom, and are designed to operate fairly between the different parts of the country to which they apply.

London (Policing)

45. Mr. Sedgemore asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will make a statement on the report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on policing London.

48. Mr. Leigh asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the annual report of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Mr. Hurd: I welcome the commissioner's annual report, which gives a comprehensive account of the many ways in which his force is meeting the challenge of policing London.

Criminal Injuries (Compensation)

17. Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there are any plans for the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board to recompense victims of road accidents involving stolen cars.

Mr. John Patten: Our proposals for a statutory criminal injuries compensation scheme are set out in the Criminal Justice Bill. These proposals would make no change of substance in respect of road traffic accidents.

Mothers and Children (Prisons)

49. Miss Lestor asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number and ages of children currently in prison with their mothers.

Mr. John Patten: On the 6 July, 28 babies were in prison mother and baby units at Askham Grange, Holloway and Styal.

The ages of the babies were:

Age months	Number
Aged under 1	5
Aged 1	3
Aged 2	4
Aged 3	4
Aged 4	3
Aged 7	1
Aged 8	1
Aged 9	2
Aged 10	2
Aged 13	1
Aged 15	1
Aged 16	1

Immigration

26. Mr. Tony Lloyd asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give details of the percentage of fiancées and spouses refused entry clearance under the primary purpose rule for the last two years.

Mr. Renton: The information requested is available only for entry clearance applications in the Indian sub-continent. In 1985 no wife or female fiancée in the sub-continent was refused solely or partly because of the primary purpose rule; in 1986 the proportions were negligible for wives and about 10 per cent for female fiancées. The proportion of husbands so refused was 25 per cent. in 1985 and 35 per cent. in 1986. The corresponding proportions for male fiancés were 45 per cent. in 1985 and 50 per cent. in 1986. These proportions take account of the outcome of appeals.

Prison (Bicester)

51. Mr. Baldry asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement as to the timetable for the construction of the new prison near Bicester.

Mr. John Patten: Work is due to start on site in March 1988 and the prison is scheduled to be handed over to the Home Office in mid-1991.

Religious Broadcasting

21. Dr. Michael Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received with regard to religious broadcasting; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Renton: We receive representations on a wide variety of television and radio programmes, including religious programmes. Programme policy is a matter for the broadcasting authorities, not the Government.

Concessionary Television Licences

53. Mr. Atkinson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to change the present arrangements for eligibility for the concessionary television licence.

Mr. Renton: We have no present plans to do so, but we are keeping the operation of the concessionary scheme under review in the light of the judgment of the High Court in the case brought by Kirklees metropolitan council.

Shotguns

54. Mr. Fallon asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to review the law regarding shotguns.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The law on shotguns is kept under close review and we are pursuing two initiatives. By amendment to the firearms rules, we shall shortly be introducing a requirement that shotgun certificate holders should notify any change of address to the chief officer of police. Secondly, a Home Office working party, on which the police and the British Shooting Sports Council are represented, is examining what measures should be taken to improve the security of shotguns when they are not being used, including the need for a statutory safe-keeping requirement.

Neighbourhood Watch Scheme

55. Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to expand the neighbourhood watch scheme.

Mr. John Patten: There are now over 35,000 Neighbourhood Watch Schemes spread throughout the police force areas of England and Wales. We are about to begin consultations with interested parties about the formation of an organisation to stimulate and support local crime prevention activity including Neighbourhood Watch. We also propose to produce a guidance note for distribution to police forces and the public setting out good practice to help the development of effective neighbourhood watch schemes.

Crime (Clear-up Rates)

6. Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new proposals he has to improve the crime clear-up rate.

Mr. Hurd: Clear-up rates for the most serious offences, including violence against the person and sexual offences, remain high at over 70 per cent.

I shall continue to encourage chief officers to target their resources on the most serious crimes which are of particular concern to the public. They must decide their own priorities and methods in the light of their appreciation of local circumstances. But the police cannot succeed in detecting or preventing crime by themselves. The whole community must be involved; and I will be looking for ways to encourage that involvement.

Crime Statistics

40. Mr. Patrick McLoughlin asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has on comparative crime rates for homicide, rape, and armed robbery in England and Wales, the United States of America, the Federal Republic of Germany and France.

Mr. John Patten: International crime statistics are published periodically by Interpol. A copy of its most recent publication, "International Crime Statistics 1983-84" is in the Library. The available figures do not distinguish armed robberies from other robberies. Care is needed in using such comparisons; because of differences in legal systems there are often differences in definitions and in coverage of the figures: there may also be differences in the extent to which offences are recorded by the authorities.

Mr. Churchill asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the total numbers of recorded crimes, crimes of murder, rape, violence against the person, robbery and armed robbery, respectively, in each of the past 10 years for which figures are available (a) in the Metropolitan police area, (b) in other metropolitan police areas, and (c) in non-metropolitan police areas.

Mr. John Patten: Numbers of homicides, other offences of violence against the person, rapes, robberies and the total of notifiable offences recorded in each police force area are published annually in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales, Supplementary Tables, Vol. 3" (table s.3.1 for each year from 1980 to 1985); figures for earlier years were given in the annual "Criminal Statistics" Command Paper. Numbers of offences of violence against the person and robbery (whether armed or not) recorded in 1986 in each force area are published in table 6 of Home Office statistical bulletin issue 4/87. The other information available is given in the following tables. In the absence of a court decision it is not possible to distinguish murder from other types of homicide.

Table 1. Notifiable offences of homicide and rape recorded by the police

England and Wales, 1986	Number of offences

Arson

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests and convictions there have been in connection with the second homes arson campaign in Wales since 1978; and if he will give details.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constables concerned that the numbers of arrests and convictions in connection with the second homes arson campaign in Wales since 1978 are as follows:

Police force area	Arrests	Convictions
North Wales	19	19
Dyfed-Powys	17	0
Gwent	1	0
TOTAL	37	19

The arrests in Dyfed-Powys and Gwent were the result of a single operation involving all police forces in Wales in 1980.

Mr. Alan W. Williams asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many incidents there have been in the second homes arson campaign in each of the calendar years 1978 to 1987 in the following constituencies (a) Caernarfon, (b) Meirionnydd Nant Conwy, (c) Ynys Môn and (d) Carmarthen;

(2) how many incidents there have been in the second homes arson campaign in Wales in each of the calendar years 1978 to 1987.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the chief constables of South Wales and Gwent that there have been no incidents in their police force areas during the period. I understand from the chief constables of North Wales and Dyfed-Powys that the number of incidents in their police force area were as follows:

Numbers of incidents in connection with second homes arson campaign in Wales 1979 to 1987

Year[1]	Caernarfon	North Wales Meirionnydd Nant Conwy	Ynys Môn	Dyfed-Powys[2]	Total

[2] Separate figures for Carmarthen are not readily available.

Offences (Use of Firearms)

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences were committed in the last five years where firearms were used, broken down according to the kind of weapon involved and the category of offence, respectively.

Mr. John Patten: The available information relates to notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms were reported to have been used. Figures for 1976 to 1986 by offence group are published in Home Office statistical bulletin issue 16/87. The following table gives figures for 1986 by type of principal weapon involved; those for earlier years are published in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales 1985" (Cm. 10). A full analysis of the 1986 figures will appear in chapter 3 of the command paper, to be published later this year.

Notifiable offences recorded by the police[1] in which firearms were reported to have been used, by principal weapon

England and Wales 1986	Number
Long-barrelled shotgun	600
Sawn-off shotgun	560
Pistol	1,314
Rifle	53

South Africa House (Demonstrations)

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department on what date the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis's directions were introduced in relation to demonstrations outside South Africa House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand that the Commissioner's direction were first made in June 1986 and that they have been reviewed and renewed every month since then. The directions were implemented on 6 May 1987 following an incident in which the embassy building was attacked and damaged.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Metropolitan police consulted either Ministers or officials of his Department prior to the introduction of the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis's directions in relation to demonstrations outside South Africa House; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No.

Mr. Caborn asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will instruct the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to revoke his directions in relation to demonstrations outside South Africa House.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. This is an operational matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Michael Hickey and Others

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the progress of inquiries into the cases of Michael Hickey and others convicted of the murder of Carl Bridgewater.

Mr. John Patten: The main report of the inquiry, which has been conducted by officers of the Warwickshire constabulary, has been received and is under consideration. Following the receipt of additional representations on behalf of the convicted men, further inquiries have been ordered and the results of these will need to be fully considered before my right hon. Friend can reach a decision on the case.

Heysel Stadium Disaster (Extraditions)

Mr. Alton asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what factors he proposes to take into account in deciding whether to sign extradition warrants in respect of persons accused of offences in relation to the disaster at the Heysel stadium, Brussels, in May 1985; and when he expects to reach a decision.

Mr. Hurd: As in other extradition cases, I have to consider whether, having regard to all the circumstances, it would be unjust or oppressive to order surrender. Factors which I take into account in such cases include the seriousness or triviality of the alleged offence; how long ago it is alleged to have been committed; and whether the accusation is made in good faith in the interests of justice.

In reaching my decision I am willing to consider representations on such matters made by or on behalf of the person concerned, and any further evidence not available at the time of the court's decision. I shall be meeting hon. Members next week to receive representations on behalf of those accused of offences arising from the Heysel stadium disaster. The timing of my decision may depend on the nature of the representations which I have to consider.

Prison Disturbances (Report)

Mr. Soames asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to be able to publish Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons' report on prison disturbances in 1986; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hurd: The report of the inquiry by Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons into the disturbances in prison service establishments in England between 29 April and 2 May 1986 is published today. This is the outcome of the inquiry which I announced to the House on 6 May 1986.

I pay tribute to Sir James Hennessy and his staff for the thoroughness of his report. It sets out in full what happened in the six establishments which were most seriously affected and, in less detail, the events in 10 other establishments. The report recounts the background to the disturbances, draws conclusions about their causes, and points up lessons for the future.

No clear pattern to the disturbances emerges. There were different circumstances in different places. The report concludes that the underlying causes were complex and of varying impact. A poor regime or overcrowding in some places may have been an underlying factor. In others the type and mix of prisoners could have been critical.

The chief inspector concludes that a number of factors, "contributed to the explosion resulting from the mixture of volatile elements in many of the establishments which suffered disturbances. But the catalyst was clearly the industrial action".

That was the overtime ban and other action imposed by the national executive committee of the Prison Officers' Association (POA NEC) on 29 April. The cause of the prisoner unrest, which in some establishments broke out into full scale disturbances, was the uncertainty and anxiety among inmates about the real or anticipated effects of the industrial action upon their lives.

In drawing conclusions from these events, the chief inspector first canvasses the possibility of a no-strike agreement in the prison service. I shall want to think carefully about this before entering into any consultation with the trade unions concerned.

On the wider issues, as the chief inspector sees, the new working and management arrangements, known as Fresh Start, are at the heart of solving some of the key problems for the prison service which he identifies in his report. In particular, fresh start will provide a more unified management and a better means of determining manning levels, of securing an agreed and standard level of regime, and of servicing the courts without damaging the internal operations of establishments. These are all points upon which the chief inspector makes recommendations.

His proposals on contingency planning against inmate disturbances are also positive and helpful. Steps were taken immediately after the outbreak to review contingency plans at local, regional and national levels. Fresh guidance has been issued on handling major disturbances. There have been extensive discussions with the Association of Chief Police Officers, which has issued revised guidelines to the police service on the role of the police in the event of industrial action in the prison system. Contingency plans will be reviewed again in the light of the chief inspector's analysis and further action taken as necessary.

More generally, I have asked the director general of the prison service to develop a full action plan for responding to the many recommendations in the report, and he will be reporting to me personally.

The prison disturbances of April last year did great damage not only to the prison estate but also to the public's confidence in the prison service. They were a traumatic and shocking experience for the prison service itself, staff and management alike. The chief inspector's cool and analytical report will serve to set the record straight. But its greater value will be to reinforce the lessons for the future which emerged from those violent hours. I am determined that it shall.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Health Authorities (Private Treatment)

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Social Services which health authorities have contracted out to the private health sector medical treatment of patients in the last 12 months; what payment has been involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We encourage health authorities to consider entering into contractual arrangements with the private sector whenever it would be a cost-effective way of providing services. Expenditure for 1985-86 (latest available) on contractual arrangements for patient care by health authorities in England is given in the following table:

Supplementary Benefit

Sir Brandon Rhys Williams asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will publish figures showing for single non-householders in each London borough net spending power on supplementary benefit as a percentage of net spending power earning £50, £75 and £100 a week, in 1987-88 and after introduction of the proposed community charge.

Mr. Scott: The table shows net spending power on supplementary benefit as a percentage of net spending power at a range of gross earnings, assuming no contribution is made toward domestic costs and that all entitlements are received.

Replacement rates (per cent.) for single non-householders April 1987

Weekly gross earnings £	Aged under 25 years	Aged over 25 years
50	52	61
75	39	46
100	32	37

The position after the introduction of the proposed community charge will depend on the levels of the charge in each borough and the rates of benefit which will then be provided. These are still to be decided.

Family Practitioners Committees

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the number of (a) women members, (b) men members, (c) women chairpersons and (d) men chairpersons on each family practitioner committee.

Mrs. Currie: Of the 90 family practitioner committees in England, 26 chairmanships are held by women. The information requested on membership is in the following table, which includes chairmen. Vacancies exist on some committees.

Mentally Ill People

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he is satisfied that local authority community-based services for the mentally ill are expanding sufficiently rapidly to offset the rundown in National Health Service accommodation.

Mrs. Currie: The development of comprehensive, local services for mentally ill people requires the co-operation of health authorities, the voluntary sector and the private sector as well as local authorities. The rate at which services in the community are increasing is generally satisfactory, although we recognise that there are parts of the country where progress is disappointingly slow.

We are not aware of any examples of mental illness hospitals being closed and former patients failing to receive appropriate care in an alternative setting.

Juvenile Offenders

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the estimated average cost to his Department and local authorities of a place for a juvenile offender on an intensive intermediate treatment scheme within the Department's recent intermediate treatment initiative.

Mrs. Currie: Grants under the IT initiative were awarded on the basis that the estimated cost of providing a programme of intensive IT was £2,000 per case. This figure was fixed at the beginning of the grant period (normally two years) so that the voluntary body providing the scheme had a clear indication of the money available from central Government during the whole of the grant period.

The Department has no up-to-date information from which we could derive a current average cost of providing schemes of intensive IT. We have commissioned Dr. Martin Knapp (University of Kent) to undertake a research study to evaluate the cost effectiveness of various forms of IT compared with other court disposals, but the results of his work are not yet available.

Balderton Hospital (Eastdale Unit)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will indicate (a) the cost of running the Eastdale unit at Balderton hospital for the last five years and (b) how the cost was distributed between his Department and the relevant health authority.

Mrs. Currie: Central Nottinghamshire district health authority estimates that between 1981-82 and 1985-86 (the most recent five-year period for which figures are available) the cost of running the Eastdale unit was £1,351,000. Of that sum, £496,000 (37 per cent.) was contributed directly by the Department by means of a special allocation to the Trent regional health authority.

Special Hospitals

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people at present detained in special hospitals are awaiting transfer to other hospitals or into the community.

Mrs. Currie: On 8 July, 117 patients had been identified by their responsible medical officers as being suitable for a move from a special hospital, either on permanent transfer or for a period of trial leave.

Community Care

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement on the Audit Commission's 1986 report "Making a reality of Community Care", with regard to provision for the mentally ill.

Mrs. Currie: The Government do not think that the substantial progress already made in carrying forward the policy of community care is properly reflected in the Audit Commission report; in particular, in the mental illness field, its account of existing community facilities is misleading. The report of Sir Roy Griffith's overview of community care policy due by the end of this year, however, has it available as written evidence, and we await this report with interest.

The challenge of providing a good comprehensive community-orientated modern service for mentally ill people has been patchily met by health and local authorities; and successive Governments have recognised that it will take a good deal of effort over a long period to produce the kind of service we want. But a great deal has been achieved; the Health Advisory Service, and Good Practices in Mental Health with sponsorship from the Department have helped to catalogue and spread good practice. Since 1979 gross expenditure on hospital and community health services for mentally ill people had grown by 18 per cent. in real terms by 1985 and gross expenditure on personal social services for this group by 47 per cent. (also in real terms) in the same period. A lot remains to be done; and funding for and pressure on authorities are designed to secure appropriate priority for services for mentally ill people.

Nursing Recruitment

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he expects to respond to the results of the review into nursing recruitment.

Mr. Newton: As soon as possible.

Nurses (Pay)

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his estimate of the net cost to public funds, taking into account additional tax revenue and welfare benefit entitlement, of increasing the gross pay of all nursing grades by (a) 5 per cent., (b) 10 per cent. and (c) 15 per cent.

Mr. Newton: The estimated cost of increasing gross pay for all nursing and midwifery staff in the hospital and community health services in England by 5, 10 and 15 per cent. is:

Percentage increase	£ million
5	206
10	412
15	617

Notes:

1. Increases based on estimated paybill for 1987-88 including average 9·5 per cent. pay increase from 1 April 1987.
2. All figures inclusive of employers' national insurance and superannuation costs and agency staff.
3. Assumes employers' costs rise roughly in line with pay.

There is insufficient information on which to base an estimate of the net effect on tax revenue and benefit expenditure.

Agency Nurses

Mr. Kirkwood asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is his latest estimate of the cost of agency nurses to the National Health Service.

Mr. Newton: The annual accounts of health authorities in England for 1985-86 record total expenditure on the employment of non-National Health Service (agency etc.) nursing staff as £51,297,230.

We collect no estimates of this expenditure but figures from the accounts for 1986-87 will be available in the autumn.

HIV Infection

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what evidence there is of HIV infection in the heterosexual population.

Mr. Newton: Twenty-six cases of clinical AIDS reported in the United Kingdom up to the end of June 1987 probably acquired the infection heterosexually. There have been 205 laboratory reports of HIV antibody positive tests in England, Wales and Northern Ireland to the end of June in persons who are thought to have acquired the infection heterosexually.

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the evidence that condoms provide adequate protection against HIV.

Mr. Newton: I am advised that the evidence for the protective effect of condoms against HIV consists, first, of results of laboratory tests which demonstrate that commercially available latex condoms are impermeable to HIV. Secondly, there are epidemiological data showing reduced rates of infection among individuals at risk of HIV who generally or habitually use condoms when compared with those who do not use condoms.

AIDS

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will consider, as part of his campaign against AIDS, promoting the idea of avoiding risk activities rather than just relying on condoms.

Mr. Newton: Our campaign to date has actively promoted avoidance of activities that carry a risk of HIV transmission and will continue to do so. For those who are unwilling or unable to restrict sexual contacts to a single faithful partner, condoms provide some protection. We will continue to promote this message in our compaign of AIDS public education.

Data Processing and Information Technology

Mr. Michael Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what improvements in his Department's data processing and information technology facilities are anticipated during the next six months.

Mr. Portillo: Development work will continue on the operational strategy for social security, a range of major computerisation projects which will improve service to the public, allow greater efficiency in the payment of benefits and provide better jobs for staff. Among the milestones which it is planned to reach in the next six months are provision of an on-line inquiry service for retirement pensions, completion of the installation of the terminal replacement inquiry system (TRES) in unemployment benefit offices and the development of microcomputer-based systems to support the processing of claims for income support and family credit.

NHS (Agency Staff)

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the cost to the National Health Service in the Nottingham health authority for staff who have been employed through agencies of (a) nurses, (b) operating department assistants, (c) ancillary and (d) other staff.

Mr. Newton: The 1985-86 annual accounts of the Nottingham health authority show the following expenditure for non-National Health Service (agency, etc.) staff:

Professions allied to Medicine	3,507
Professional and technical	1,396
Administrative and Clerical—typing and secretarial	116,561
Administrative and Clerical—other	74,739
Ancillary	17,669
Ambulance	7,448
Total	221,320

Hospital Closures (Nottingham)

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what representations he has received concerning the possible closure of hospitals in the Nottingham health authority area.

Mrs. Currie: None.

Competitive Tendering

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has been saved in cleaning, laundry and catering by competitive tendering in the Nottingham health authority since the programme began.

Mr. Newton: The information available centrally relates to total annual savings generated by competitive tendering exercises for catering, domestic (cleaning) and laundry services. As at 31 March 1987, Nottingham health authority had reported total annual savings generated of £1·4 million.

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is satisfied with the progress of his competitive tendering policy.

Mr. Newton: In general, yes. I refer the hon. Member to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. McCrindle) on 14 July which sets out the good progress made by health authorities in England in putting their domestic (cleaning) catering and laundry services out to tender. As at 31 March 1987, this has resulted in annual savings generated of £93·3 million.

City Hospital, Nottingham

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps will be taken to maintain services if the proposed privatisation of the Nottingham city hospital campus is implemented; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: I assume the hon. Member is referring to the process whereby health authorities put their cleaning, catering and laundry services to competitive tender. I understand that this exercise has been completed for both catering and cleaning services (with the contracts awarded in-house) and that tenders will be invited in the autumn for the laundry service. These processes are fully compatible with the maintenance of services needed to run the hospital.

Geriatric and Psychogeriatric Beds

Mr. McWilliam asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was the total provision of geriatric and psychogeriatric beds in the Gateshead health authority area in each of the last five years; and what was the provision in all other health authorities per 10,000 population.

Mrs. Currie: The available information is given in the table.

Average daily number of available beds for geriatric and psychogeriatric specialties

	1982	1983	1984	1985	[1]1986
Gateshead District Health Authority	234·4	228·6	229·4	238·1	234·4
England	61,858·9	62,818·5	63,774·3	65,911·8	64,986·5
Average daily number of available beds in England per 10,000 population	13·2	13·4	13·6	14·0	13·8

[1] Provisional figures.

Statistics

Mr. Frank Field asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library the information contained in the fuller reply he promised to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) on changes in the collection and publication of information by his Department since 1979 in his answer of 3 December 1986, Official Report, column 698.

Mrs. Currie: The fuller reply to the hon. Member for Dagenham (Mr. Gould) was published in the Official Report of 12 January 1987 at columns 129-32.

Social Fund

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if the amount of money available for the social fund will take account of the time taken for pre-1988 single payments to pass through the administrative process.

Mr. Scott: Awards of single payments made under the former legislation but payable after the introduction of the social fund will not be payments from the fund. They will not affect social fund budgets.

Hospitals (Norwich)

Mrs. Gillian Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what assessment he has made of the effect of the outcome of the public inquiry into the Norwich southern bypass on the reappraisal of the siting of the second Norwich district general hospital; and in particular the time scale of that reappraisal.

Mrs. Currie: The health authority's further work on this option appraisal, which should take about three months, should include examination of all the relevant factors, including an assessment of the outcome of the inquiry into the Norwich southern bypass.

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will make a statement about future plans for the St. Andrews, Hellesdon and the David Rice hospitals in Norwich.

Mrs. Currie: The East Anglian regional health authority's current proposals for health service provision for the district include plans for a new district general hospital in Norwich, the first phase of which is to be an acute mental illness unit. If Hellesdon is eventually chosen as the site for the new hospital, the existing mental illness hospital there would close after the construction of the first phase of the new hospital. Both the David Rice and St. Andrews hospitals would be retained in the short term until the reprovision of the mental illness services in the district is completed.

Mrs. Gillian Shepherd asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how long the reappraisal of sites for the second Norwich district general hospital will take.

Mr. Patrick Thompson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what time is being allowed for the latest appraisal of sites for the new district general hospital in Norwich.

Mrs. Currie: We expect the health authority to be able to complete the further work on the option appraisal in about three months.

NHS (Pay)

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list for each regional and district health authority the difference between money allocated for nurses' pay in 1987-88 and what steps he is taking to make up the shortfall.

Mr. Newton: The cost of the review body awards for doctors, dentists, nurses, midwives and the professions allied to medicine in England will be £488 million in 1987-88. The Government have provided an additional £264 million towards that cost. Of the remainder, £200 million was covered in authorities' initial allocations for 1987-88 and £24 million will be met from their cost improvement programmes. The increased funding has not been apportioned between individual staff groups.

The additional £264 million has been allocated as follows:

	£ million
Regional Health Authorities:
Northern	16·8
Yorkshire	18·8
Trent	23·2
East Anglian	9·9

	£ million
North West Thames	18·8
North East Thames	23·8
South East Thames	20·9
South West Thames	17·0
Wessex	13·9
Oxford	10·9
South Western	16·5
West Midlands	26·7
Mersey	13·5
North Western	23·0
Regional Health Authorities total	253·7
Special Health Authorities and others	10·3
	264·0

Allocations to district health authorities are a matter for regions.

Mr. Bermingham asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what steps he intends to take to assist health authorities to meet the cost of the ancillary workers' pay award.

Mr. Newton: Negotiations are continuing in the ancillary staffs Whitley council. Health authorities will be expected to meet the cost of any award from the allocations made to them by the Government, which of course include an allowance for inflation, and from their cost improvement programmes.

Hospitals (Shared Bedrooms)

Ms. Gordon asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients on (a) general, (b) geriatric, (c) psychiatric and (d) mental handicap wards share bedrooms; if he will draw the attention of district health authorities to the disapproval of this practice expressed by his Department in 1980; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: Information on numbers of patients in wards accommodating both sexes is not collected centrally. The guidance given to health authority chairmen in 1980 still stands.

Mrs. G. L. Rowbottom

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will investigate the reason why Mrs. G. L. Rowbottom of April Cottage, 26 Old road, Stone, Staffordshire, allowance number YP533478D has not received the renewal of her family income supplement allowance book following her application in April in advance of the expiry date of 26 May last.

Mr. Portillo: Yes. I am writing today to my hon. Friend setting out the position.

Mrs. Gladys Upton

Mrs. Dunwoody asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when he intends to reply to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich with a statement about the case of Mrs. Gladys Upton, owed benefit by his Department after loss of her insurance stamps.

Mr. Portillo: I hope to be able to reply shortly to the hon. Member's letter which was received on 2 July 1987.

Tobacco (Under-age Purchase)

Mr. Speller asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to seek to increase the penalties available under law for those persons over 16 years of age who purchase cigarettes or tobacco specifically for children under 16 years of age; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: It is not a criminal offence for persons aged over 16 to purchase tobacco products. Their sale to children under 16 is illegal under the Protection of Children (Tobacco) Act 1986, and the fine on conviction is up to level 3 on the standard scale (£400). The rate of level 3 can be increased by order to reflect inflation.

Income Levels

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) if he will publish a table in the Official Report showing the number of retirement pensioners and the percentage they constitute of the retirement pensioners' population who live on between 100 per cent. and 140 per cent. of the supplementary benefit level for each year since 1979 in Scotland;

(2) for each year since 1979, what percentage of Scottish retirement pensioners lived below the supplementary benefit level;

(3) for each year since 1979, what percentage of Scottish retirement pensioners lived on or below supplementary benefit levels;

(4) if he will publish as a table in the Official Report the number of Scottish sick and disabled people living on between 100 per cent. and 140 per cent. of the supplementary benefit level and the percentage they constitute of the sick and disabled for each year since 1979;

(5) for each year since 1979, what number of Scottish retirement pensioners lived on or below supplementary benefit levels;

(6) what number of Scottish retirement pensioners lived below supplementary benefit levels for each year since 1979;

(7) for each year since 1979, what number and percentage of sick and disabled people in Scotland lived: (a) on or below supplementary benefit levels and (b) below supplementary benefit levels.

Mr. Portillo: I have asked officials to consider both whether it is possible to produce statistically valid figures and whether each reply can be prepared without incurring disproportionate cost. I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Pharmacists

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what arrangements are being made for payments to pharmacists who withdraw from their National Health Service contracts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Newton: Provision for compensation payments to certain pharmacists in Great Britain who withdraw from their NHS contracts was included in the overall provision for the family practitioner services for 1987-88. However the votes do not include subheads under which payments can be made and Parliamentary approval to new subheads in Class XIV Vote 2, Class XVI Vote 17 and Class XVII Vote 7 will be sought in Supplementary Supply Estimates.

Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £3 million will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Hospitals (Liverpool)

Mr. Parry asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many beds will be provided at the Royal Liverpool Infirmary following the relocation of services from St. Paul's eye hospital and The Seamen's dispensary;

(2) how many hospital beds there are at present in St. Paul's eye hospital and The Seamen's dispensary, Liverpool.

Mrs. Currie [pursuant to her reply, 10 July 1987, c. 311]: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks in precisely the form requested. The latest information available centrally is given in the table. For current information the hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of the Liverpool health authority.

Average daily number of available beds and occupied beds during 1986

Liverpool Women's	59·0	43·4

[1] Bed occupancy figures are based on a midnight count and do not therefore reflect the use of beds by patients who do not stay overnight.
[2] Out-patient facilities only.

Unemployment Benefit

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many unemployed people have been disqualified from unemployment benefit on grounds of voluntary unemployment at each unemployment benefit office in Greater London since the new rules came into operation in October 1986; in how many cases the disqualification was for the maximum period; and what were the comparable figures for a similar period in 1983.

Mr. Portillo [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987]: I regret that the information is not available in the precise form requested. However the following table shows the number of disqualifications from unemployment benefit imposed under section 20(1) of the Social Security Act 1975 at each adjudication office in the Department of Employment which deals, wholly or partly, with cases from the Greater London area. Later figures are not yet available. Information is not collected on the length of disqualifications and it could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Eggar: Orders are placed with small businesses which are able to satisfy the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's value-for-money requirements. The value of such procurement since 1984 was:

	£ million
1984-85	1·766
1985-86	4·180
1986-87	6·695

One third of Foreign and Commonwealth Office procurement is from the central agencies. No data are available on how much of this business is with small firms.

Commercial departments of Diplomatic Service posts give a wide range of help to British exporters, including small firms.

For example, in 1984, 1985 an 1986 they assisted 74,598, 77,325 and 76,942 British business visitors and handled 58,491, 60,485 and 65,473 market information inquiries, respectively. Posts do not keep separate statistics showing the help given to small firms but these represent a significant proportion of the overall work load.

Visas

Mr. Jacques Arnold asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he is satisfied with the handling of visitor's visas at the high commission in New Delhi; what proportion of visa applications is granted; and what delay is involved between applications for and the granting of visas.

Mr. Eggar: The visit-visa operation continues to operate smoothly at posts in the sub-continent, including New Delhi where around 300 applications per day are currently being handled. Nearly 90 per cent. of applications are granted. The vast majority of visas are issued within 24 hours.

Plutonium

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to ensure that plutonium exported to France is covered by peaceful end use safeguards restrictions; and what current plans there are to export plutonium to France and in what quantities.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I have been asked to reply.

Exports of plutonium to France, like those to other member states of the European Community, are covered by the standard format set out in the reply given by my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, North (Mr. Eggar) on 18 December 1986 at columns 611-12.

Information on exports to individual countries was and remains confidential for both commercial and security reasons.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will examine during his next meeting with the Foreign Minister of the Federal Republic of Germany the implications for current European nuclear disarmament negotiations of the forward basing of French intermediate range nuclear weapons on the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany;

(2) what discussions he has had with his counterpart in the Federal Republic of Germany on the implications for the nuclear non-proliferation treaty of French plans to make available to the Federal Republic of Germany dual key control on forward-based French intermediate range nuclear weapons deployed on West German territory.

Mr. Mellor: We know of no French plans to deploy French intermediate-range nuclear weapons on the territory of the Federal Republic of Germany. The French Prime Minister said in a newspaper interview at the end of June that there is no question of deploying French nuclear weapons outside French territory.

Mr. Frank Cook asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will raise the implications for nuclear arms control in Europe of the planned deployment of neutron weapons by France when he next attends (a) the Western European Union and (b) the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation Foreign Ministers Group;

(2) if he will direct the United Kingdom ambassador to the United Nations committee on disarmament to initiate discussions on the prospects of nuclear arms control in the light of French plans to deploy neutron weapons in Europe.

Mr. Mellor: We know of no French plans to deploy neutron weapons in Europe.

Agreements and Treaties

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those international agreements and treaties to which Her Majesty's Government are a signatory.

Mr. Eggar: The texts of all treaties to which we are signatory or a party are laid before Parliament and are published as Command Papers. Those which are in force for the United Kingdom are published in the treaty series of Command Papers which has an annual index.

The most comprehensive list of treaties entered into by the United Kingdom is "Parry's Index of British Treaties 1101-1968", a copy of which is in the Library of the House.

El Salvador

Mr. Corbyn asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the Government's policy towards the recent [illegible]point peace plan for El Salvador.

Mr. Eggar: Our policy in El Salvador is to support President Duarte's efforts to consolidate democratic institutions and the rule of law, and to end insurgency and terrorism. We welcome his efforts to promote regional reconciliation and were disappointed that the FMLN failed to attend the most recent meeting last September called by President Duarte for that purpose.

Soviet Foreign Minister (Statement)

Mr. Dalyell asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, pursuant to his answer of 13 July, he will publish in the Official Report an account of the statement mady by the Soviet Foreign Minister to Her Majesty's ambassador in Moscow; and what response has now been made by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to him on 13 July.

EC Foreign Ministers (Copenhagen Meeting)

Mr. Rhodes James asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the meeting of European Community Foreign Minsters in Copenhagen on 13 July.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I attended a meeting with other Foreign Ministers of the Twelve on 13 July in the framework of European political co-operation. We adopted statements on East-West relations, the middle east and Afghanistan. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

The discussion of East-West relations covered recent developments in the Soviet Union, the prospects for current arms control negotiations, and the CSCE follow-up meeting in Vienna.

We reaffirmed our support for an international conference on the middle east, recalled our commitment to respect for human rights in the occupied territories, and agreed that the Twelve should continue to contribute to economic and social development in the territories.

We agreed that the Twelve should pursue their contacts with all the interested parties in the middle east.

We noted the action taken by Syria against the Abu Nidal organisation, following the firm stand taken last year by the Twelve and other members of the international community in response to Syrian involvement in terrorism. We agreed that the Twelve would lift their ban on high-level contacts with Syria, but leave their other measures against Syria in place.

We also discussed South Africa, and asked officials to study the implementation of the measures agreed by the Twelve last September.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Life-sentence Prisoners

Ms. Short asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many prisoners, who have received sentences of life imprisonment in the non-jury Diplock courts where the trial judge has made a minimum term recommendation, have been released on licence or otherwise, before the expiry of the recommendation, in the last 15 years.

Mr. Stanley: One - on medical grounds.

Draft Matrimonial and Family Proceedings (Northern Ireland) Order

Mr. Archer asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which organisations and individuals made representations or submissions concerning the draft Matrimonial and Family Proceedings (NI) Order; and of these which opposed and which supported provisions in the order relating to financial relief.

Mr. Stanley: I shall reply to the right hon. and learned Member shortly.

Flooding (Castlereagh)

Mr. John David Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he has received any representations about flooding in the vicinity of 79 to 106 Newtownbredas road in the borough to Castlereagh on 10 July; if there has been any previous concern expressed about the inadequacy of the storm drainage in the roadway at this location; and if he has any proposals to improve the existing drainage system.

Mr. Needham: I shall reply to the right hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

WALES

Farm Rents

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the average rise in farm rents per hectare, for farms which experienced, a rent change, for Welsh tenants during the last full year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Walker: The latest information available is for the period mid-October 1985 to mid-October 1986 and shows that for the 30 per cent. of farms which had a rent change, the average rent per hectare rose from £40·12 to £48·43, an increase of 20·7 per cent.

Agricultural Land

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the agricultural land which became vacant in 1986 in the tenanted sector was subsequently lost to that sector.

Mr. Peter Walker: Figures are not available separately for Wales. However, based on the results of the annual rent inquiry published by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, some 48·4 per cent. of the total area of agricultural land which fell vacant in 1986 in the tenanted sector of England and Wales was not subsequently relet.

Housing (Planning Appeals)

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the occasions on which planning permission has been granted for residential housing developments on appeal to his Department since 1979.

Mr. Grist: Welsh Office records of planning permissions granted for residential housing development on appeal show the name of the developer, the site, and the district in which the site lies. They also give a brief description of the development but not the number of dwellings unless this has been specified in the planning application.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Peter Walker: The total expenditure on press and public relations in 1986-87 was £969,057. This figure includes expenditure on salaries and accommodation for all the information grades and support staff, based on the ready reckoner figures for 1986-87.

Estimated expenditure for the current year is £598,500 —a budget figure only—as the ready reckoner tables for 1987-88 are not yet available.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Wales what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Peter Walker: The total spending in 1986-87 on television, radio, newspaper and promotional literature amounted to £406,965.

The estimated spend for the current year for newspaper, television and radio advertising, together with other promotional literature, is £598,500.

Pensioners

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many people of pensionable age there are at present in Wales; what proportion of the population they represent; and what were the corresponding figures for 1957, 1967 and 1987.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is given in the following table. Data for 1987 are not yet available.

Number of Persons of Pensionable Age[1] in Wales

	In thousands	As a percentage of total population
1986	542.4	19.2
1977	504.7	18.0
1967	434.7	16.0
1957	373.0	14.3

Source: Office of Population Censuses and Surveys

[1] Pensionable age is taken as 65 years and over for males 60 years and over for females.

Mortgage Repossessions

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many mortgage repossessions occurred in Wales in each year since 1979.

Mr. Grist: This information is not collected centrally.

Rent Arrears

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the tenants of each local housing authority in Wales are behind with their rent payments; and in each case what proportion of the total number of tenants they represent.

Mr. Grist: The information is not collected centrally.

EMPLOYMENT

Labour Statistics

Mr. Tim Smith asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the current level of unemployment.

Mr. Canavan asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the total number of unemployed people in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library. On 11 June 1987 the number of unemployed claimants in the United Kingdom was 2,905,325.

Industrial Accidents

Mr. John Evans asked the Secretary of State for Employment what have been the numbers of accidents in manufacturing industry and the building industry for each of the last five years.

Mr. Nicholls: The table gives the available information. Data collected under the new reporting regulations, which came into force in April 1986 are not yet available.

Area Manpower Boards

Ms. Armstrong asked the Secretary of State for Employment if he will outline his plans for area manpower boards; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fowler: I have written to the chairman of the Manpower Services Commission asking for the commission's proposals for establishing a degree of employer representation on area manpower boards which reflects the increased employer representation which is to be introduced for the commission.

Benefits

Mr. Pike asked the Secretary of State for Employment what is the number of people in receipt of unemployment benefit in the constituencies of (a) Burnley, (b) Pendle, (c) Hyndburn and (d) Rossendale and Darwen.

Mr. Lee: The following information is in the Library.

Unemployed claimants of benefits—11 June 1987

Burnley constituency	4,943
Pendle constituency	3,722
Hyndburn constituency	3,235
Rossendale and Darwen constituency	3,735

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(2) what was the total spending by the Manpower Services Commission on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(3) what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(4) what was the total spending by the Manpower Services Commission on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(5) what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Fowler: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Departmental Cash Limits

Mr. Thurnham asked the Secretary of State for Employment if any changes will be made to the cash limits on his Department's Votes for 1987-88.

Mr. Fowler: The cash limit on class VII, Vote 2, relating to administrative expenditure by the Department of employment will be reduced by £1,769,000 from £63,860,000 to £62,091,000. This is to compensate for an overspend of £1,769,000 in 1986-87 and follows the standard practice whereby the cash limit for this financial year is reduced by the amount of the previous year's overspend.

The running costs control limit for 1987-88 will also be reduced by £2,337,000 from £402,435,000 to £400,098,000.

The Department is reviewing its monitoring procedures for payments in order to improve its cash-limit control.

Textiles and Clothing Industries

Mr. Tom Clarke asked the Secretary of State for Employment what information he has concerning the number of people employed as full-time equivalents in the textiles and clothing industries for each quarter in the last eight years.

Mr. Lee [pursuant to his reply, Thursday 16 July 1987]: There is insufficient detail in the quarterly employment estimates to form the basis of a calculation of a full-time equivalent series. Estimates of total employees and, where available, part-time employees are shown in the table.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Irish Ex-Service Men

Sir John Biggs-Davison asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if, following the enactment of the Irish Soldiers and Sailors Land Trust Act 1987, he will give particulars of any Irish ex-Service men of the first world war on the waiting list of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive; and if he will give particulars of any such Irish ex-Service men drawing war pensions from the Department of Health and Social Security who have not received help from the Irish Soldiers and Sailors Land Trust.

Mrs. Chalker: There are two Irish ex-service men to the first world war on the waiting list of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive. As the Irish Sailors and Soldiers Land Trust does not have records of former tenants, it is not possible to answer the second part of the question.

Overseas Staff (Pay)

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the pay scale for (a) clerical support staff and (b) locally engaged staff employed at British posts in (i) India, (ii) Pakistan, (iii) Bangladesh, (iv) Ghana and (v) Nigeria.

Mr. Eggar: The pay scales are as follows:

(a) United Kingdom-based clerical support staff (Diplomatic Service grade 10) are on the same basic salary scale worldwide:
Minimum £7,542—Maximum £8,712 per annum.
As for all United Kingdom-based staff, these pay scales are supplemented by foreign allowances which differ from post to post.

(b) Locally-engaged staff pay scales are:

	Minimum £	Maximum £
India	781	4,798
Pakistan	588	6,370
Bangladesh	491	6,967
Ghana	153	6,900
Nigeria	310	8,255

All the pay scales are expressed on an annual basis in rounded sterling amounts and converted at the latest available exchange rates.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Eggar: Total expenditure on press and public relations was as follows:

£ million

	1986-87	1987-88 Estimate
Payment to Central Office of Information for overseas information material and related activities	18·7	19·6
Other Information Services	0·7	0·9
Running costs of Diplomatic Wing Information/News Department	[1]1·9	2·0
Running costs of ODA Wing Information Department	0·2	0·2
Costs of Information Staff at overseas posts	[1]14·6	15·9
Total	[1]36·1	38·6

[1] Indicates provisional figures.

Most of this expenditure is incurred in carrying out the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's responsibilities for the projection of Britain's image and Her Majesty's Government's policies overseas.

Mr. Frank Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what what the total spending by his Department on television radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Eggar: Foreign and Commonwealth Office expenditure on advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87 was:

	FCO Diplomatic Wing £	FCO ODA Wing £
1986-87	335,754	228,347
Estimates for 1987-88 are	198,000	240,000

This expenditure relates mainly to advertising for recruitment; advertising relating to the Anglo-Soviet agreement on the settlement of claims (1986-87 only); publicity to promote the new entitlement of certain British residents overseas to vote in British and European Parliament elections; and promotional literature in the United Kingdom. A breakdown of these figures to identify the medium used is not available.

Kuwaiti Oil Tankers

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current policy of Her Majesty's Government in respect of reflagging Kuwaiti oil tankers operating in the Gulf.

Mr. Mellor: The reflagging of merchant shipping is a commercial and administrative matter. It does not require our approval but does require applicants to satisfy certain requirements imposed by the Department of Transport. These requirements apply to all applicants wherever they originate.

Syria

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's relations with Syria.

Mr. Mellor: We have no plans for high level bilateral contacts or for resuming diplomatic relations with Syria. We note the Syrian action against Abu Nidal but look for further convincing evidence of a sustained change in Syrian policy on terrorism.

ENERGY

Nuclear Installations

Mr. Flynn asked the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to make a response to the recent report by the advisory committee for the safety of nuclear installations.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The recent report of the independent Advisory Committee on the Safety of Nuclear Installations does not require an immediate response from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. I note, however, that in his foreword to the report, the chairman welcomed the Government's recent decision to increase salary scales for the NII.

Mr. Flynn asked the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make it his policy to invite safety inspectors from the International Atomic Energy operational safety review team to assist the nuclear installations inspectorate until such time as the latter has fulfilled its full desired complement of inspectors.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The NII of the HSE is able to carry out all its essential statutory functions with its existing complement of staff. The operational safety review teams of the IAEA were never intended to perform the role of the national regulatory authorities of member countries.

Nuclear Safety (Report)

Mr. Flynn asked the Secretary of State for Energy what response he has made to the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's nuclear energy agency report, "Electricity, Nuclear Power and Full Cycle Data in Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development Countries"; and if he will reappraise his nuclear safety programme in the light of the report.

Mr. Michael Spicer: As this report is of a purely statistical nature, compiled from data supplied by each member country, no response is called for.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Frank Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Parkinson: The provisional figure for expenditure by my Department on press and public relations in 1986-87 is £13,876,852. Estimated expenditure for the current year is £9,287,647.

The bulk of the programme costs are in respect of the energy efficiency campaign. Special effort was put into the campaign during Energy Efficiency year 1986.

Notes:

The figures (in cash prices) include:

(i) programme expenditure on information and publicity material including advertising, displays, exhibitions, films, promotions, publications, research, seminars, theatre groups and the press office;

(ii) staff costs (salaries, accommodation and common services) for all permanent information service and support staff in post on 1 April each year based upon ready reckoner figures.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Energy, what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Parkinson: The provisional figures for expenditure by my Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87 was £7,060,000. The bulk of this expenditure was related to the special effort put into the energy efficiency campaign during Energy Efficiency Year. This figure excludes costs included in gas privatisation. Estimated expenditure for the current year is £2,520,000.

ESCOM (South Africa)

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what information he has concerning the loan of United Kingdom electricity supply industry staff to ESCOM in South Africa;

(2) whether all uranium imported into the United Kingdom from (a) South Africa and (b) Namibia is treated as covered by the International Atomic Energy or Euratom safeguards;

(3) whether there has been any withdrawal of uranium of South African or Namibian origin from international safeguards for national security reasons (a) before May 1979 and (b) since May 1979;

(4) what proportion of the total uranium stockpile held in the United Kingdom is under International Atomic Energy Authority or Euratom safeguards;

(5) whether he will place in the Library any correspondence between (a) Her Majesty's Government and the European Commissioners and (b) between Her Majesty's Government and the Australian and Canadian attachés to the European Community on the matter of the application of nuclear safeguards to uranium imports to the EEC for use in the United Kingdom, in each case since May 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Boateng asked the Secretary of State for Energy what proportion of the uranium stocks held by (a) British Nuclear Fuels Limited, (b) the Central Electricity Generating Board, (c) the South of Scotland Electricity Board and (d) the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority is of (i) South African and (ii) Namibian origin.

Mr. Michael Spicer: This is a matter for the industries and I have asked the chairmen of BNFL, the CEGB and the UKAEA to write to the hon. Member. The SSEB is the responsibility of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Gas and Electricity Disconnections

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Energy how many people in Wales were disconnected from their (a) gas, and (b) electricity supplies during the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Morrison: This is a matter for the industries themselves. I have asked the chairmen of the Electricity Council and British Gas plc to write to the hon. Member with the information requested.

SCOTLAND

Foula Pier

Mr. Wallace asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in discussions between his Department and Shetlands Islands council towards final approval of the Foula pier improvement scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We are now considering the proposal for pier improvements at Foula in the light of the discussions between the Scottish Development Department and Shetland Islands council. We hope to reach a decision shortly.

Clydesdale Bank

Mr. Salmond asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what aspects of the sale of the Clydesdale bank he discussed at his recent meeting with representatives of the National Australia bank; on what date the meeting took place; when he first learned about the proposed sale; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My right hon. and learned Friend met representatives of the National Australia bank at their request on 6 July. The purpose of that meeting was for the National Australia bank representatives to give my right hon. and learned Friend prior notice of their intentions in relation to the Clydesdale bank, as subsequently announced publicly on 7 July. My right hon. and learned Friend had been alerted to the proposed sale on 2 July.

National Australia Bank

Mr. Salmond asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the implications for the Scottish economy of the proposed purchase by the National Australia bank of the Clydesdale bank; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: The question of any statutory intervention, of course, falls to the consideration of my right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, however, in terms of his responsibilities for the Scottish economy, has noted with interest the statement by the National Australia bank management that they intend that the Clydesdale bank will have a greater degree of autonomy than it has enjoyed in the recent past, and that they see Clydesdale as a springboard for further expansion in the United Kingdom and Europe.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total expenditure by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Rifkind: The running costs of the Scottish Information Office in 1986-87, including the cost of paid publicity, were £1·5 million. The costs for 1987-88 are estimated at £1·7 million.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Rifkind: The total expenditure by my Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87 was £926,000. Estimated expenditure for the current financial year is £1·2 million.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: My Department operates a wide range of measures, designed to improve the performance and competitiveness of businesses, large and small. Over the past three years, the measures taken by the Government to reduce burdens on business, some of which have particular application to small firms, have been set out in the White Paper "Building Businesses . . . Not Barriers" (Cmnd. 9794) published in May 1986, and in the progress report "Encouraging Enterprise" published in May this year.

As these documents show, work is continuing in the company law field. In particular, the procedures introduced by the companies registration offices (CROs) for reminding companies of their filing obligations have proved of real value to small business men. Since the introduction of the reminder procedure for filing annual returns and accounts at the CRO, compliance rates have risen from around 60 per cent. to approximately 80 per cent.

Consultative documents have been issued inviting views on accounting and audit requirements for small companies, procedures for filing annual accounts and returns at the CROs and abolition of the ultra vires rule with a view to action in the next Companies Bill. That Bill is also likely to include further measures designed to simplify company law requirements and, where possible, remove them altogether, especially where small business men are concerned. In addition, we currently await comments on the consultative document published jointly with the Inland Revenue earlier this month on possible changes in tax and company law aimed at making it easier for small companies to disincorporate.

The new regional development grant scheme for development areas introduced in November 1984 was designed to be particularly favourable to firms with up to 200 employees. The main indicator of success in meeting this objective is that 83 per cent. of all grants made by the Department since the beginning of the scheme has gone to firms of this size. This represents an amount of grant of £78 million, which has been paid towards projects involving the creation of some 27,000 jobs. Comparable figures for the proportion of grants under the old regional development grant scheme going to small firms are not available but there is no doubt that the proportion was much lower.

On 17 February 1987 the Minister of State announced simplified arrangements for regional selective assistance offers of up to £25,000. Some indication of the impact of these new arrangements will be given by the trends in the number and value of offers of this size but it is too early to draw any conclusions from the information available so far. Twenty per cent. by value of DTI offers of RSA in the last three years have been made to firms with fewer than 200 employees; this amounts to over £80 million in grant offered.

The business improvement services scheme (BIS), a package of measures specifically tailored to the needs of small firms, was introduced in November 1984 in areas of England which have suffered a decline in the steel, shipbuilding and textiles industries. The scheme was extended in March 1986 to certain similarly affected fisheries areas and again in July 1986 to west Cornwall to provide support for small firms in that area, following the closure of the Geevor tin mine. At 3 May 1987 almost 6,000 offers had been made with a value of £45 million. It is too early to make an assessment of the performance of BIS but it has been a popular scheme. Initial reactions by the business community have been favourable.

The exchange risk guarantee scheme (ERGS) has operated since 1978; following its most recent review in July 1985, it was decided that the resources available should be concentrated on small firms. The scheme enables firms to take advantage of low-interest foreign currency loans from the European Coal and Steel Community. These loans can also attract a subsidy linked to the number of jobs created.

The period of loan for which ERGS cover is provided is, typically, seven to 10 years. The fluctuation in exchange rates over the period of time will ultimately determine the cost of providing such cover and, therefore, the precise cost will not be known until the expiry of the loan period. In these circumstances specific performance indicators are not considered appropriate. However, the operation of the scheme is kept under regular review.

Under the support for innovation scheme there is a minimum of £100,000 eligible costs below which applications are only considered from small firms. Such applications are subject to a simplified appraisal process and the criteria are applied less stringently. Since April 1985, 352 small firms have been offered assistance involving expenditure of £6 million on total project costs of £24 million. Projects from small firms with costs in excess of £100,000 are not given favourable treatment.

Over the last three years about 15,000 firms with up to 500 employees have received subsidised consultancy through the various elements of the business and technical advisory services (BTAS) aimed at improving marketing, design and management. About 90 per cent. of those assisted had fewer than 200 employees; more than half had fewer than 50 employees. Individual BTAS projects are monitored in the short term to ensure that firms get value for money and benefit from the experience. In the longer term, the Department, as part of its overall evaluation of expenditure, regularly carries out assessments of the benefits of funding support for business. A report on the SFI scheme, covering SFI support for all sizes of business, will be published this autumn.

The British Overseas Trade Board provides a wide range of services to exporters. Although not available exclusively for small businesses, these are designed with the needs of such firms particularly in mind. Small firms account for over 70 per cent. of the board's contact with industry, and continued attention will be given to encouraging and enabling these firms to develop their potential for breaking successfully into overseas markets.

The board attempts as rigorous an assessment as possible of the value of its expenditure on the services it provides. These assessments can never be wholly accurate but indicate that the BOTB services examined are linked to around £2 billion of exports which would not otherwise have been won. This produces a ratio of exports to expenditure of about 50:1.

Mock Auctions

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will seek to amend the Mock Auctions Act 1961 in order to strengthen the powers of enforcement officers.

Mr. Maude: There are no plans at present to amend the Mock Auctions Act 1961.

Mr. Waller asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many successful prosecutions took place in each of the last five years for offences under the provisions of the Mock Auctions Act 1961.

Mr. Maude: The number of successful prosecutions under the provisions of the Mock Auctions Act 1961 in each of the years 1982, 1983, 1984 and 1985 were as follows:

	Number
1982	90
1983	33
1984	24
1985	7

Figures for 1986 are not yet available but are expected to be published in September this year.

Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will give details of the importation of turtle products by (a) description, (b) weight and (c) value in each of the past five years.

Mr. Alan Clark: Turtle products are not separately identified in the UK Overseas Trade Statistics. However, import permits for turtle products are granted by the Department of the Environment in accordance with European Council regulation 3626/82, which implements the convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora within the European Community, from which the following information has been obtained.

Figures are not yet available for 1986. Information on the value of turtle products is not available; with the exception of meat and calipee (for which weight is available), the only information relates to the number of items.

British Telecom

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster whether he will set out the latest information regarding shareholding in British Telecom using the same format as that given in his reply to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) on 20 January 1986.

Mr. Butcher: As my previous answer to the hon. Member for Coventry South-East (Mr. Nellist) made clear, this is properly a matter for British Telecom. Its 1987 annual report gives the most recent available figures on categories of shareholdings. A copy of this is available in the Library of the House.

Clydesdale Bank

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, pursuant to the answer of 13 July, when he expects to be in a position to announce his decision on the possible reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission of the proposed purchase by the National Australia bank of the Clydesdale bank.

Mr. Maude: My right hon. and noble Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry will be in a position to make a decision on the possible reference of this proposal when he has received the advice of the Director General of Fair Trading. The Director General will submit his advice as soon as is reasonably practicable.

British Shipbuilders (Ferry Order)

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster on what date his Department first knew of the potential PZ order for ferries from British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Atkins: My Department was first approached in February 1986 about a possible order for a series of ferry hulls. British Shipbuilders became involved in March 1986 in discussions about building a series of complete ships.

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what assistance was provided by his Department in the successful tender for the PZ order to British Shipbuilders.

Mr. Atkins: Considerable assistance was provided for this order from the shipbuilding intervention fund under the rules of the EC fifth directive on aid to shipbuilding. The tender also took into account the benefit of export credit provided on OECD understanding terms.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the total spending by the Department of Trade and Industry on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Butcher: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the total spending by the Department of Trade and Industry on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Butcher: Information is not readily available to distinguish between expenditure on advertising in newspapers and that in the press generally. Nor is it readily available for amounts spent other than centrally by my Department.

The figures which are readily available are:

Advertising

1986-87	—	2,921	986,798	1,007,569

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers (Pay)

Mr. Redwood asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science if, when reviewing teachers' pay, he will consider extending the boundaries of outer London weighting to include teachers working in Berkshire.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. Friend has it in mind to refer the question of London weighting allowances to the interim advisory committee.

Research

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proportion of Science and Engineering Research Council/Medical Research Council funds are spent on fundamental research compared with industrially relevant development work.

Mr. Jackson: The information is not available exactly in form requested. A breakdown of Science and Engineering Research Council and Medical Research Council spending into the four categories — basic research, strategic applied research, specific applied research and experimental development — is given in table A23 on page 22 of the 1986 "Annual Review of Government Funded Research and Development," a copy of which is in the Library. The definition of the four categories is given in annex 3, page 183, of the review.

Mr. Wilkinson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science to what extent private industry contributes financially to scientific research in universities and polytechnics.

Mr. Jackson: In respect of universities, I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) on 8 July 1987 at column 156. Comparable information is not collected centrally for polytechnics.

Edinburgh University

Mr. Knapman asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) for what purpose the department of Bacteriology at the university of Edinburgh applied for funds from the Medical Research Council; and why this application was not acceded to in full;

(2) if the work that the department of bacteriology at the university of Edinburgh proposed to the Medical Research Council is being carried out at other centres.

Mr. Jackson: The department of bacteriology at the University of Edinburgh applied to the Medical Research Council for funds to support research on susceptibility to meningitis (the project is entitled "The Secretor State and Susceptibility to Bacterial Meningitis"). The application was carefully considered by the council's physiological systems and disorders board in the light of advice from expert referees. The decision was that the application was not of sufficient scientific merit to justify full support, but that it should receive limited support to enable the applicants to confirm the premliminary hypothesis on which the study is based.

The Medical Research Council is not aware of any similar work being done in this country. However, I understand that similar work is at present being done in the Netherlands.

Conservative Central Office (Correspondence)

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) pursuant to the answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 37, whether letters referred to Conservative Central Office or his political adviser have the status of a ministerial reply; and if he will make a statement;

(2) pursuant to the answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 37, whether he can estimate how many letters addressed to him on ministerial business were referred to Conservative Central Office or his political adviser;

(3) pursuant to the answer of 6 July, Official Report, column 37, on what basis letters addressed to him as Minister were referred to Conservative Central Office or his political adviser for replies.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: All letters from candidates were considered for reply by Conservative Central Office or my political adviser, as were letters relating to policies announced in the Conservative manifesto. Replies on Conservative Central Office paper do not have the status of a ministerial reply. About 15 replies on educational matters were deal with in this way.

Student Grants

Mr. Mullin asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply of 6 July, Official Report, column 37, if he will make it his policy to regard mandatory levies as part of fees for the purposes of the student grant.

Mr. Jackson: No.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mrs. Rumbold: Total spending, including staff costs, on press and public relations by the Department of Education and Science in 1986-87 was £1,937,849. The estimated expenditure for the current year is £2,305,287.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Rumbold: Total spending on advertising and other promotional literature by the Department of Education and Science in 1986-87 is as follows:

Newspapers	532,000
Television	—
Radio	—
Other promotional literature	533,000

The estimated expenditure for the current year is £1,520,000.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Simon Brown

Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to the conditions under which Simon Brown, aged 17 years, has been held in police cells at Horseferry road police station; for how long he has been held there; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how and when the family of Simon Brown, aged 17 years, were informed that he was to be moved from police cells at Horseferry road police station to Ashford remand centre; and if he will make a statement;

(3) if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as to how many visits Simon Brown was allowed from members of his family while he was being held in police cells at Horseferry road police station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Police cells in the metropolis are the responsibility of the Commissioner of Police. The police provide the best conditions they can under difficult circumstances, but we are well aware that facilities may leave much to be desired. The measures which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary announced yesterday are designed to alleviate the present situation.

I am informed that Simon Brown was held in Horseferry road police cells from 8 to 11 July before being transferred to Ashford remand centre.

The police do not allow visits to prisoners in Horseferry road police cells although they do allow food and changes of clothing to be taken in by the prisoner's family.

The police are not obliged to inform prisoners' families when they are transferred to prison custody, but they do so if the prisoner requests it. No record is kept which would enable the police to say whether that was done in this case.

Ashford Remand Centre

Mr. Cox asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what policy is followed at Ashford remand centre in allowing visits to people being held on remand; on what days visits are allowed; how people are informed of this and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: Because of a substantial increase in the population of Ashford remand centre and the limited accommodation available for visits, my right hon. Friend authorised, exceptionally, last year a reduction in the minimum of 15 minutes on Mondays to Saturdays normally allowed for visits to remand prisoners. The current provision at Ashford is for 15-minute visits on alternate weekdays with 10-minute visits on Saturdays.

Inmates are informed of the visiting arrangements on arrival at the establishment and details are contained in notices on all landings. When next of kin are notified of an inmate's reception, information on visiting arrangements is provided. In addition, details are displayed on notices in the visitors' centre outside the remand centre, at the gate and in the passage leading to the visits room.

Foreign Visitors

Mr. Madden asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) ordinary and (b) business visitors entered the United Kingdom in each month since November 1985 from each of the following countries: (i) India, (ii) Pakistan, (iii) Bangladesh, (iv) Ghana and (v) Nigeria.

Mr. Renton: The latest available information is given in the following table:

Private Security Industry

Mr. George asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department if, in the light of the recent robbery at the Knightsbridge safe deposit centre, he will order an urgent review of the private security industry; and if he will seek to impose statutory controls over its operation.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. While the private security industry shold be properly regulated, it does not follow that the answer lies in statutory regulation. We have made it clear that we look to the industry itself to provide self-regulation, and much progress has been made by both the British Security Industry Association and the International Professional Security Association.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Hurd: The total running cost of the Home Office public relations branch, excluding direct expenditure on paid publicity, in 1986-87 was £753,000. The forecast expenditure in the current financial year is £877,500.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Hurd: The total amount spent by the Home Office on advertising, promotional literature and other paid publicity, in 1986-87 was £5·7 million. Estimated expenditure for the current financial year is £9·1 million.

Metropolitan Police (Publicity)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total spending by the Metropolitan police on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that staffing and accommodation costs of the Directorate of Public Affairs and spending on recruitment and other advertising and other promotional literature totalled £4,444,103 in 1986-87. The estimate for 1987-88 is £4,654,926.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total spending by the Metropolitan police on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature, in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I understand from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that expenditure by the Metropolitan police on all forms of recruitment and other advertising, and other promotional literature totalled £2,269,000 in 1986-87. The estimate for 1987-88 is £2,483,000.

PRIME MINISTER

Public Sector Workers (Pay Increases)

Mr. Grocott asked the Prime Minister if she will list the most recent percentage pay increases agreed with the following public sector workers: (a) university lecturers, (b) the police, (c) doctors and dentists, and (d) civil servants.

The Prime Minister: The information requested is as follows:

	Percentage increase	Date of most recent increase
University Lecturers	16·6	[1] December 1986
Police	7·5	1 September 1986
Doctors and Dentists	7·7	1 April 1987
Civil Servants	4·6	1 April 1987

[1] First stage of a staged deal. Second increase of 7·4 per cent. due from 1 March 1988.

International Society for Krishna Consciousness

Mr. Bidwell asked the Prime Minister what representations she has received concerning the use of Bhaktivedanta manor at Letchmore heath as a temple by the International Society for Krishna Consciousness; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I have recently received a petition from the International Society for Krishna Consciousness and a letter from my hon. Friend the Member for Slough (Mr. Watts). I shall be writing to him in due course.

Westland plc

Mr. Dalyell asked the Prime Minister if, pursuant to her answer on 14 July, relating to the Westland affair, she will list each of the previous answers to which she referred, giving in each case a precise column reference in the Official Report; if she will make it her policy in future, when answering questions by alluding to previous replies, to give detailed Official Report column references; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: In my reply of 17 November 1986, at column 50, I told the hon. Gentleman that full accounts have already been given by myself and other Ministers in statements in Parliament, speeches in debates and answers to parliamentary questions, and by the head of the Home Civil Service in his evidence to the Defence Committee. This material is readily available in the Official Report and in the minutes of evidence to the Committee. The Government stand by those accounts, and see no reason to qualify or add to them.

Turtle Products

Mr. Tony Banks asked the Prime Minister whether turtle soup has been served at any official Prime Ministerial function since 1979; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Records for the period before 1982 are not available. Since 1982 there have been no occasions when turtle soup has been served at any official luncheon or dinner at No. 10 Downing street.

KMS (Government Contracts)

Mr. Madden asked the Prime Minister if she will list all Government contracts for which the organisation KMS has tendered since 1979; and if she will give the date in each case.

The Prime Minister: Details of tenders for Government contracts are not recorded centrally. Records for my office are readily available only from April 1984. No contracts have been placed with, or payments made to, KMS Limited by or on behalf of my office during that period.

Libya (United States Bombing)

Mr. Ron Brown asked the Prime Minister if she will raise with the United States Administration the question of paying compensation to the families affected by the United States bombing of Libya in 1986.

The Prime Minister: No.

Mr. Richard Branson

Mr. Brown asked the Prime Minister if she has asked Mr. Richard Branson to pay the costs of his rescue; and if she will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: No. It is not our policy to charge for rescuing those whose lives are at risk.

Publicity Expenditure

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister what was the total spending by the Cabinet Office on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

The Prime Minister: The information is not available in the precise form requested. Expenditure on press and public relations in 1986-87 by the Cabinet Office, including by No. 10 Downing street, the Management and Personnel Office, and the Central Statistical Office, as well as on such services provided to the Office of Arts and Libraries, was £551,500. An estimated £535,000 is expected to be spent on these activities in 1987-88.

Mr. Dobson asked the Prime Minister what was the total spending by the Cabinet Office on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

The Prime Minister: Such expenditure by the Cabinet Office, including the Central Statistical Office and the Management and Personnel Office, is nearly all related to recruitment by the Civil Service Commission. Total spending in 1986-87 was £2,156,000, of which £2,004,000 was on recruitment. Estimated expenditure in 1987-88 is expected to be £2,400,000, of which £2,212,000 will be on recruitment.

Obstetricians

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what was (a) the total number of obstetricians practising in the National Health Service, (b) the number and percentage of women obstetricians practising in the National Health Service, (c) the number and percentage of part-time obstetricians practising in the National Health Service and (d) the number and percentage of women part-time obstetricians of the total of part-time obstetricians practising in the National Health Service since 1974.

Mrs. Currie: The tables set out available data for England and Wales of doctors in the specialty of obstetrics and gynaecology. Data of the sex of part-time medical staff are not available prior to 1978 or for all grades. Table 2 includes part-time medical staff in the consultant, associate specialist, senior registrar and registrar grades.

Women's Health

Ms. Richardson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services whether he will list (a) the amount of grant aid allocated by Government to each voluntary organisation devoted to women's health, for each year from 1974, (b) the percentage increase or decrease in Government grants to these organisations, for each year from 1974 and (c) organisations which have ceased to receive Government grants from 1974 to date.

Mrs. Currie: The information requested would be available only at disproportionate cost.

The following is a list of voluntary organisations funded by the Department in 1986-87 which are either devoted to women's health and welfare, or of primary or particular interest to women, and of the amount of funding they received from the Department in 1986-87.

Voluntary organisations funded under Section 64 of the Health Services and Public Health Act 1968

General Scheme
Women's National Cancer Control Campaign	68,000
Women's Health Concern	7,000
Women's Therapy Centre	5,000
Widow's Advisory Trust	20,000
London Black Women's Health Action Group	3,750
Foundation for Women's Health Research and Development (FORWARD)	40,000
Mastectomy Association	6,000
Maternity Alliance	37,000
National Childbirth Trust	42,500
La Leche League of Great Britain	6,000
National Association for Maternal and Child Welfare	10,000
Miscarriage Association	2,274
Stillbirth and Neo-natal Death Associaton	22,000
Foundation for the Study of Infant Deaths	10,000
National Women's Aids Federation	29,590
Rape Counselling and Research Project	22,000
Anorexic Family Aid	24,881
London Lesbian and Gay Switchboard (towards its telephone information service in relation to AIDS)	10,335
Central Funding Initiative for Services for Drug Misusers
City Roads (to provide additional accommodation for women and children)	72,177
Coke Hole Trust (rehabilitation service) —mother and baby unit	10,963
Phoenix House, S. Tyneside Project (to provide a residential rehabilitation unit with special facilities for women and their families)	78,051
Tranx (National Tranquilliser Advice Centre)	20,300

The Department funds many other voluntary organisations whose work is of interest to both women and men, including a number of organisations working for young children.

Balderton Hospital (Eastdale Unit)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many patients are currently in the Eastdale unit at Balderton hospital; and how many people are currently awaiting transfer to the unit.

Mrs. Currie: I understand from the Central Nottinghamshire health authority that there are six patients in the unit. Of these, two are at present away from it, one in police custody and the other on assessment leave. Seven patients have been identified as potentially suitable for short periods of phased leave and observation in the unit.

District General Hospital (East Midlands)

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he is now able to publish a firm date for the start of building work on the new district general hospital to serve Lichfield, Tamworth and Burton on Trent.

Mrs. Currie: The management of this scheme is the responsibility of the West Midlands regional health authority. I understand that building work is due to start in July 1989.

Medical and Surgical Aids

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will list the medical and surgical aids which are available (a) free of charge and (b) at a reduced cost to women aged 60 years or over and men aged 65 years or over.

Mr. Newton: A wide range of aids is available free of charge to people of pensionable age. Those available on general practitioner prescription are listed in part IXA of the "Drug Tariff", a copy of which is available in the Library. There is no comprehensive list of the aids available through the hospital and community health services.

Mr. Andrew Bowden asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of extending entitlement to concessions on the cost of medical and surgical aids to all persons aged 60 years or over.

Mr. Newton: The information on which to base a reliable estimate is not available.

Private Laboratories (Testing)

Mr. Irving asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will bring in legislation to ban private laboratories from advertising testing services to the general public.

Mrs. Currie: No. We are considering how best to ensure that private laboratories offering testing services maintain acceptable standards. The Advertising Standards Authority's guidance to the media is that advertisements from laboratories should be accepted only if the work in question is supervised by a suitably qualified person.

Kendal Hospital

Mr. Jopling asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will give the dates for the start and the completion of the new Kendal hospital.

Mrs. Currie: No firm start date is available pending final approval to contract arrangements. A decision is expected shortly.

NHS (Jobs)

Mr. Allen asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many jobs have been lost or created in Nottingham in the National Health Service (a) since 1979 and (b) since 1983.

Mr. Newton: I have interpreted "Nottingham" as referring to Nottingham district health authority. Information on jobs lost or created is not collected centrally. The table shows staff in post figures for Nottingham district health authority, at 30 September 1983 and 1985. Due to the effects of the 1982 reorganisation, data are not available for 1979 on a consistent basis with those for later years. The figures for 30 September 1985 are the latest available to this level of detail.

Marriage and Cohabitation (Trends)

Mr. Shersby asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what has been the trend over the past (a) 10 and (b) five years of the number and proportion of households consisting of (i) married and (ii) cohabiting couples.

Mrs. Currie: The available information which most closely approximates to that requested is as follows:

Great Britain

	1976	1979	1981	1984
Estimated number of private households (millions)[1]	19·3	19·7	20·1	20·5 n/a = not available.

Family Income Support Unit

Mr. Grocott asked the Secretary of State for Social Services why there is a special family income support unit that deals solely with claims from civil servants.

Mr. Portillo: There is no such unit.

Waiting Lists

Mr. John Marshall asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the size of the waiting list in the Barnet health authority; and how this compares with the waiting list in September 1986.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. Friend the information he seeks as the latest figures available centrally are for 30 September 1986.

Cystic Fibrosis (Prescriptions)

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will estimate the cost of providing free prescriptions for all sufferers from cystic fibrosis; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: All cystic fibrosis sufferers under the age of 16 are automatically exempt from charges and a number of those over 16 will be exempt on financial or other medical grounds. The cost of extending exemption to the remainder would be small but it would be unfair to single out one group from others who seek exemption on medical grounds.

Mr. McCrindle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he has any plans to make free prescriptions available for all cystic fibrosis sufferers; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Currie: We have no plans to do so.

Miss Irene Clipsom

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services when a decision will be reached by his Department's attendance allowance office at Norcross, Blackpool, in the case of Miss Irene Clipsom of 24 Mill Lane, Rugeley, Staffordshire, in respect of her mother Mrs. Clipsom, national insurance No. ZA 57 26 89 A.

Mr. Scott: A decision was given on 25 February 1987 by the Attendance Allowance Board, the independent adjudicating authority responsible for deciding whether the medical conditions for an allowance are satisfied in individual cases, and sent to Miss Clipsom on 16 March. I understand she has asked for the decision to be reviewed and this is currently being considered by the board.

Lithotripter Machine (Cost)

Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services what is the cost of purchasing a lithotripter machine.

Mrs. Currie: The purchase price of lithotripters available in this country is between £600,000 and £1,200,000.

Breast Milk Substitutes

Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will place in the Library a copy of the Food Manufacturers' Federation code on the marketing of breast milk substitues; when he expects the report of the monitoring committee; and what are the current enforcement responsibilities of the committee.

Mrs. Currie: The first general report of the committee responsible for monitoring the FMF code is expected early next year; Ministers received an interim report in June 1986. The committee has no enforcement powers. Its remit requires it to report to the Government any infringement of the code which the person or firm responsible will not remedy. I have arranged for a copy of the code to be placed in the Library.

Kidney Stones Treatment (Leeds)

Mr. Battle asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people are currently on the waiting list for treatment for kidney stones in the Leeds West and Leeds East district health authorities; and how many patients have been referred to other regional health authority areas for such treatment.

Mr. Newton: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. Member the information he seeks. Information available centrally on in-patient waiting lists is categorised according to the specialty of the consultant but not according to the intended method of treatment. With regard to the numbers of patients referred to other regional health authorities for treatment, the sample numbers held centrally are too small for a reliable estimate to be made.

The hon. Member may wish to write to the chairman of Leeds, West and Leeds, East district health authorities for the information required.

Speech Therapy Services

Mr. Steinberg asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how much has been allocated for speech therapy services by the Durham district health authority; what information he has about the shortage of speech therapists (a) in Durham district health authority, and (b) nationally; and what information he has about the effect of this shortage on the demand for private speech therapy services in the Durham district health authority area.

Mr. Newton: The information the hon. Member seeks relating to Durham district health authority is not collected centrally, and he may wish to write to the chairman of that authority for the information he requires. Nationally, the number of speech therapists employed has gone up by over 50 per cent. since 1979, and I am advised there is no general evidence of unfilled authorised posts.

Benefits (Deductions)

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many people in Wales had automatic deductions made from their basic benefit to pay for (a) electricity, and (b) gas because of debt, during the last year for which full figures are available.

Mr. Portillo: Information is not available precisely in the form requested. The number of supplementary benefit claimants in Wales who were having automatic deductions made from their benefit for payment direct to the fuel authorities in February 1986 (the latest available information) was:

	Number
Electricity	10,281
Gas	7,653

Source: Supplementary Benefit Statistics (Annual Inquiry) February 1986.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(2) what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Moore: I shall let the hon. Member have replies as soon as possible.

Departmental Budget

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services if he will set out the total social security budget of his Department in Wales, Scotland, England and each of the English regions for each year since 1979, both at outturn and 1987 prices.

Mr. Scott: Total identifiable public expenditure on the social security programme in England, Scotland and Wales is as set out for the years 1980-81 to 1985-86. Comparable figures for 1986-87 are not yet available. Figures consistent with those given in the table are not available for 1979-80. Regional analyses of expenditure in England are available only for certain benefits; detailed figures for the years to 1984-85 have been published in successive editions of "Regional Trends" from 1982 to 1987, copies of which are in the Library.

[1] Cash figures converted to constant (1986-87) prices using the GDP deflator.

[2] Figures not wholly consistent with later years. The later years have been updated with later information unavailable for 1980-81.

Supplementary Benefit

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many children in Wales under the age of 16 years live in households on or below the supplementary benefit poverty line; and what proportion of the population of that age in Wales they represent;

(2) how many people in Wales live on or below the supplementary benefit poverty line; and what proportion of the population they represent;

Mr. Wigley asked the Secretary of State for Social Services (1) how many people of pensionable age in Wales live on or below the supplementary benefit poverty line; and what proportion of their age group they represent;

(2) how many single parent families in Wales live on or below the supplementary benefit poverty line; and what proportion of such families this figure represents.

Mr. Portillo: I regret that figures which are statistically reliable cannot be provided in the manner requested.

Pensioners

Mr. Thomas asked the Secretary of State for Social Services how many pensioners in Wales, Scotland, England, and each of the English regions, are dependent on a state pension and other state benefits as their sole source of income; and in each case what proportion of the total number of pensioners in each area they represent.

Mr. Portillo: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all cases since 1980 in which he has substituted his own estimate of total expenditure for rate support grants and other purposes for that provided by a local authority.

Mr. Howard: Since 1980 the Secretary of State has substituted his own estimates of total expenditure in the following cases:

— for the purposes of the third rate support grant supplementary report for 1985-86, for Manchester, Brent and Merton. These authorities did not supply outturn information by the due date and total expenditures given on the budget returns were adjusted by the amount of changes in the contribution to the advanced further education and in-service training pools required as a result of a new method of apportionment; —for the purpose of calculating block grant entitlements in 1987-88 for

Surrey
Derbyshire
Lancashire
Staffordshire
Bedfordshire
Somerset
Cumbria
Cornwall
East Sussex
Hampshire
Isle of Wight Shropshire
Devon
Suffolk
Sunderland
Newcastle-upon-Tyne

These authorities had excluded the additional cost of the teachers' pay award on returns made to the Department.

Mr. Soley asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list all local authorities in England who have been requested since March 1987 to provide his Department with their total estimated expenditure in relation to 1987-88; and what criteria were used to select these authorities.

Mr. Howard: On 4 March 1987 all local authorities in England were asked to provide estimates of their 1987-88 total expenditure on the return of expenditure and rates (RER 88).

Further information regarding their estimated total expenditure in 1987-88 was sought from the following authorities during and after the end of March where there were doubts as to whether the information already provided was the best available.

Bedfordshire

Water Authorities (Privatisation)

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to treat the South West water authority as an exception to the proposed privatisation of water authorities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan: No.

Canary Wharf

Mr. Heddle asked the Secretary of State for the Environment what reasons have been given to the London Docklands Development Corporation as to why the master building agreement in respect of the Canary wharf was not signed by Mr. G. Ware-Travelsted on (a) the original date of 28 February stipulated by the London Docklands Development Corporation, (b) 90 days after the London Dockland Light Railway Bill received Royal Assent, 18 March 1987, as confirmed to the London Docklands Development Corporation by Mr. Ware-Travelsted's chief executive, and (c) on other dates stipulated by the London Docklands Development Corporation since then; and if he will make a statement on the present state of negotiations between the London Docklands Development Corporation and (i) Mr. Ware-Travelsted and (ii) any other party.

Mr. Ridley: I have approved the terms of LDDC's proposed agreements with Olympia and York, the developers who now lead the project, and the negotiations are in their final stages.

At the earlier dates referred to, negotiations between the LDDC and the prospective developers of Canary wharf were not sufficiently advanced for any agreement to be finalised.

Endangered Species

Mr. Cunningham asked the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will add Bombus Terrestis, Bombus Lapidavius and Apius Mellifera to the list of endangered species; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer this question shortly.

Water Quality

Mr. Janner asked the Secretary of State for the Environment when he proposes to implement the recommendations made by the Environment Committee in May 1987 that there should be national timetabled water quality objectives in order to bring about a steady rate of improvement in polluted rivers and estuaries.

Mr. Moynihan: I shall answer this question shortly.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(2) what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Ridley: I shall answer these questions shortly.

Turtles

Dr. David Clark asked the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for South Shields on 13 July about the implementation of CITES conference resolution 2.12, how many live turtles have been imported into Grand Cayman from Nicaragua since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Moynihan [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1987]: According to the statistics assembled by the Department as part of its responsibilities under the convention on international trade in endangered species of wild fauna and flora (CITES) there have been no imports of live turtles from Nicaragua into Grand Cayman since 1979.

TRANSPORT

British Rail (Objectives)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Transport what progress has been made on agreeing new quality of service standards, as required in the objectives set for British Rail last autumn.

Mr. David Mitchell: I am glad to say that I have agreed with British Rail the new quality of service targets set out as follows. They build on the targets to which the board has been working hitherto. I am assured by Sir Robert Reid that they can be achieved within the resources available. I shall be monitoring their performance closely.

British Rail quality of service objectives for passenger railway

	Intercity	NSE	Provincial
Punctuality	Right time and up to 10 minutes late 90 per cent.	Right time and up to 5 minutes late 90 per cent.	Right time and up to 5 minutes late 85-97 per cent.

Train enquiry bureaux	95 per cent. of calls to be answered within 30 seconds
Ticket offices	Maximum queuing time of 3 minutes off peak and 5 minutes peak
Carriage cleaning
interior daily clean	100 per cent.	100 per cent.	95-100 per cent.
exterior daily wash	95 per cent.	100 per cent.	75-100 per cent.
heavy interior (per 28 days)	95 per cent.	100 per cent.	90-100 per cent.
Load factors	—	[1]	—

[1] No more than 135 per cent. for sliding door stock or 110 per cent. for slam door stock. No standing over 20 minutes except by choice.

British Railways Board (PSO Grant)

Mr. Squire asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the British Railways Board PSO cash ceiling for 1987-88.

Mr. David Mitchell: For 1987-88, the cash ceiling on PSO grant (which, for this year, still includes the inter-city sector) will be £809 million. It allows for increased expenditure on investment to improve quality and for additional expenditure to improve efficiency which will yield productivity savings in future years. It also includes a technical change in the method of funding investment in the grant-aided railway which will have the effect of reducing the board's borrowing requirement.

Gatwick Airport

Mr. Harry Greenway asked the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has as to the proportion of charter and scheduled passengers, respectively, using Gatwick who had originations and destinations north of the River Thames in 1985 and 1986.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The survey of London area airports carried out by the Civil Aviation Authority in 1984 showed that four fifths of all surface journeys by international air passengers using Gatwick start or finish in the south-east region.

Of those, the proportion having origins or destinations north of the River Thames was as follows:

	Per cent.
(i) Passengers on scheduled services	58
(ii) Passengers on charter services	47

Figures for 1985 and 1986 are not available.

Motorways (Speed Limits)

Mr. Amess asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on his policy towards upper and lower speed limits on the motorway.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The current maximum speed limit on the motorways was fully reviewed in 1984 and 1985. We decided that a 70 mph limit continues to provide the right balance between safety and the need for fast and convenient travel.

I have no plans for minimum limits.

Coaches

Mr. Adley asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will now review the safety and environmental requirements laid on coaches; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I have no plans for a review. A number of improvements are in hand including those I announced on 10 July in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill).

East London River Crossing

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department has re-evaluated the case for the east London river crossing in the light of its recent changes in the economic valuation of road schemes.

Mr. Channon: In accordance with the announced intentions at the time the changes were promulgated, such a reassessment will be carried out in due course.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and I will then consider whether the results affect our decisions on the inspector's report.

Mr. Cartwright asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list any excavation, boring or construction work which has been carried out or authorised in connection with the east London river crossing.

Mr. Channon: Geotechnical investigations involving boreholes and trial pits have been undertaken along the proposed line of the east London river crossing. There was a preliminary site investigation in 1980 and a detailed site investigation in 1983.

In 1984 a contaminated ground survey was undertaken in the areas of Beckton gas works and Thamesmead known to be contaminated with toxic and other potentially harmful waste materials.

A report was also compiled from existing records on the underground chalk workings in the Rockcliff gardens area.

All the surveys were referred to and made available for inspection during the public inquiry.

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Channon: The total spending for press and public relations during the financial year 1986-87 was £6·1 million. The estimated expenditure for the current year is £6·5 million. This includes both spending on programmes and running costs.

Nuclear Material Movements (Salford)

Mr. Terry Lewis asked the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list all movements of nuclear material for which his Department is responsible through Irlam and Cadishead in the city of Salford during each month of 1987.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The Department does not collect information of the kind requested. The arrangements for ensuring safety in the transport of radioactive materials, which are based on International Atomic Energy Agency regulations, do not depend on the particular route used.

CIVIL SERVICE

Assistant Secretaries

Mr. Frank Field asked the Minister for the Civil Service if, for each Government Department, he will give the numbers of officials at assistant secretary level and above who have been educated privately; what percentage of each grade in each Department these figures represent; and how these figures compare with those for 1980-81.

Mr. Luce: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Reduction

Mr. Nicholas Baker asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on whether the Inland Revenue will use section 38 of the Finance Act 1976 to deny an interest reduction where the debt is created solely as a result of the unwinding of a dual resident company as a result of the provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Bill affecting such companies.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let my hon. Friend have a reply as soon as possible.

Privatisation

Mr. Clay asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will publish for each company privatised since 1979 the number of shareholders holding 500 shares or less following privatisation and the latest information available.

Mr. Norman Lamont: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Inflation

Mr. Galbraith asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assumptions his Department has made about the rate of inflation for 1988, 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Major: The Financial Statement and Budget Report published in March 1987 contains assumptions for inflation as measured by the GDP deflator for the financial years 1988-89 to 1990-91, together with forecasts for growth in the GDP deflator in 1987-88 and for the retail prices index up to the second quarter of 1988. These figures are presented as follows:

Inflation
(percentage change on a year earlier)

GDP deflator	Forecast
1987-88	4·5
1988-89	4·0
1989-90	3·5
1990-91	3·0
RPI
1987 4th quarter	4·0
1988 2nd quarter	4·0

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what was the total spending by his Department on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year;

(2) what was the total spending by his Department on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Brooke: I shall let the hon. Member have a reply as soon as possible.

Clydesdale Bank

Mr. Salmond asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 14 July, if he will specify the precise dates on which (a) the Bank of England and (b) his Department were first informed of the proposed purchase of the Clydesdale bank by the National Australia bank.

Mr. Lilley: No, but within the timescale of the negotiations between the respective parties, the Bank of England had adequate time to inform the Treasury and to reach its conclusions.

Married Man's Allowance

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the savings to the Exchequer of abolishing the married man's tax allowance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1987]: The direct yield from abolishing the excess of the married man's allowance over the single person's allowance and the excess of married age allowances over the single age allowances is estimated to be £4·6 billion in a full year at 1987-88 income levels.

Investment and Capital Relief

Mr. McCrindle asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will consider expanding the range of investment and capital relief for investment in new and expanding companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont [pursuant to his reply, 14 July 1987]: The Government have introduced a variety of measures to encourage investment in new and expanding companies. We shall continue to monitor developments and to examine proposals which might further encourage productive investment.

DEFENCE

Publicity (Departmental Expenditure)

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total spending by his Department and the armed forces, respectively, on press and public relations in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Freeman: The figures requested are as follows:

	MOD	Armed Forces
1986-87	[1]1,772,000	[1]5,551,000
1987-88	[2]1,942,000	[2]5,572,000

[1] Latest outturn figure
[2] Estimate

These figures include staffing costs together with expenditure on films, exhibitions, publications, equipment and so on.

Mr. Dobson asked the Secretary of State for Defence what was the total spending by his Department and the armed forces, respectively, on television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional literature in 1986-87; and what is the estimated expenditure for the current year.

Mr. Freeman: The information is not held centrally. I will write to the hon. Member in due course.

RAF St. Mawgan (Fire)

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on an incident when Royal Air Force firemen were refused access to an American nuclear weapons storage area, after a fire alert at RAF St. Mawgan; whether local people or Royal Air Force firemen were in any danger from any radiation leak at that time; why those Royal Air Force firemen were not given access to detailed information regarding the nuclear make up of that base; and whether today the Royal Air Force has detailed knowledge of the nuclear weapons currently stored at the United States bases in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Freeman: For security reasons, I am not prepared to comment on locations where nuclear weapons may be stored. There is, however, good liaison between the United States and the United Kingdom on nuclear accident response issues. There has never been an accident involved nuclear weapons in the United Kingdom resulting in the release of radioactive material to the environment, and there has therefore never been any hazard either to the public or to service personnel.

Army Cadet Corps (Inner Cities)

Sir John Farr asked the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to establish an Army Cadet Corps unit in Leicester and in other inner city areas.

Mr. Freeman [pursuant to his reply, 13 July 1987, c. 346]: The Army Cadet Force (ACF), which celebrated its 125th anniversary in 1985, is a voluntary youth organisation sponsored by the Army. Its current membership is 43,500 cadets deployed in 1,650 detachments throughout Britain.

The Government attach great value to this force. Participation in both the military and community activities of the ACF engenders good citizenship, a spirit of service to Queen and country and a high degree of self-discipline. While the ACF is not part of either the Regular Army or the Territorial Army and membership carries no obligation to join the armed forces, a high proportion of cadets choose to pursue a career in the services. For instance, some 25 per cent. of the Regular Army intake in the period 1 April 1986 to 31 March 1987 had been members of the ACF.

The Ministry of Defence is examining the possibility of expanding the ACF in a number of inner city areas. Twenty existing detachments located within such areas are considered to be capable of expansion, and a number of other areas have been identified where new detachments might be formed. Some expansion is already being undertaken where this is possible at no or very low cost, including the expansion of one of the six existing detachments in Leicester, and its move into the TA centre in Brentwood road. Any substantial increase in the ACF would, however, depend on the availability of funds.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Small Businesses

Mr. David Shaw asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the achievements of his Department in helping small businesses over the last three years; and if he will publish the performance indicators by which his Department monitors those achievements and the statistical results of such monitoring.

Mr. MacGregor: The Government have introduced a variety of measures that are of particular benefit to smaller farm businesses. These measures include:

the introduction of the agricultural improvement scheme in October 1985 which provides grant aid for a wide range of agricultural and horticultural investments. This is of particular help to small and medium sized businesses, many of which were not regarded as sufficiently large to qualify under previous capital grant schemes. The effectiveness of the scheme may be judged by the number of farmers and growers who benefit from it, the expenditure already incurred and the commitment to future expenditure. Information on achievements is expected to be published in the next annual public expenditure White Paper; arrangements to restore the milk quota received by producers with less than 200,000 litres of quota to their pre-quota level and making direct compensation payments in 1984-85 and 1985-86 to alleviate the effect of the milk co-responsibility levy on small-scale producers; obtaining £3·4 million of EC aid to offset the effect of the cereals co-responsibility levy on small producers;

the reform of capital transfer tax to abolish the tax on capital gifts made between individuals during their lifetime;

new opportunities for diversification with grant available for ancillary businesses on or adjacent to farms; the extension of the less favoured areas in 1984 and the introduction of environmentally sensitive areas;

plans to increase the activities of the Agricultural Training Board in rural areas under the extended scope provided by the Agricultural Training Board Act 1987; grants to agricultural and horticultural co-operatives to improve the marketing of produce and to forage groups in less favoured areas. During the last three years these grants have amounted to more than £15 million.

I would also draw the attention of my hon. Friend to paragraphs 7.43 to 7.50 in the progress report on deregulation "Encouraging Enterprise" presented by the Secretary of State for Employment in May. These and relevant paragraphs in the two preceding White Papers on deregulation show the attention being given in my Department to reducing burdens on businesses. In addition, all purchasing points have been issued with a guidance booklet entitled "Payment on Time" intended particularly to assist small suppliers, and, as part of the Ministry's purchasing strategy, we are developing improved and closer relationships with small suppliers in order to stimulate competitiveness and innovation.

Monitoring and control systems, output measures, and performance indicators across the whole range of my Ministry's activities are being developed. Such information relevant to small businesses that is currently available has been set out in this reply.

Intervention Board (Delay in Payments)

Dame Peggy Fenner asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the current delay in payment by the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce dairy section, Reading; what estimate he has made of the implications of the delay for the cash flow of small companies; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Donald Thompson: For butter and skimmed milk powder purchased into intervention, the board makes payment in accordance with EC regulations between 120 and 140 days after the date of takeover. For other internal market schemes and for export refunds, the board's aim is to make payment within 28 days of the receipt of a properly documented claim. This time scale is in line with the best commercial practice. During the last 12 months the board has consistently met this target in the dairy sector. In the case of export refunds, this has been despite continuous increase in claims, numerous changes in EC regulations, and the need to prepare a new system of computer handling of claims in order to increase the board's efficiency further. If my hon. Friend has some specific case in mind, I would be grateful if she could let me have details.

Intervention Stores

Mr. John Mark Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish in the Official Report the current contents of each European Economic Community intervention foodstore in Britain; and what is the total annual cost to public funds of the operation of such foodstores.

Mr. Donald Thompson: On the first part of his question I refer my hon. Friend to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Pontypridd (Mr. John) on 16 July. Estimate provision for 1987-88 in class IV, vote 1, agricultural support (Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce), in respect of storage and related costs for intervention produce, is £177,247,000.

Farm Rents

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the average rise in farm rents per hectare, for farms which experienced a rent change, for tenants in each of the English regions during the last full year for which figures are available.

Mr. Donald Thompson: I shall reply to the hon. Member as soon as possible.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Matthew Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the results of the recent Agriculture Council meeting.

Mr. MacGregor: I refer the hon. Member to the statement which I made to the House on Wednesday 1 July at column 511.

Common Agricultural Policy

Mr. Teddy Taylor asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in the reform of the common agricultural policy since the meeting in June of the Council of Ministers.

Mr. MacGregor: The Commission has undertaken to bring forward very soon the detailed proposals requested by the European Council on 30 June, as a basis for future work on CAP reform and other matters.

Morocco (Fisheries Agreement)

Mr. Beith asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether it is the policy Her Majesty's Government that the European Economic Community fisheries agreement with Morocco should extend only to the area of sea which is internationally recognised as Moroccan waters.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 15 July 1987]: The details of a fisheries agreement between the European Community and the kingdom of Morocco are for negotiation between the Commission and the Moroccan authorities. We consider that the Western Sahara issue is for the countries of the region to settle. The normal wording of the Community's fisheries agreements with third countries would not prejudice the outcome of this matter but the Commission and the member states are fully aware of the need to proceed with caution.

Fishing Quotas

Mr. Randall asked the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to compensate those companies which did not exceed the saithe catch quotas allocated to them for area six before the closure of this fishery; and what corresponding action he will take with those companies which exceeded their quotas in this area.

Mr. Gummer [pursuant to his reply, 16 July 1987]: Under the terms of the sectoral quota arrangements for the area IV and VI white fisheries agreed with the industry at a consultative meeting in January, organisations which exceed a sectoral quota allocation to the disadvantage of others in the fishery are subject to a tonne-for-tonne deduction in the following year with the quantities concerned being used to compensate those disadvantaged. We are currently seeking additional opportunities for saithe by means of a quota exchange with another member state. If this proves successful, we shall discuss with the industry the scope for using the additional quantities to provide compensation this year.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Teacher-Pupil Ratios

Mr. Kilfedder asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current teacher-pupil ratio in primary schools, secondary schools and grammar schools in the North Down constituency.

Dr. Mawhinney: That latest available information relates to the 1985-86 school year and is as follows:

	Ratio
Primary[1]	25·13
Secondary	14·80
Grammar	15·95

[1] Includes nursery classes in primary schools and preparatory departments of grammar schools.

Schools

Mr. McGrady asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the regulations regarding the choice of schools for secondary education; and to what extent parental choice is taken into consideration.

Dr. Mawhinney: There are no statutory regulations regarding the choice of schools for secondary education. However, the present transfer arrangements operate on the basis enshrined in article 44 of the Education and Libraries (NI) Order 1986 that the Department of Education and Library Boards shall have regard to the general principle that, so far as is compatible with the provision of efficient instruction and training and the avoidance of unreasonable public expenditure, pupils shall be educated in accordance with the wishes of their parents.

South Tyrone Hospital, Dungannon

Mr. Maginnis asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were on the waiting list for surgery at the South Tyrone hospital, Dungannon, on 1 January 1986, and on the first day of each subsequent month up to, and including, 1 July.

Mr. Needham: I shall reply to the hon. Gentleman as soon as possible.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 119

SESSION 1986–87

6th July–17th July 1987

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Mr Speaker and his deputies are brought together under the heading Speakers rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Mr Speaker and his deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italic. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Money res = money resolution, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
